The Road to Peace

It will be recalled that after each concession granted to Adolf Hitler, the Nazi propaganda machine would announce to the world that there were new "problems" which demanded immediate solution. This would invariably cause western diplomats to put on an expression of pained surprise—sometimes indignation.

The shock quickly wore off and again concessions were made to Hitler. Again demands by Hitler. Again surprise. Yet, these diplomats were filled with optimism. In his book Defense of the Peace, Georges Bonnet, the French Foreign Minister during the late 1930's, relates that "Mr. Neville Chamberlain furthermore wondered whether the European situation was as black as Daladier believed. He doubted very much that Hitler desired the destruction of the Czechoslovak State or of a re-fashioned Czechoslovak State; he did not believe the Fuhrer wanted an Anschluss."

As we now know, Mr. Chamberlain's hopes were unfounded. Hitler obtained new concessions—made new demands—then caused Mr. Chamberlain to express astonishment again.

This routine continued right up to and including the fateful Munich sell-out. During all those years, peoples in western Europe and the United States were fed the delusion that there was no real connection between old concessions and new demands. Their failing to perceive the underlying strategy of the Nazis enabled Hitler to grab a good part of Europe without risk or opposition.

When the people awoke to the fact that appeasement had its own deadly logic, the bombs were already falling on Rotterdam, Coventry and Warsaw. Must we pay the same price again? Shall we allow ourselves to be taken down the road to disaster step by step?

Since the day that the Allied powers declared as their common objective "the complete disarmament and demilitarization of Germany and the elimination or control of all German industry that could be used for military production," this wartorn world has witnessed ever-increasing violations of this sacred pledge.

The Germans demanded that denazification cease. The Allied powers hastily acceded to their wish. Even the members of the German General Staff have been spared.

The Germans demanded that the war criminals be spared and the Allied powers forgave these criminal elements, with few exceptions.

The Germans demanded that their cartel empires be preserved and the Allied powers have acceded.

The Germans demanded that there be a halt to the reparations program and the Allies scaled down reparations deliveries to an insignificant level.

The Germans demanded the retention of prohibited industries which are the basis of a war potential, and the Allied powers complied.

The list of concessions, demands, concessions, demands, is by no means complete. But is it not clear that there is an organic connection between the concessions granted and the new demands made? Is it not plain that the logic of this steady retreat from victory points to the rebirth of the German army? The authoritative London Economist naively declares "the problem of the part that Germany should play in its own defense has suddenly sprung to the surface of thought and discussion." There is nothing sudden about this development. It is merely the end result of the steady deterioration of our original policies and position in Germany.

Shall we rearm Germany? The question is unreal and when it comes from the lips of the German-Firsters who have such thorough control over the occupation, it is downright dishonest. For the bitter truth is that Germany is being rearmed. You do not build up a modern army without first building up the steel plants, the ball-bearing plants, the synthetic oil plants, the machine-tool plants, the chemical plants—and these are going full blast again.

In addition, the tradition of militarism and Pan-Germanism has also been preserved. Pensions are paid to former members of the German General Staff. Even the little children are being groomed for their future role. Military toys are reappearing this Christmas Season in Germany.

As the Society for the Prevention of World War III has revealed in previous issues, the East German police are being attuned for new tasks of a more portentous nature. According to Western military intelligence sources, the "Police" forces are the precursors for a new German "people's" army. Presumably this army will have to "save" the Germans from the "imperialist plots of the Anglo-Saxons." But what about the West? Are our statesmen Simon-pure? The answer by this time is obvious, we believe. It does not make military sense to preserve a war potential far in excess of Germany's peacetime needs and yet piously assure peaveloving peoples that there is no intention to organize a German army.

For weeks, official denials have been crossed up by weasel-worded qualifications. You can pick up magazine after magazine, newspaper after newspaper and you will find reports and rumors about a new West German army. For example, in the November 25th, 1949 issue of the United News and World Report we read the following: "Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, signaled a vital turn in U.S. policy when he traveled to Germany to promise things to the Germans instead of having German officials representing a defeated nation travel to a meeting with U.S. officials to ask for favors, hat in hand. Original U.S. plan to turn Germany into a sheep pasture is revised into a secret plan to rearm the Germans into a powerful nation."

It has been said that General Bradley has spoken off-the-record on the practicability of a West German army.

General Lucius D. Clay, who shares in the responsibility for the decline of American prestige and authority in Germany, is openly lobbying for a German army. Some Americans have expressed surprise because ten months ago General Clay told American correspondents that if the U.S. allowed the creation of a new German army "We should never have come over here in the first place." His change of mind stems from the very policies he pursued which laid the groundwork for the rebuilding of Germany's industrial war potential.

According to newspaper columnists, Viscount Field Marshal Montgomery, a recent visitor to this country, has adopted the same line as General Clay.

And what about the Germans? There has been no official denial that Chancellor Adenauer has requested war equipment for 25 German Divisions. As a matter of fact, Adenauer has recently said that he would, under certain conditions, be ready and willing to organize a new Wehrmacht.

Adenauer seems to have a short memory because in the agreement of November 24th, 1949, Adenauer's Government pledged as follows: "The Federal Government further declares its earnest determination to maintain the demilitarization of the Federal territory and to endeavor by all means in its power to prevent the re-creation of armed forces of any kind. To this end the Federal Government will cooperate fully with the High Commission in the work of the military security board."

Adenauer did not wait very long to shatter the illusions of some naive politicians about the new Germany. When Dean Acheson visited the German leaders on November 13th, he expressed his aim to establish a relationship of "trust and confidence" and feelings of "personal regard" with the Germans. (New York Times, November 14th, 1949.)

The Germans are playing their cards carefully. They do not want to make any premature promises until their economic power has been fully revitalized. The Germans do not want to open all their cards until they are in the position where they can dictate the terms and conditions upon which they would agree toward the reestablishment of German armed forces.

The London Economist, in discussing the "question" of an army for Germany, recently admitted that an independent German Army "would be on every score politically disastrous." But it then urges a practical plan to "integrate" such an army under the control of the Western Allies. The London Economist apparently believes that the Germans will consent to play the role of European Gurkhas. On the other hand, the President of the Bonn Government, Mr. Heuss, told newsmen "frankly I cannot see the people's police waging a Socialist Unity party crusade to conquer and subdue democratic West Germany, just as I cannot see the West fighting the men from the Soviet Zone. This would not be the German way of handling internal political matters."

The London Economist should ponder the words of Herr Heuss. And while it does so, it should recollect the fateful September days of 1940 when Goering's Luftwaffe poured tons of bombs on London. Indeed, the Germans will not accept an inferior position. They regard the creation of a German army as an "internal" political matter, for such an army must first and only be at the service of the Germans.

What does this all mean? First let it be said that our Society is dedicated to the prevention of a new holocaust. It does not believe that war is inevitable. Yet the Germans have been able to extract concession after concession on the assumption of the inevitability of a new war. It is therefore understandable that the Germans should have a vested interest in keeping the pot boiling.

Only by maintaining a war-charged atmosphere can the German plan for resurgence succeed. There are people who believe it far more practical to allow the Germans rather than Americans to do the fighting and the dying in a new war. But is it not far more prudent to put an end to German intrigue which thrives on the mounting tensions and cultivates the propaganda of the inevitability of a new war between East and West?

If the Germans were deprived of their ability to pit East against West as they are succeeding in doing today, then the inevitability thesis would not be as plausible as it seems. The German strategy can be checked by an honest and determined effort on the part of the four occupying powers to neutralize Germany. Our concept of neutralization calls for a 4-Power agreement to deprive Germany of those instruments of economic, political and military power which have enabled her to blackmail East and West. (As can be seen, our concept of neutralization has nothing in common with similar projects advocated by the so-called Nauheimer Circle of Professor Ulrich Noack, whose background we have on various occasions exposed in these pages.)

The American Friends Service Committee prepared a report last summer in which it discussed ways and means of reducing tensions between Russia and the West and thereby decreasing the chances of a new war. It, too, advocated the neutralization of Germany "for the U.S. and the Soviet Union to continue the competition for Germany will almost certainly lead to disaster."

It is encouraging to note that responsible groups dedicated to the Brotherhood of Man are aware of the fundamental importance of Germany with regard to the future peace and security of the world. We have said this on frequent occasions: "For so long as Germany remains a potential asset to one or more of the Allied nations she will be used for ulterior, selfish, political, military and economic purposes. And so long will the world remain insecure. So long as Germany is available for one of these marriages, she will be in a good position to recapture her military strength. Only when we have conclusive proof, supported by acts, that the big powers will not establish any liaison with Germany to use her as an eventual ally in any extra national activity, will there be a reasonable chance of destroying mutual suspicions and of establishing a genuine world collaboration for peace."

This statement was published in our magazine, Prevent World War III, in April, 1946, long before there was any apparent sign that the Germans were climbing back to positions where they could embroil the world in a new war.

We refused to live in Mr. Chamberlain's dream-world of the 1930's, because we were already aware of the violation of common agreements made by the Allies to eliminate Germany's war potential. Thus all the talk and noise today about new German armies in the East and in the West is not surprising to us.

It must be said that German armies will inevitably be created again if the present policies which are repeating the same blunders made by the Allies after World War I, are continued.

The neutralization of Germany can be a major step towards the prevention of new conflicts. Such a neutralization requires the following steps:

A. The establishment of a Four-Power disarmament committee to prevent the remilitarization of any of the zones in Germany.

B. Four-Power agreement to hold the level of German steel production to peacetime needs—not exceeding present permitted levels.

C. Prompt fulfillment of the original reparations program under Four-Power control.

D. Four-Power agreement on the elimination from key positions of former Nazis and Hitler supporters.

E. Four-Power action to breakup the German cartel empire.

F. Genuine international control of the Ruhr to prevent the reestablishment of German economic domination of her neighbors, and, at the same time, give Germany a viable economy for peace.

The carrying out of these measures and subsidiary steps would take Germany out of the international arena as a major bone of contention between East and West.

The hour is late, but it is up to us, the living, to make our final decision. We must bear in mind that a German army is inevitable if the people consent to policies which preserve a dangerous war potential in her heavy industries. It would be wishful thinking to believe that the creation of German armies, East or West, would be a boon to either side or to mankind in general.

President Heuss has told the truth: An East German army will not fight a West German army or vice-versa. They will unite and when they unite, the betrayal of the peace and the security of the U.S. and her friends abroad will be complete.

Urge a Realistic German Policy

The Society for the Prevention of World War III made public text of a wire sent on November 9 to Secretary Acheson in connection with the Paris meeting of the Foreign Ministers of Britain, France, and the United States.

It was pointed out that "the reopening of the dismantling issue, under pressure of the Germans and their pro-German friends in the United States, is completely unjustified morally, economically and militarily." The wire further stated: "It is high time that American policies be made by the State Department and not by the Germans."

The Society also stressed the fact that in January, 1949, Dean Acheson categorically stated that the United States Government would not contemplate raising the level of German steel production and reassured Western Europe that the United States had no intention of building up Germany at the expense of her neighbors.

The Society urged that the Secretary of State withhold any decision on the dismantling program until he had "thoroughly considered its far-reaching implications in terms of our future security and leadership." Text of wire follows:

"Hon. Dean Acheson, Personal Secretary of State
Paris, France

"It is considered judgment of Society for Prevention World War III that reopening of dismantling issue, under pressure of Germans and their pro-German friends in the U. S., is completely unjustified morally, economically and militarily.

"It will give aid and comfort to extremist elements and strengthen anti-American feeling among the peoples of Europe.

"It will whet the never satiated German appetite.

"The Germans will continue to demand greater concessions and thus further undermine security of the U. S. and her friends in Europe.

"Modification of dismantling program would mean greater German steel capacity.

"On January 26, 1949, you stated that U. S. Government would not increase Ruhr steel production beyond ten million seven hundred thousand tons as authorized.

"There is no economic justification for raising German steel level which will reconstruct German war potential.

"It is high time that American policies be made by State Department and not by Germans.

"This will not come about as long as there are among your chief advisers individuals known for their pro-German bias and their past or present ties with German interests.

"The deterioration in prestige and effectiveness of American occupation of Germany stems directly from well-known undermining activities of such individuals who have carried out 'Germany First' policies.

"Respectfully urge withholding any decision on dismantling until you have thoroughly considered far-reaching implications in terms of our future security and leadership.

Society for the Prevention of World War III,
C. Monteith Gilpin, Secretary."
Mark Van Doren, Chairman,

Revealing Documents

The politics of war is a subject which received the closest attention of the German General Staff. During the crucial period of World War II, the General Staff sought to influence the outcome of the military struggle by every possible political means. This explains the secret instructions of Admiral Walter Wilhelm Canaris, Chief of the Secret Service of the German High Command to his agents which were found in the files of the German Foreign Office.

In this connection, it is interesting to note that Allen Welsh Dulles, former head of the OSS in Switzerland, makes frequent mention of Canaris in his book about Germany's so-called underground. He tells about negotiations he conducted with some of Canaris' agents in Switzerland who were supposed to be anti-Nazi. Whether these agents were anti-Nazi or not is a moot question. But we do know that Admiral Canaris was the "brain" of the German espionage service and a ruthless agent of the German General Staff. He fully understood the importance of the political factor in warfare.

As disclosed in the Canaris documents, the Germans knew that they could not win the war unless they succeeded in dividing their enemies by heightening political tensions and suspicions among them.

If this were merely wartime strategy on the part of the Germans, these documents would only serve as an historical curiosity. But we know that the Germans today have a vested interest in holding tensions between East and West at war pitch. As in war, so the Germans today are fanning the flames of mutual suspicions among their former adversaries. By intensifying the divisions among the victorious powers and pitting East against West, the Germans were evading the responsibilities of their crimes and aggressions. Thus, the Canaris strategy, which was frustrated during the war itself, has re-emerged with greater success in this period of peace. It is the context of present day developments that the Canaris documents assume a sinister significance.

Following is the verbatim translation of two of these documents containing Admiral Canaris' instructions for top German agents abroad.

OKW—Abwehr, Secret State Matter, March 15, 1944

"At a meeting of the representatives of the A. A., S. D. and the department of defense, the following resolutions were adopted for unified action of all the leaders in foreign countries:

1. Utilize to the fullest extent all available possibilities in neutral and enemy countries, in order to strengthen our military effort with political and propaganda campaigns.

2. Our goal is to crush the enemy's plan whose object it is to destroy forever Germany militarily, economically and culturally.

3. The new regulations put into effect by the political leaders for the dissolution and disintegration of the enemy bloc should be carried out more intensively. We must do our utmost to create a state of confusion among our enemies. Such a state of disunity would enable us to sue for a quick separate peace with either side. While it is true that the efforts made in that direction have failed so far due to the implacable hate policy of Roosevelt and Churchill, it does not mean that some day under different conditions, the unnatural front of our enemies could not be broken. Roosevelt's electoral defeat this year could have immeasurable political consequences.

The political and military leaders are of the opinion that Germany has nothing to expect from the Russians; on the contrary, should the war take a turn for the worse, the Slavs may retaliate the harsh treatment we inflicted upon them. Nevertheless, every alley should be explored in order to create a political state of mind which will induce the Russians to negotiate a separate peace with us.

In the event of a negotiated peace, or should we be defeated—on a long range plan Germany has everything to gain by cooperating with the East.

Right now, the chances for a separate peace with the West are a little better, especially if we succeed, through our propaganda campaign and our "confidential" channels to convince the enemy that Roosevelt's policy of unconditional surrender drives the German people towards communism.

The opposition against Roosevelt's alliance with Stalin grows constantly. Our chances for success are good, if we succeed to stir up influential circles against Roosevelt's policy. This can be done through clever pieces of information, or by references to unsuspicious neutral ecclesiastical contact men.

We have at our command in the United States efficient contacts, which have been carefully kept up during the war. The campaign of hatred stirred up by Roosevelt and the Jews against everything German has temporarily silenced the pro-German bloc in the USA. However, there is every hope that this situation will be completely changed in a few months.

If the Republicans succeed in defeating Roosevelt in the coming presidential election, it would greatly influence the American war policy towards us.

The KO-leaders abroad and their staff have innumerable opportunities of constantly referring to Roosevelt's hate policy.

They can at the same time hint to the danger that Germany may thereby be forced to cooperate with Russia. The greatest caution has to be observed in all conversations and meetings by those who as "anti-Nazis" maintain contact with the enemy. When fulfilling missions, they have to comply strictly with instructions.

AUCTION FOR GERMANY

The confusion of the German situation, which has been growing steadily in the past year, recently reached a new peak. It is almost unbelievable that the situation should have touched the point where even the question of German remilitarization and of a German army is strongly advocated by certain powerful circles.

Tempora mutantur—times change—but the naivete, if not the stupidity of the period following the first world war prevails again. Or are we witnessing the enfolding of a well calculated plan preferred by the powers that be? It is true that there are other factors in the German problem today which were not present after the first World War. But the hysterical arguments in favor of a strong, rearmed Germany, as advocated at present by wishful thinkers and political opportunists, so soon after the end of hostilities, are fantastic and outrageous.

It is no secret, and the fact has been stated in these pages many times previously, that both Soviet Russia and the Western powers are frantically bidding for Germany. The London Economist recently called this bidding an "Auction for Germany." The imbecility of this auction, unfortunately, has not been fully realized by those responsible for shaping German policy. Every intelligent political observer knows that Soviet policy in Germany, to quote the Economist, "has been one of long-sighted and realistic conspiracy for power," while American policy—we still quote the Economist—"had gone through a 180° revolution since 1945." It should have been clear for a long time that in a continuous bidding for Germany's favor, Moscow definitely has more advantages to offer. It also should have been made clear for a long time that in an open bidding the Western powers, for very obvious reasons, could only be the losers. It is mathematically certain that the Western powers, being democracies, would never be able to outbid totalitarian Soviet Russia for the goodwill, friendship and alliance of totalitarian-minded Germany.

There is still time, perhaps, for those of our policymakers who are under the delusion that we can win Germany to our side against Soviet Russia to awake from their wishful dream.

An editorial in a recent issue of the New York Post —a paper which consistently opposes Soviet policy of expansion—has given an excellent analysis of this situation.

"Have we finally been deluded into the belief," the editorial states, "that we can compete effectively with Soviet expansionism only by embracing the old Nazi cabal?"

And it adds:

"Unquestionably, the Russians are holding hands with their former Nazi adversaries. There is powerful evidence that the Nazi comeback is just as swift or even more phenomenal in the Soviet Zone than in the Western realm. This is no justification for American policy or lack of policy. It proves nothing about the nature of the problem concerning us in Germany. It proves only that the old Nazi contingent is doing quite well on both sides of the German fence. The Nazis were always remarkably flexible fellows; they will play footsie with anyone who takes care of their immediate needs. They can love or hate Bolsheviks, as they proved in August, 1939, and June, 1941. But they can never make real peace with democracy."

The editorial furthermore emphasizes that it is nonsense to think that a strong Germany would prove an efficient "bulwark against Communism." It should not be forgotten that it was a "strong Germany" that signed the Nazi Soviet Pact.

Needless to say, we most heartily endorse the viewpoints expressed in this editorial, especially the following:

"(The Germans) will sing anti-Soviet songs in the Western Zone even while their counterparts in the Soviet-ruled territory dream of a grand new alliance with the Soviets. They will profess their devotion to 'free enterprise'—even as they endeavor to rebuild the cartel system. They will bring neither peace nor security to the world."

Many times in the past we have pointed out in these pages that it would be criminal for the Western powers to rely on the Germans. To think seriously that if we were to remilitarize and build up Western Germany—even if we were to recreate the German army—the Germans would become our partners and friends and not those of Soviet Russia, is plain nonsense. In this connection, it should be pointed out that even extreme conservatives, to say nothing of right-wing elements in Western Germany, openly play with the idea of a new Russo-German alliance.

It is true that some of their colleagues occasionally show a strong anti-Communist attitude. But is this not done to fool us and to throw sand in our eyes? We need only to mention the strange activities of people like ex-Ambassador Rudolf Nadolny, University Professor Ulrich Noack, etc., men who despite their conservative backgrounds are strong protagonists of a German deal with Soviet Russia.

Even a man like Pastor Martin Niemoeller recently tore off his mask of nationalistic doubletalk and openly stated that if unification is not granted he would rather see Germany become Communist than continue to live in its present divided condition.

The question put to Niemoeller after his return from a three-month visit to Australia was, "Do you think that, in order to reunify East and West Germany, most Germans would be prepared to pay the price of having a Communist regime?"

"Yes," Niemoeller answered without hesitation. "Given the alternative of a continual split in Germany or the prospect of reuniting the country under a fallen dictatorship—that of Russia—the Germans would prefer to take the risks of Communism."

Such a statement, coming from the mouth of a man generally considered one of the most outspoken of the conservative German nationalists, speaks for itself. No comment is necessary. But we think this significant statement of Pastor Niemoeller should help clarify the situation.

It is our firm belief that Niemoeller's pro-Soviet pronouncement should destroy, once and for all, the myth that if we give them everything they want, the Germans will be a bulwark against Communism.

They never will be a bulwark against Communism because the totalitarian and autocratic features of Communism are much dearer to the hearts of the Germans than the features of democracy. It should be kept in mind—and history will undoubtedly confirm it—that far from being a bulwark against Communism, it was Adolf Hitler and his Nazi Germans who opened the door of Central and Western Europe to Communism.

A SORRY RECORD

December 16th should have been an appropriate day for those who are responsible for the German occupation to search their souls.

It was on that fateful day five years ago that Nazi hordes under Field Marshal von Runstedt (who never was tried for war crimes) lunged forward in a last attempt to ward off their certain defeat. They struck hard at green American GI's who were entrenched in the cold wastes of the Ardennes Forest in Belgium. The Nazi troopers were a hard-bitten desperate gang. For years they had raked Europe with murder and rapine. They were out for more blood—this time, the blood of American GI's.

In their ranks was the first SS Panzer regiment commanded by SS Col. Joachim Peiper. Peiper—one time assistant to Gestapo Chief Himmler—had trained his men well. On the Eastern front, one of his battalions had earned the nickname "the Blow Torch Battalion" after having burned two villages and murdered all the inhabitants. Now, by order of Field Marshal von Rundstedt, this motley gang of cutthroats was going to practice its skills on American troops.

The Battle of the Bulge turned into a glorious Allied victory but not until the Peiper group had mercilessly slaughtered hundreds of American GI's taken prisoners of war. Seventy-three of these criminals were caught and brought to justice before an American Military Tribunal. All of them were found guilty. Forty-three were sentenced to death. But then something amazing occurred.

As if from nowhere, pro-German forces began a concerted drive to save these murderers. Both in Germany and in the United States, they worked through the churches and managed to enlist the services of well-meaning but very naive peoples and organizations. Taking a page out of Hitler's Mein Kampf, they ceaselessly repeated their lies. They smeared the American prosecution and whitewashed the war criminals. Obviously well financed, these un-American forces were able to reach influential quarters in the government. The executions were postponed. Investigations were made, one after another—thirteen of them—but the essential guilt of these war criminals withstood every lie.

Even General Clay, when commuting the death sentences of 37 of these criminals, admitted that there was no doubt in his mind as to the guilt of those whom he branded "cold-blooded killers." Nevertheless, the pro-German agitators were not satisfied with General Clay's accommodating action and they increased their propaganda barrage which, unfortunately, received a good press. What were these pro-Germans after? Was it merely to spare the lives of the six remaining criminals? In reality, they were trying to smear the prosecutors in the Malmedy massacre case in order to discredit the whole concept of the war crimes trials and the guilt of the Germans.

The thirteenth investigation of the Malmedy case conducted by a Senate Subcommittee under the Chairmanship of Senator Baldwin, not only completely vindicated the American prosecution and confirmed the guilt of the Nazi gang, but it went further. In its final report, the Subcommittee examined the activities of the National Council for the Prevention of War (not to be confused with the Society for the Prevention of World War III) which spearheaded the drive to save these war criminals. The Subcommittee declared that it was "convinced that its (National Council for Prevention of War) activities in this matter which go far beyond the Malmedy case have been most damaging to the national interests of our country and to the cause of peace. The Subcommittee feels strongly that the proper investigation should be made to determine the real motivation in back of the activities of this organization and the influence it has had on many individuals within the United States who have accepted as fact the allegations publicized by it." Scratch a pro-German outfit and you will find a group of willful individuals who do not hesitate to damage the national interests of our country and the cause of peace.

Does this mean that the six remaining war criminals will receive their just desserts? Not at all. It is known that powerful influences around John J. McCloy are pressing him to commute their sentences—perhaps as a Christmas present. Those who say that John J. McCloy would not do such a thing should bear in mind that he has not moved as yet to carry out the sentences in spite of the final report of the Baldwin Subcommittee.

Nor has John J. McCloy carried out the sentences of two other major war crimes cases. In April, 1948, General Otto Ohlendorf, who confessed to the murder of 90,000 men, women, and children, and 13 of his co-criminals, were sentenced to hanging. They are still alive.

Or take the case of Baron von Weizsaecker et al., which involved the leading officials of the German Foreign Office. They were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment by an American Military Tribunal many months ago, but John J. McCloy has not yet confirmed these sentences.

The Society for the Prevention of World War III has repeatedly communicated with John J. McCloy on these matters but all we have received are polite evasions. Is another Ilse Koch affair in the making? Are the American people going to be faced with a fait accompli about which they can do nothing except bury their faces in shame as they did after Clay's commutation of Ilse Koch?

The prosecution and punishment of war criminals is tragic enough with only 250 persons in all of the Western Zones still in prison for Nazi activities. Daily reports appear in the press showing that denazification has become renazification and that thousands of top Nazis are again taking hold of positions of power and influence. Even official U. S. reports admit this to be true. Must the American people be subjected to a compounding of this scandalous situation through new commutations and reprieves?

The other day, the so-called Minister of Justice in the Bonn Government, Herr Thomas Dehler, announced that he would ask a general pardon for German war criminals now serving sentences in the U. S. Zone. He said "sentences passed in 1946 would probably not be passed today." He added: "Things are regarded very dispassionately today." Why did Herr Dehler pick the year 1946? It was during that year that the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg passed down its verdict in the major war crimes trial involving Hitler's closest henchmen, including Goering, von Ribbentrop, and Hess. Is it this trial to which Herr Dehler refers?

Would anyone have dared to dream during the Battle of the Bulge that five years later the Germans would arrogantly speak in defense of their leading war criminals? But why should we be surprised at Herr Dehler's boldness? The Military Government authorities have not raised a finger to remove the majority of top officials in the Ministry of Justice who are out and out Nazis. This disgraceful state of affairs no doubt has encouraged Herr Dehler to believe that the American people are ready to place halos on the German butchers. Herr Dehler told the press that he was going to make his appeal to the Office of the High Commissioner. We wonder how Mr. McCloy is going to receive Herr Dehler. His failure to act on the abovementioned cases may be a significant clue to what he intends to do—that is, if those of us who cherish the memories of our fallen heroes fail to speak up in time.

CARTEL TACTICS

Readers of Prevent World War III are familiar with the campaign conducted by powerful pro-German interests to block the delivery of reparations to the victims of German aggression.

During the period immediately following the end of the war, these pro-German hucksters tried to create the impression that the delivery of German plants as reparations was impossible because the greater portion of German industry had been leveled by Allied bombardments. It seemed like a plausible argument to many people and it certainly had its effect on U. S. policy which steered away from the original reparations program. Delivery schedules were reduced and for a while all was serene. But this concession merely whet the appetite of the Germans and their helpers. They saw in the lofty principles of the Marshall Plan a new opportunity to discredit the proposition that an aggressor nation must compensate in some degree for the damages inflicted upon its victims.

No longer did they stress the damages to German heavy industry. Now they were telling the world that Germany's economic war potential was "essential" to the recovery of western Europe. This line of reasoning paid rich dividends. The occupying powers, at the behest of our policy-makers in Germany, consented to further drastic reductions in the schedule of plants earmarked for reparations.

This created quite a stir among Germany's neighbors and prompted the Allied powers in Germany to solemnly pledge that this would be the final cut-back in the reparations program. But, as the saying goes, promises are made only to be broken. Some weeks ago, after a brief discussion, the Allied High Commissioners virtually emasculated what was left of the reparations program. But this time, as their communique shows, there was no explanation—no apologies. Either the Allied High Commissioners were in a hurry to present Germany's victims with a fait accompli so as to check any potential opposition to this unprecedented action, or they were fully confident that public opinion had been so molded and conditioned to the Germany-First policy that it was no longer necessary to give explanations.

To the well-informed, however, the indecent haste with which the Allied authorities have junked the reparations program is the outgrowth of a conspiracy which seems to have been hatched during the height of the war.

The very same cartel interests in the U. S. which, after World War I, made an important contribution to the rebuilding of those heavy industries in Germany which were the bone and sinew of Hitler's war machine, appeared to have played a very active role in this matter.

In defending the Air Force's theories concerning strategic bombing, General Hap Arnold, who directed our Air Force during World War II, said that the Air Force had been well advised as to "the best available information for target selection" in Germany. "We were using as advisers," General Arnold wrote, "men who had been in Germany and Japan; who had helped build their industries, loaned them money, studied their industrial problems, sold them their factory equipment and visited the factories. What better source of advice could we have obtained?"

Is it a coincidence that as a result of the advice given to the Air Force by these "experts" on German industry, more than 75 percent of Germany's war potential escaped the tremendous blows of our Air Force? Is it a coincidence that many of the plants untouched by Allied bombs were precisely those which were later destined for reparations? It is highly probable that the very same interests which "helped" determine the targets for our Air Force were approached by the German cartelists in the Ruhr when they learned that those plants which remained intact were scheduled for reparations.

As we now know, Germany's industrial warlords were sending out desperate SOS signals to their friends in the U. S. Their call for help was answered. The U. S. Steel Corporation, which has had close ties with the German steel cartel in the past, "loaned" some of its top officials, including Mr. George Wolf, to "investigate" the already tattered reparations program.

In previous issues of our magazine, we have dealt with their so-called investigation and demonstrated that Mr. Wolf and his colleagues were far from objective. The Wolf Report on Reparations was just a more refined effort to salvage as much for Germany's warlords as was politically feasible.

The Wolf group was followed by the so-called Humphrey Committee which included persons whose business connections were linked very definitely with the German cartel network prior to the war. It was no surprise, therefore, that the Humphrey Committee, too, should approve drastic modifications of the reparations program using for its argument the biased views of the U. S. Steel officials.

If we include among those experts who "advised" General Arnold during the war the top officials of Dillon, Read, Kuhn Loeb & Co., General Motors, or U. S. Steel, the picture becomes clearer. It was these forces that had a very decisive effect on shaping American policy with regard to the continuation of reparations.

Throughout 1949 the German lobby in Washington remained at the beck and call of these pro-German interests, providing them with all the propaganda necessary to confuse the public.

The German cartel lobby was not only busy in Washington. It was a very real participant in the deliberations of the Foreign Ministers who met in Paris in late November, 1949, to review the reparations "problem." At this meeting the Vereinigte Stahlwerke submitted a memorandum suggesting how the German economic powerhouse could be employed to the advantage of all concerned.

The London Economist discussed this memorandum recently, in which connection it said "German heavy industry looks forward to the collapse of plans for expanding steel production in uneconomic areas such as Italy and Norway . . ." The London Economist stated that the German cartel interests were trying to make "capital out of the aspirations of the Economic Cooperation Administration and the State Department" to integrate the western European economy thereby relaxing trade barriers. The German steel cartel is all for an "integration" which would "rationalize" the industrial complex of Western Europe.

Realizing, however, that her neighbors are not, as yet, ready to accept the embrace of the Ruhr barons, the German cartelists have suggested a more novel experiment. Thus, the London Economist relates "German industry is crying out for capital. Since France itself has little for investments abroad, the idea has been broached from the German side that American funds might be channeled to Germany through France." If this little trick is put over, then all sides would be satisfied, according to the Germans. The nations who grab at this attractive bait will find themselves, in a short time, firmly under the thumb of the German industrialists, as after World War I.

It can hardly be said that the presentation of this memorandum to the Foreign Ministers, at a time when they were discussing the reparations program, was fortuitous. On the contrary, without the liquidation of the reparations program this dream of German economic hegemony would not be completely realized. Thus, the decision of the Allied High Commissioners to preserve in Germany the great steel plants—although not needed for peacetime industry—as well as the rescinding of restrictions on German war industries, represents a decisive victory for the German cartelists and is a long step toward the goal which even Adolf Hitler failed to achieve.

When Chancellor Adenauer, who is very chummy with the industrial warlords of the Ruhr, appeared before the Bonn Parliament announcing the historic decisions of the Foreign Ministers, he was roundly denounced by Kurt Schumacher, the fanatical Nationalist and leader of the German Social-Democratic Party. Schumacher accused Adenauer of selling out to the Allied powers and betraying the true interests of the Fatherland.

His vociferous protestations, however, did not fool those who have watched the antics of the Germans since the end of the war. A leading American correspondent said "Schumacher is playing the role of the 'constructive opposition.' He is attacking Adenauer's policies in order that the Chancellor may indicate to the Allies that his attempts at cooperation are made in the face of considerable political risk and that, therefore, he has earned additional concessions from the High Commission itself." (Shades of Streseman. Ed.)

In short, Schumacher and Adenauer have teamed up in a shrewd public relations operation which is designed to dupe and blind the peoples of the West. The judgment of this American newsman makes sense. It is inconceivable, in the long run, for Herr Schumacher to kick about an agreement which raises Germany's chances to take over Western Europe. Thus new German chains are being forged for the peoples of the West.

HITLER'S GENTLE DIPLOMAT

On March 2nd, 1941, the German Foreign Office circulated a top secret directive among leading German officials informing them of recent negotiations with the Japanese Ambassador Oshima to Germany. The confidential memorandum revealed that during the conversation with the Japanese Ambassador, the Germans re-

"Germany eventually will be a greater problem for the Western powers than Russia, Field Marshal Lord Wavell predicted at a press conference.

"The distinguished British soldier said fear of Germany is the primary cause of the present Russian attitude and conduct. 'The Germans are the most dangerous people in Europe,' he said."

(Report in the New York Herald Tribune from Ottawa, Canada)

The inevitable is coming to pass—the Germans are being set up in business again.

In Western Germany, the United States, Britain and France have joined in restricting the industrial plant dismantling program and in granting economic and political privileges to the new Bonn government.

In Eastern Germany, the Russians are strengthening their puppet government and are creating a German Communist army.

What a disheartening picture this is, so incredibly reminiscent of the twenties and thirties when the victorious allies of World War I loosed the chains of defeated Germany and sowed the dragon's teeth for World War II.

The victors then were moved by a spirit of forgiveness. This time the widening split between the victors has worked to the advantage of the vanquished. Those Germans who have sought a bargaining position between East and West in hopes of eventually recovering Germany's position of power must now be rejoicing. Their dreams now seem attainable.

The same old pledges of demilitarization, of preventing the re-creation of armed forces, of co-operation to keep European peace, are made again, just as they were by Stresemann and Bruening. Those German leaders probably meant to keep the pledges, even as Chancellor Adenauer means to today. The fear is always present, however, that at a critical moment the German spirit of nationalism may find a war eagle to replace Adenauer even as it found a Hitler to follow Stresemann and Bruening. . . .

There may be the very dimmest hope that the Allies of World War II, divided as they are, will find some agreement that there must not be a military resurgent Germany again to peril the world.

One would think that this lesson, twice vividly taught, would be remembered.

(From an editorial in The Milwaukee Journal)

marked that "A surprise attack by Japan (on the British Empire) was the thing needed to keep America out of the war. America, which is not rearmed as yet, and would not be very willing to expose its fleet West of Hawaii, then could do it even less. . ." Ambassador Oshima agreed fully with these lines of reasoning and declared that he would do everything to carry out this policy.

On December 7th, 1941, Pearl Harbor was bombed. The above quoted memorandum was initialed by Baron von Weiszaecker who was State Secretary of the German Foreign Office.

Writing in the December, 1948 issue of "Prevent World War III," Miss Belle Mayer, who was a leading member of the U.S. prosecution in the Farben trial, said "von Weiszaecker played a key role in persuading the Japanese Government to attack the U.S." In her brief, but thorough account of von Weiszaecker's criminal activities, Miss Mayer shows that this German diplomat was at one time a Brig. General in the SS Elite Guard, a prime mover in the Aryanization of Jewish property in France, Belgium and other countries and one who had personally signed orders approving the transfer of thousands of these Jews to concentration camps and approving their extermination.

In accordance with Allied agreements on the prosecution of German war criminals, von Weiszaecker was placed on trial together with a number of other key German diplomats of the Foreign Office. Von Weiszaecker et al were so completely exposed by the American prosecution that the American Military Tribunal had no alternative but to hand down a verdict of guilty.

True, von Weiszaecker received a very light sentence (7 years) but nevertheless justice, in principle, had triumphed.

Von Weiszaecker was not the type of man to give up so easily. As noted by Miss Mayer, he got to work at once on his contacts in the Vatican and in the foreign offices of some of the countries with which Germany had been at war. He succeeded in rallying to his defense many a so-called reputable diplomat. But even their prestige could not wash away the bloodstains on the delicate hands of the Baron.

In view of the overwhelming evidence attesting to von Weiszaecker's guilt and his criminal designs against the peace and security of the U.S. and her allies, we did not dream that he could ever secure American lawyers for his defense. It is true that the canons of law make provision for the defense of criminals since a man is supposed to be innocent until proven guilty. But the von Weiszaecker case is now beyond that stage. Tons of official German documents give mute evidence to his diabolical crimes. Under these circumstances we were dismayed to learn that two splendid Americans, and outstanding lawyers have consented to defend a man whose very guilt, as revealed by German documents, belied his profuse denials.

We know that the German war criminals have had one stock alibi when they were apprehended by Allied authorities. The generals, for example, said that they were merely lending professional advice to the Nazi Reich. The judges declared that they were merely agents of Nazi law. The industrial warlords stated that they were merely carrying on their business in conformity with the directives of the Nazi Reich. And the diplomats, including von Weiszaecker, pleaded that they were carrying out the foreign policy of the Nazi Reich. All these criminals have shifted their responsibility to a very nebulous master, the Nazi Reich.

But the Nazi Reich was not merely a philosophical concept, it was the final synthesis of the very activities pursued by the generals, the judges, the diplomats, the industrialists. There would have been no Nazi Reich without the industrial warlords and the von Weiszaecker diplomats.

The von Weiszaecker case is beyond formal and legalistic considerations. The underlying principles which motivated millions to take up the cudgels against the Nazis would lose their meaning if the von Weiszaecker case were judged on that narrow basis.

Ordinarily, we are not concerned with the financial angle of the problems we discuss. In this case, however, it should be pointed out that many a Nazi bigwig has amassed a fortune by participating in the looting of Germany's victims during the war. We know for a fact that the Nazis deposited a good part of these funds for safekeeping in "neutral countries" such as Switzerland, Sweden and Spain. It is entirely within the realm of possibility that the sums von Weiszaecker will pay their American lawyers for their services actually consists of assets stolen from people who were robbed and slaughtered in the concentration camps. We think that these facts should be pondered, for more is at stake than Herr von Weiszaecker. It must be realized that the Weiszaeckers can be dispensed with. But the American people can not afford to forsake their honor or their future security.

Neo-Nazis Appeal to the Kremlin

German-language Chicago Buerger-Zeitung publishes sensational Open Letter to Stalin: "...We national Germans do not want to have to do anything with the Yankees, with their capitalistic exploitation and their political arrogance..."

The Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung of Chicago, Illinois, is the official organ of the German-American Citizens' League of Illinois. It is a weekly, printed partly in English, partly in German. The paper is known as one of the foremost pro-German apology mouthpieces in the country. Its tone sometimes reminds one of the rabble-rousing diatribes of the late Nazi Propaganda Minister, Goebbels. Among the Buerger-Zeitung's regular contributors are Dr. Otto Strasser and many others of the same ilk.

The Buerger-Zeitung has taken the usual attitude of pro-German apologists against dismantling and in favor of the re-creation of a strong united Germany. On the occasion of the German Day Rallies in Chicago, the paper wrote of "Americans of German blood"; it fulminated against denazification and against the war crimes trials. In short, it took the well-known stand of extreme German propagandists.

On November 17, 1949, the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung fired a gun of a sensational nature. Under a screaming headline across the six columns of its front page, the paper ran an article with the significant head "Offener Brief an Stalin" (Open Letter to Stalin). At first glance one might have thought this a rehashing of old and well known phrases along anti-Communist lines. But this was not at all the case. On the contrary, the "Open Letter to Stalin" published in the official organ of the German-American Citizens' League of Illinois is nothing but—an offer of the hand of friendship—friendship to Stalin and Soviet Russia!!

In a short preface, the editor of the paper states that he received this document recently and that he considered carefully whether he ought to print it. Finally, he decided to print it because, as he says, the document contains things "which are of the highest importance for the American citizen." The document is signed by one Bruno Fricke and dated October 22, 1949, without any indication of the town or city of its origin. If one may draw conclusions from the text it was probably written in Germany, obviously by a former Nazi. In the very first paragraph of the Open Letter the author states, addressing himself to Stalin:

"Your intelligence service will tell you who I am. . . . But you could also send a representative of the Tass Agency to identify me. Besides, my person is not at all important in this affair; essential and important and interesting for you is only that I am speaking here as a representative of a great part of my volksgenossen and that it would be good for you to learn the opinion of millions of effective men in Central Europe."

The Open Letter, then continues:

"This sector of the German people, namely the national sector which not only comprises former Nazis but everyone who thinks patriotically — is quantitatively quite noteworthy and qualitatively decisively important. Its components are the front-line-soldiers of both world wars and the present dominant percentage of our youth. Thus, its importance from the purely military point of view becomes clear, and furthermore this is one of the reasons why the opinions of these circles are worthy of consideration by you."

After this short introduction, the writer immediately shows his outspoken Pan-German nationalistic views.

"In view," he continues, "of the imminent third world war, as well as in view of personal considerations, you are naturally very much interested in us Germans. We may be down materially, morally and ethically—nevertheless, and despite the dismemberment of our Fatherland into five German Reich Zones, together with Austria and with the smaller territories that have been taken from us, we remain with eighty million the strongest people on the European continent. Whatever one will tell you, we consider ourselves absolutely as a unity and nobody will drive these ideas from our heads—not for generations to come. . . ."

Speaking of the industrial capacity and the intellectual potential of the Germans, the author then declares:

"I don't need to tell you much concerning these, because the theft of our patents and the carrying off of a number of our scientists by the Yankees, as well as their systematic kidnapping by your men, does not leave any doubt about the fact that you are convinced of the extraordinary importance of our talented human material. It is especially to our scientists and special workers that you owe your recent atomic successes."

In the next paragraph the author approaches his main topic:

"After the 'Herren Allierten' (ironical name for Allies—Ed.) for many years thought they could treat our war potential with contempt—and here the West has acted with particular stupidity—the balance of the world situation after Truman's revelation of the Russian atomic explosion has brought forward Europe's probably decisive role in the future war."

The author speaks of "Europe's probably decisive role" but naturally he means "Germany's." Then he goes on:

"You, Generalissimo Stalin, are probably much more conscious than the civilian governments in Washington, London and Paris that the Western Union as well as the Atlantic Pact are nothing but an organization of military zeros around an Anglo-Saxon One."

Here Herr Bruno Fricke, the writer of the Open Letter, shows his true face. His derogatory opinion of the military capacity of Western Europe seems to coincide with similar opinions expressed by Soviet sympathizers and left-wing radicals all over the world.

"Germany was, is and will remain the heartland of Europe; our army was, is and will remain the picked troops of the Occident! The military men of all enemy nations have known this for a long time, and the politicians finally seem to begin to realize it, a fact which in view of the defective intellectual capacity of these people seems rather remarkable. The courtship has started for the heart and the hand of the German people, and it has found its visible expression in the installation of so-called 'governments' in the Eastern and Western Zones. . ."

The writer of the Open Letter then comes, as he says himself, to the key point of his letter. He complains bitterly of what he calls "the Pieck comedy", and he cannot understand how Stalin has played into the hands of the "Yankees" with the establishment of his Eastern German puppet government. "How is it possible," he asks "that such a highly gifted politician as you who has witnessed recently the ghost dance in Bonn, has permitted immediately the same sort of nonsense in Berlin?"

The writer then ridicules those who might be under the illusion that under these conditions the Germans, in case of war, would be on the side of the Soviets or of the Yankees. He advises Stalin to kick out his German Communist advisers and to rely on "younger people." Writes he: "Be assured (Mr. Stalin) that with the exception of a few professional mercenaries who are to be found in every country, no substantial number of German soldiers will move their little fingers either for Pieck or for Heuss! And even less for their bosses in the East and West!"

But the writer of the Open Letter does give Stalin a chance to win the confidence of the German people. In his opinion it was a great psychological error on the part of Soviet Russia to have taken German territories in the East. He tells Stalin that the 10 million German refugees from the East who went to Western Germany have influenced public opinion against Moscow and in favor of Washington. And he proposes that Stalin correct his mistake in the following manner:

"You may rely on it, Mr. Stalin, that with the rectification of this indefensible and most stupid injustice you could, in an instant, win the hearts of our people—and if you evacuate Germany and restore its sovereignty you can even win back our peoples' fist!"

And now comes the most significant section of the Open Letter. The author does not even try to hide his true feelings; he throws off the mask of certain hypocrites who want to sell us the idea that the Germans love the West and will fight against the East. Here is how he addresses himself to Stalin:

"It is a tragic fact that we national Germans do not want to have anything to do with the West, with the Yankees, with their capitalistic exploitation and their political arrogance. But we are being pushed towards them by your erroneous decisions. We Prussians have always been closely associated with the Russians; we Germans returned gladly to the tradition of Bismarck, of Freiherr von Stein and Maria Theresa, and we politically trained people have not forgotten Lenin's intelligent words about a desired cooperation between Germany and Russia. We are actually predestined for an alliance with Moscow, all the more so since mutual cooperation with the closed bloc of the Soviet states interests us millions of people educated in strict discipline, more than dancing along with the constantly changing representatives of the parliamentary countries of the West."

Here you have it black on white. A frank confession coming straight from the mouth of a Nazi-indoctrinated Pan-German. He hates Western democracy and professes much more sympathy toward the totalitarian Soviet dictatorship! But that is not all. He offers a deal bluntly to Stalin and proposes an alliance between "the Russian force and German intelligence as formulated by Lenin"—in return for the territories in the East.

He wants the restoration of German territories from Memel to Beuthen and adds: "If you, Stalin, do not want or cannot grant free elections, I would even agree to the installment (there) of a dictatorship for the next three years of crisis."

And then comes the highlight of the Open Letter:

"Who could resist us if both our Reichs were united? What Napoleon did not succeed in doing, Truman will not succeed in either—the subjugation of the earth! Socialist Germany and Communist Russia together are invincible and thus our alliance secures the peace of the world."

One should read this paragraph twice in order to realize fully the arrogance of the statement. Not only does Bruno Fricke repeat the well-known propaganda lie of the Kremlin, namely that the United States wants to subjugate the world, but this is by far the clearest indication of how the Neo-Nazis play with the idea of a Russo-German alliance against the West.

It doesn't matter that the writer poses certain conditions to Stalin which at present may look somewhat extravagant. The fact remains that he, obviously speaking for millions of his fellow countrymen, offers an alliance to Stalin, telling him bluntly that the Germans hate and despise the Western democracies. And now read the following paragraphs from Fricke's Open Letter:

"The masses of our people," he writes to Stalin, "are national and socialist to their bones and are therefore the given friend and ally of national and anti-capitalistic Russia; they are also the given enemy of international capitalistic exploitation by Wall Street and its colleagues."

Here again one sees the Moscow propaganda slogans of "Wall Street exploiters" repeated by Neo-Nazi Bruno Fricke. For him and for his fellow Nazis these slogans seem not at all new, for they are exact duplicates of the slogans which Goebbels for years had drummed into the ears of the Germans.

The contents of Bruno Fricke's Open Letter to Stalin and the fact that a leading German language newspaper in the Middle West has seen fit to display his article prominently on its front page, speak for themselves. The ideas expressed in the Open Letter undoubtedly express the feelings of a great majority of the Germans and this should be a warning to our policymakers. The fact remains that the Germans, by their nature and their past and despite some misgivings toward Communism, are inclined to go with Stalin against the West. For those who know the German national character this is not at all surprising, but it seems that some people are under the illusion that the Germans will ever be on our side.

In conclusion, it might be noted that Bruno Fricke's

Open Letter to Stalin is dated October 22. On October 14, Premier Stalin addressed his now famous message to the new Eastern German government, referring to Germany and Russia as countries of "the largest potentialities" for completing "great actions of world significance."

It is apparent that Bruno Fricke's letter, written eight days after Stalin's message, presents some sort of answer in the form of a trial balloon sent up by the Germans. In his message, Stalin bluntly stated that if Germany and Russia became allies there would be peace, for no combination of powers would dare to oppose such a bloc. And this is exactly what Bruno Fricke writes, too.

Concluding his appeal to Stalin, he states:

"Stretch out your hand genuinely to national Germany instead of wooing her only with words. Strike her in the face with deeds, and the compact masses of our 250,000,000 people—even without the 500,000,000 in the Far East—from Kowno, Warsaw, Budapest, Bucharest and Prague to Sofia together will determine the fate of the earth."

". . . Those of us who have known Germany and the Germans for a long time—and my knowledge of that country goes back 60 years, as I went there as a little girl—have a rather long perspective on the character of the German people. They like authority. They have been accustomed to direction and to being told what to do in every phase of their existence. I have never been in a country where the signs are more completely explicit. They do not say, 'Please do not do thus and so'; they say, 'Verboten,' pure and simple.

"As a result of all this, there has grown up in Germany a system of class. Any little government functionary had certain little responsibilities and certain authority. He was looked up to by all his neighbors and as you went higher up he was shown even greater respect by the people. . ."

Maggots On the Nazi Corpse

"Hitler Aides Ruling Bavaria"...."Ex-Nazi Teachers Regain Old Posts"...."Big Ruhr Industries Bid for Their Old Power"...."Press in Bavaria Shows Nazi Trend..."

The series of articles by Drew Middleton published under these headings in The New York Times again focused the spotlight on the renazification of Western Germany. Lord Vansittart, who hits the nail on the head, coined the sentence: "The Germans are getting too much too soon." This is undoubtedly one of the reasons Neo-Nazism is able to rise again. In view of the availability of a tremendous number of facts and figures, it is amazing indeed that some of our officials in Germany, above all John J. McCloy, continue to reassure us that there is no dangerous rising Neo-Nazism in Germany. However, a careful observer must come to the conclusion that quite the contrary is true. Even the German papers themselves, which means the few honest democratic and liberal organs remaining, call attention steadily to this growing danger.

We have before us on our desk hundreds of recent reports from European newspapers; excerpts from privately circulated newsletters and other political analyses. All definitely furnish proof of the cresting wave of Neo-Nazism in one form or another.

The conservative London Daily Telegraph, for example, recently reported that one Hans Seidel has been named representative of the Bizonal Committee for Tourism of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC). The paper adds that this same Herr Seidel, from 1933 until the start of the war, was Director of the Information Offices of the German State Railways in London and one of the leading figures in the London Nazi colony. A few months before the start of the war, Seidel was named Obergruppenfuehrer of all Nazis living in England.

Another British paper, the News Chronicle, points out the existence now in Germany of a new group of persecuted; namely, those who are cooperating with the Allies. Every Nazi or Nazi party member in Germany can find a job more easily today than an anti-Nazi or one who has cooperated with the American, British or French occupational authorities. For instance, all the drivers who had driven allied military cars in past years and who have recently lost their jobs are unable to find positions among their own countrymen. A cold boycott against these Germans is being organized by the Nazis. This boycott movement, according to a statement by a representative of the Joint Export Import Agency, embraces all the storekeepers and dealers who have done business with personnel of the occupation powers. Particularly in the smaller towns, these merchants are now being strongly boycotted.

There can be no doubt that the Neo-Nazis have much money at their disposal. Thousands of letters arrived recently with a Nazi propaganda stamp alongside the regular postal stamp. Nobody knows how this propaganda stamp was pasted on the letter, but the fact remains that such stamps are secretly being put on letters in Western Germany. One such stamp bears the photo of the Cathedral of Strassbourg with the provocative inscription, "Elsass-Lothringen," while another shows the port of Danzig. This subtle propaganda keeps awake the traditional requests for return of these cities and regions to Germany. Similar stamps can be seen on house walls all over Western Germany.

Everyone knows that the German national anthem, "Deutschland, Deutschland Ueber Alles," expresses the hopes of Pan-German ideology. After all that has happened one would think that the Germans themselves would wish to forget the provocative lines of this national anthem.

A newspaper in Duesseldorf recently asked its readers: "Should we sing again Deutschland, Deutschland ueber Alles?" Sixty per cent said yes; twenty per cent were undecided and only twenty per cent rejected it. Significant of the mentality of those still fervently in favor of the Deutschland anthem is the text of a letter in which a reader stated:

"'Deutschland ueber Alles' is an appeal to the Allies to take into consideration at the conclusion of the Peace Treaty a just re-establishment of Germany's former borders in order to win a real peace."

Speaking of polls, American papers recently published an Associated Press dispatch from Frankfurt emphasizing that in a recent poll 60.2 per cent of the Germans questioned declared that they wanted no more military service under any conditions. The poll was conducted in the three Western Zones by the Institute for Market Research and Observation and the results were pointed out as an alleged opposition of the Germans to military service.

But the London Daily Mail gives quite different results of a similar poll taken in the British Zone of Germany. The results of this poll, made among young Germans, contradict the poll of the Institute for Market Research. The question asked was, "Would you welcome the establishment of a new army if Germany should be invited to do so under the terms of the Atlantic Pact and the provision of a West European Army?" The result showed that an average of three out of every four polled are in favor of building another German war machine immediately. The most positive response, according to the survey, came from youths aged 20 to 24.

The Swiss newspaper, St. Galler Tageblatt, in a recent article, calls attention to homework done by pupils in a public school in Luthe near Hannover. Here are some excerpts of what the children wrote:

"We Germans would have almost won the war if it wouldn't have been for a few of our countrymen who deserted to the British, Russians and French and have stabbed us in the back. I have read it myself in the paper."

"Our soldiers in 1942 were already in Stalingrad. They were thrown back by the Russians because they had not enough weapons. If they would have gotten enough weapons, Russia would have lost. In the West we lost the war only because of a great amount of treason. Germany had enough soldiers, but the soldiers did not get enough munitions on the front. The officers destroyed the slips on which the soldiers asked for weapons."

"We lost through treason. Had we not listened to the British and fought two more weeks we would have won the war."

The teacher responsible for that particular school, one Dr. Franz Richter, was dismissed, but he was elected as Deputy of the Deutsche Rechts Partei to the Bonn Parliament.

Speaking of the Deutsche Rechts Partei, which more and more develops into a rallying point for Neo-Nazis, it is interesting to quote from a speech made by one of its leading members, Heinz Burgwald, in Flensburg. Praising the advantages Nazism brought to the Germans, he said: "National socialism has given us something precious; namely, the consciousness of being able to live in an active peoples' community." According to the speaker, Nazism, besides its "excellent social and economic policy" has been able to produce an "irresistible energy" some of which "we could use right now at the formulation of our Reich."

Among the many small Neo-Nazi groups which are mushrooming all over Western Germany, there is one which calls itself "Vereinigte Deutsch-Soziale Arbeiter Partei." One of its leaders, Arthur Giese, at a meeting in Hannover, declared bluntly that "with the exception of the dictatorship and the anti-Semitism, the program of the Nazi Party was not bad at all."

There is another such small Neo-Nazi party which calls itself "Vaterlandische Union" and whose founder is a certain Karl Feitenhansel of Munich. The main-point of his program is re-establishment of the German Wehrmacht. He furthermore demands that "All Germans from the Maas to the Memel should be reunited." He claims that his party has 25,000 members already and he soon expects his union to become much more popular due to the fact that one of the main points of his program is a fight "against the defamation of the German soldier."

Such incidents, and in particular such small groups and organizations, are not only significant of the general trend but also highly dangerous. It seems that what happened after the first world war is being reenacted in every detail. The tone of certain Germans becomes more insolent with each passing day and this goes not only for small rabble-rousers but also for dignified politicians. A member of the Boon Parliament and representative of the Deutsche Rechts Partei, Deputy Adolph von Thadden, the other day shouted during a debate, "We have now long enough run behind the French and I think it is bad policy to address continuously declarations of love to them."

Similar language was used by Hans Giessen, Chairman of the Otto Strasser movement in Duesseldorf. This group of friends of Strasser's had planned a big rally to be held January 27th, but this meeting has been prohibited by the British authorities. Whereupon Herr Giessen made the following statement:

"I consider myself as a German justified to propagandize the ideas of my comrade Otto Strasser and I don't care at all if the British authorities like it or not and I will do so even at the risk that the High Commission prosecutes me as a politically undesirable. My comrades and I have prepared everything, whatever one will do against us. Ten thousand strong fellow-combatants are at our disposal."

The latest trick of Neo-Nazis to circumvent repressive measures against them is the founding of fraternity groups with harmless sounding names. In Stuttgart in particular an epidemic of such fraternities is spreading. First the former leaders of the Hitler Youth came together and founded such a group. Then the air-borne troops of the Wehrmacht organized one.

Now the former Chiefs of the Nazi Labor Service have founded such a fraternity in honor of their former boss, Konstantin Hierl, who has recently been denazified.

It is practically impossible to keep track of these innumerable small splinter groups and clubs, but all have one goal in common—to spread the ideological gospel of Neo-Nazism.

While Mr. McCloy himself tends to discount the menace of the new groupings it is interesting to note that the Neue Zeitung, the official German language newspaper in Germany, recently published a special article on Neo-Nazism in which one of the paper's top German commentators wrote:

"There can be no doubt that the return of a new political 'Messiah' would be the signal for a coalition and drive to power of Germany's right-wing, including those forces still operating underground. A Fuehrer is needed —but he is all that is needed—to fuse the forces of Nazism and Neo-Nazism into a new crusade for the rule of Germany."

The "People's Police" in Eastern Germany—and what is really behind this new "Red Wehrmacht"

In his book, Moscow Dateline, former Associated Press correspondent Henry Cassidy relates a significant episode which took place on Easter Sunday, 1941, shortly before Hitler's armies invaded Russia. The Stalin-Hitler Pact was still in force, but the honeymoon was over and relations were already somewhat strained. Generalissimo Stalin had come to the railway station to bid farewell to Japanese Foreign Minister Matsuoka.

"He walked around . . . (writes Cassidy) shaking hands on all sides, and then looked up as though seeking someone. He selected a German officer, Colonel Hans Krebs, one of the many standing stiffly at attention in their long grey coats, and approached him. Stalin peered up sharply at the officer's face, and asked twice: 'German? German?'

" 'Yes, sir,' the officer said, saluting.

"Stalin shook his hand, 'We shall be friends. . .' "

According to Cassidy, at that time this episode caused some eyebrow-lifting and many people wondered why Stalin should have picked out a German officer in the farewell groups and expressed to him his friendship for the Germans.

This significant episode did not come as a surprise to those who had been carefully following Russo-German relations. Neither was Stalin's unusual statement at the height of the Battle of Stalingrad surprising, when he said that "Hitlers come and go, but the German people, the German state will remain." Only naive persons or wishful thinkers could minimize or overlook the importance of this statement. How cleverly the Soviet leader, at a time when the fortunes of war were against him, started to plan his future policy toward Germany can be seen today. After Stalin's congratulatory message to the leaders of the Eastern German Republic was made public, the green light was given to an all out campaign to show the German people that Stalin and the Russians —contrary to the Western Allies—had never lost faith in the Germans, even during the war.

We have before us a large number of German newspapers of recent date published in the Russian Zone. Every editorial dealing with Russo-German relations stresses the point that Stalin has always stretched out his hand to the Germans and that "Hitler's come and go. . ." This and many other similar statements are published as "proof." Some of these papers have established a regular column under the heading: "Soviet Russia is the best friend of the German people." Others recall that back in 1922 the Leningrad Pravda stated after the signing of the Rapallo Pact:

"We know that the time will come when the Soviet Union together with a Soviet Germany will form a great socialist and economic bloc, a bloc hard as iron, hard as granite on which the capitalists of the whole world will break their necks."

Against the perspective of these quotations, the present Soviet policy towards Germany can be understood. This policy of wooing the Germans shows once again the duplicity of the Soviets. Hector McNeil, the British Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, in a speech before the UN the other day, said that the Soviets are always accusing the Western powers of something they themselves have either been doing for some time secretly or preparing to do in order to have an alibi.

In democratic countries like the United States, Britain and France, the free press and those politicians and civic leaders who are opposed to certain aspects of policy say so openly and criticize and attack their government. The issue of permitting Nazis into key jobs in the Western Zones; the issue of rearmament, etc., are under steady attack in the Western countries by those who think that such a policy is unwise and dangerous. In the Soviet Union and in the satellite countries there is no free press and no opposition and the very fact that the Russians are going all out to woo the Nazis is completely unknown to the Russian people.

For instance, nobody in Russia knows that on November 9, 1949, the Soviet-sponsored Eastern German Republic, with special permission of the Soviet military authorities, has passed a law of complete amnesty for all the Nazis and officers of the German Wehrmacht. In the Russian Zone every Nazi and every former German officer can again vote, compete for public office, or resume his former profession or trade without any restriction.

This complete amnesty is being presented in Berlin as a triumph of the so-called National Democratic Party. It is well-known that this National Democratic Party is sponsored by the Russians for the purpose of becoming a rallying point for all former Nazis and members of the Wehrmacht who do not want to join the SED (Socialist Communist Unity Party). The Russian-controlled Berlin papers especially stressed the point that the amnesty had been suggested by Vincenz Mueller, former Major General and the present Deputy Chairman of the National Democratic Party, who once belonged to the Moscow Free German Committee. Under the slogan of a National Front, Mueller had for many months, under the very eyes of the Soviet occupation authorities, led a vigorous campaign for amnesty of the Nazis. Finally he drafted a 10-point proposal in which he significantly stated that "the National Front must unite across all zonal borders, all Germans of good will from old antifascists to former members of the Nazi Party."

We have before us the November 10 issue of the Taegliche Rundschau, official organ of the Soviet military authorities, whose chief editor is the Russian General A. W. Kirsanov. In a screaming 5-column headline across the front page the paper proclaims the "equalization of the former members of the Nazi Party." A front page editorial deals pathetically with that "end of a phase." It eulogizes the amnesty as "a necessary end of the darkest and shadiest chapter of German history: of Nazism." The editorial emphasizes that the amnesty "eliminates the line of separation that existed until now and which separated the German people into 'tainted and untainted.' "

Jubilantly the editorial proclaims that the new "law gives to all former members of the Nazi Party and to all former officers whose conscience is not burdened with a crime the same chances and possibilities as all other citizens." Furthermore, the editorial proclaims hypocritically, "these former Nazis and officers (who have remained in the Eastern Zone and have found a new existence there rather than move to Western Germany) have nothing more to do with the Nazi criminals by whom they once were seduced and deluded."

Here you have again a typical sample of Soviet action. Those Nazis who have remained in the Eastern Zone; who have joined the National Democratic Party and who work for a Russo-German alliance—are now honorable democrats while those who live in the Western Zone are still criminals!

The amnesty of the Nazis is being hailed all over Eastern Germany as a "turning point of German history." Walter Ulbricht, the real Communist boss of the Eastern Zone, according to the Nachtexpress, openly declares: "Since the end of the Hitler government many people who once were active Nazis have changed their former opinions. Even when these former Nazis have not yet completely accomplished this change, neverthe- less they see today clearly that the German nation is to be destroyed through the aggressiveness of the United States."

And Ulbricht adds: "In view of this menacing danger for the entire German people we can no longer look into the former party membership of people but we have to ask ourselves if they have the sincere will to work hand in glove with every nationally conscious German who wishes a united nation, a just peace and a final retreat of the occupation troops."

Western European observers consider this continuous appeal to the worst nationalist elements as extremely dangerous. They point out that the Kremlin's German policy has definitely passed the theoretical stage and that it has entered a new phase. In this connection attention must be called to another editorial, this one published in the Communist Berliner Zeitung. This editorial is titled "1922 and 1949." The editorial states that once again a hand is being stretched out to the German people. The new German Eastern government has decided to re-establish the policy of Rapallo on a much higher level and to conduct it to a happy end. The Rapallo policy in all Zones is the task of all Germans who love their Fatherland.

Everyone knows how dear to the heart of all Germans are their national songs. The new national anthem which was timed with the creation of the new Eastern German Republic has been written by two German Communists, Johannes R. Becher and Hanns Eisler. It is true the lyrics of this new national anthem speak of the wish that the beautiful sun shine again as never before over Germany; that happiness and peace should be given the Fatherland, etc., but in the midst of these sentimental words there are a few lines which have quite an aggressive character. It says, "When brotherly we are united, we will defeat the enemy of our people. . ." The question arises who the "enemy" is? The current propaganda slogan, "Never again against the Soviet Union," leaves no doubt as to whom these Germans mean when they speak of the "enemy." In other words, instead of "Deutschland ueber Alles," the new Communist-inspired national anthem implies that the Western Powers are the enemy and have to be crushed!!

Hand in glove with this subtle anti-Western propaganda, an outspoken hate-campaign against the Western Powers is openly fostered by the Germans. Neues Deutschland, for instance, published an editorial the other day which sarcastically stated that "Germany's cities are not yet sufficiently destroyed. They must be ruined still more radically. Still more children and mothers must be killed by American bombs. . ."

This propaganda emanates from the very same building which once housed Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry. The building has been restored and its tenant now is Propaganda Minister Gerhard Eisler, commonly called the "Red Goebbels." The Nazis, big and small, and the former officers and generals of Hitler's Wehrmacht, must be particularly pleased because from the very same offices they hear at present an echo of the very same anti-Western hate slogans that they heard once before coming from Goebbels' lips.

Once again the "pluto-democracies of the West" are being smeared. Landrum Bolling, in a dispatch to the Overseas News Agency, reports that Gerhard Eisler is "grinding out propaganda against the West, especially against the United States." Another ONA correspondent Ernest Leiser, in his dispatches emphasizes that "the Russians and their Communist German supporters have been hammering away at the theme that, while the Soviet Army and airforces attacked only 'military targets' in Germany during World War II, the 'Anglo-American imperialists' concentrated instead on the 'deliberate slaughter of women and children, calculatedly seeking to destroy urban areas and industry to eliminate future competition' . . ." And Leiser adds:

"This propaganda is not without its effect in both the Eastern and the Western parts of divided Germany, since the Germans, forgetting their own 'deliberate slaughter' of the populations in Warsaw and Rotterdam, are bitterly and constantly reminded of Allied air raids by the ruin of all their major cities."

This whole aspect of Russian policy in Germany, with its special features of amnesty for the Nazis, combined with the stirring up of anti-Western hate among the Germans, is being undertaken with a clever psychological trick in mind. The idea is to hide behind these moves the continuously growing remilitarization of Eastern Germany. This process of remilitarization has been going on more or less secretly for the past six months, but in the last few weeks it has taken forms of an extreme and outspokenly dangerous character.

As Landrum Bolling rightly stated in one of his dispatches to the ONA, "The development of the East German people's police now being rapidly expanded under Soviet instruction is waking an ominous ghost and conjuring up fresh perils to the peace and sanity of Germany and Europe."

In this connection it might be worthwhile to quote from a report published in The Times of London on November 23. As is well known, The Times is one of the finest newspapers in the world and has a reputation for calm and objective reporting. The story of The Times comes from its Berlin correspondent and contains hitherto unknown facts:

"Information available here makes clearer than ever the military nature of the Bereitschaften, the special units of the 'people's police' of the Soviet Zone of Germany. About 35 of these formations are now known to exist. They are stationed in barracks in the larger towns and in strategic areas of the zone, and it is believed that the intention is to increase their number to 50. It is also known that the establishment of each Bereitschaft, which last summer was only 250, has been increased to 1,200 including about 200 men assigned to special duties.

"This increase is regarded here as showing an obvious intention to place the Bereitschaften on a more practical military basis, although so far few of the units have been brought up to the full strength of 1,200. At present the units do not carry out any ordinary police duties and appear to be exclusively engaged in training. There is every indication that each unit is being formed into a compact body under military training and discipline, and that the whole organization, with its ultimate strength of 60,000, could, like the army of 100,000 allowed the Weimar Republic, form the cadre of a considerable military force. . .

"Control of the Bereitschaften lies with a department for training (Verwaltung fuer Schulung), which has four main branches—training, political indoctrination (Politkultur), general staff duties, and supply. These branches are staffed by former German generals and veterans of the Spanish civil war, all of them specialists with wide experience. . .

"The standard equipment is light and heavy machine-guns, mortars, infantry guns, sub-machine-guns, rifles, and entrenching tools. Recently an effort has been made to standardize equipment, and weapons of Czechoslovak, Russian, and Polish manufacture have been replaced by old German stock. . .

"Students are also being offered police commissions and former members of the Wehrmacht, especially with specialist qualifications, have been asked to register. The first Bereitschaften were formed in September, 1948, and a large number of prisoners of war who had received special training in Russia were drafted into them. . ."

Other European observers report that the drill of the people's police cadres recalls the old traditional Prussian military drill. The close-order commands are the same. "Die Augen links! . . . Das Gewehr ueber!" (Eyes left . . . shoulder arms.) Time Magazine's Berlin correspondent quotes a young German soldier as saying, after he came from such a people's police training session: "Damn it. You feel like a man again when you hear those commands! You say to yourself 'Pull yourself together, get it right.' I am not a Communist but this Army is the only life today."

The reports that the people's police has adopted a plan for the gradual introduction of conscription by the spring of 1950 should not be surprising. The conscription would, according to a report of the official American newspaper Neue Zeitung of Munich, affect each German resident of 20 to 25 years who is unemployed or not working on the two-year plan. These reports are being confirmed in Western European circles and it is added that the Russians are intensifying their German military training plan with the objective of having the East German militia at its peak strength by late spring or early summer of 1950.

It fits perfectly into this picture that the Soviets are promising the Germans in a hush-hush way certain territory compensations in the West. According to a report by Georges Blun, the excellent and usually reliable Berlin correspondent of the Parisian daily, Le Monde, the nationalistic Germans are being given the assurance that Soviet Russia will, some future day, sustain German demands for the Saar and even for Alsace-Lorraine!

E.T.

LEAVE IT TO JOHN J. McCLOY

Recently, we received a letter from a prominent American criticizing John J. McCloy for freeing sixty leading German war criminals. This indignant citizen declared that it was his opinion that "if Hitler were alive today it would be logical for McCloy to free him too. I say this," wrote our correspondent, "because the criminals who were pardoned were key figures in the Nazi regime and there is no essential difference between the crimes they committed and those perpetrated by Hitler himself."

His letter reasoned as follows:

"For example, Georg von Schnitzler, who was a leading bigwig in the I. G. Farben chemical empire, participated in the plundering and despoiling of Nazi occupied countries. Hitler would have also been convicted on that count.

"Take the case of Emil Puhl who was a director of Hitler's Reichsbank. In cooperation with the Reichsbank, Puhl turned into war cash the gold teeth and jewelry taken from slaughtered concentration camp inmates and gas chamber victims. For, this he was convicted of atrocities against civilian populations. Hitler, too, was a party to these crimes and would have been convicted on that count.

"Or take the case of Karl Hallidt, a member of the German General Staff. He was charged with having been one of the planners of the Polish and Yugoslav invasions and was convicted of atrocities against war prisoners and conquered civilian populations. Hitler, too, was a key figure in the planning of these invasions and the atrocities subsequently committed.

"In addition, we learn that McCloy has freed a group of criminals who were found guilty of cruelty to American fliers and concentration camp inmates. Now Hitler was also a participant in this kind of atrocity and therefore would also have been found guilty."

This is indeed a very harsh judgment against Mr. McCloy. Our correspondent seems to assume that the action taken by the American High Commissioner was motivated by other than humanitarian feelings.

Certainly Mr. McCloy is not one who would let such criminals off easily. This is indicated by a Times dispatch from Frankfurt, December 19th, in which it was reported that these criminals "may be returned to serve out their terms for any new misconduct." This is a sharp warning to von Schnitzler that if he again resumes his role as an espionage agent for I. G. Farben against the United States and participates in renewed attempts to plunder other nations, John J. McCloy will return him to jail to serve out his sentence.

Likewise, this serves as a warning to Dr. Puhl that if he resumes his quaint hobby of extracting the gold teeth of new victims, John J. McCloy guarantees that Puhl will be arrested at once.

In the case of General Hallidt, Mr. McCloy's warning applies equally. Should this German General be found planning new invasions of Poland and Yugoslavia, he would immediately be carted off to jail.

The criminals who committed atrocities against American fliers would of course be put into prison at once, should they participate in crimes of a similar nature. Thus the American people can relax, knowing that Mr. McCloy will exercise extreme vigilance in the future regarding these criminals.

Very thoughtful of Mr. McCloy. . . .

Consequently, does it not appear that our friend's criticisms are somewhat exaggerated?

To be sure none of these criminals upset or embarrassed the cartel plans of Mr. McCloy's friends or their German counterparts. Is it, therefore, not logical that Mr. McCloy should show his charity and leniency?

WHY has Mathilde Ludendorff, widow of the World War I German Field Marshall and co-founder of the Nazi Party, been permitted recently to hold unlicensed meetings of her so-called Tannenberg Bund in the American zone despite the fact that her organization is devoted to spreading anti-Semitism and chauvinistic nationalism?

Champions of Free Enterprise?

JEAN PAJUS
Part Two

ON HUMAN STUPIDITY

A prominent American educator published some years ago a book titled "History of Human Stupidity." In it, the author attempted to show that the history of humanity is one of stupidity. The latest reports reaching us from Western Europe seem to corroborate the findings of this learned man.

It is hard to believe these reports for they read exactly as if they were written 30 years ago. Briefly, they tell of secret meetings now going on between the steel interests of Germany, France, Luxembourg and the Saar for the purpose of making a new international steel cartel. These interests seem to be in a great hurry to conclude their private agreements lest the people learn about them and lest the International Ruhr Authority, established on December 28, 1948, becomes effective.

One stands aghast at these goings-on. They bring to mind the immediate post-war era of World War I. France's dead were scarcely buried when Louis Loucheur, French Minister of Reconstruction, was bargaining with the Germans to form an international cartel.

The bargain was finally concluded and the link was forged which later enabled Hitler to rearm Germany for aggressive purposes. As the pages of the inter-war period unfolded, the results of these deals conclusively showed that Germany's partners were duped, because the cartels they entered into became a weapon of German diplomatic aggression, economic penetration, and, finally, ruthless warfare. The victims were France, Belgium, Luxembourg and others.

A few months ago, when the establishment of the Adenauer government was greeted with unstinted praise as one embodying the true spirit of free enterprise, we made an analysis of Germany's industrial history—iron and coal—and we showed that for a period of 100 years, those industries never applied the principles of free enterprise. It was also pointed out that the free enterprise system cannot thrive under the new Chancellor Adenauer, because he is the personal representative of the Ruhr heavy industry. We did not expect, however, that events would bear us out so quickly. Yet that is exactly what happened. Early in November of 1949, Adenauer sent a message to his neighbors urging them to establish the international steel cartel embracing the Ruhr, France, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Saar. We are still waiting for an explanation from the press which was so lavish with praise for Adenauer's devotion to free enterprise!

And while we are waiting, we think it appropriate to take a look at Adenauer's outstretched hand—the German steel industry. Let these French, Belgians and Luxembourgers who are so eager to seize this hand take a good look at it and see for themselves what is hidden in it.

How much free enterprise existed in the German steel enterprise? Did it play fair with the German people? What was its contribution to the peace and security of the world? What does it have in store for its neighbors?

The German steel industry has been dominated for years by a small oligarchy of industrialists sitting on top of a few holding companies with interlocking directorates and cartel arrangements. The industrialists heading these giant combines have been the financial and, to a considerable degree, the political masters of Germany under the Kaiser, the Weimar Republic, and the Third Reich, feeding upon government contracts while constantly driving for war and spearheading Germany's economic domination of France, Belgium, Luxembourg, Austria, Czechoslovakia and the Balkans. The iron and steel industry has been concentrated in a few concerns which saw to it that the government foster laws favorable to them—at the expense of the German people. The policies of the German government were framed by them, aided and abetted by their friends in the international cartels. This concentration has facilitated the all inclusive domestic cartelization of the industry to the point where approximately 300 cartels regimented Germany's steel and iron industry at the outbreak of World War II. By 1942 there was not a single segment of the German steel industry that was not cartelized.

THE BACKGROUND

The origin of the steel cartel dates back to the 19th century. Prior to the unification of Germany under Bismarck, depressed economic and political conditions precluded the possibility of a strong centralized steel industry such as was then developing in the U. S. and England. However, under the Empire, events conspired to favor the rapid growth of the German industry. This was particularly due to the harsh peace terms imposed upon the French by Bismarck when Germany acquired Lorraine with its huge iron ore reserves. Another factor was the discovery in the late 1870's of the Thomas (basic Bessemer) process which permitted the utilization of Lorraine's high phosphorous content ores.

Germany's industrial development was very rapid. This was due principally to her armament programs, protective tariffs and the overall expansion of world trade prior to 1913. This period also witnessed the rapid development of selling associations and cartels, with the resulting establishment of vertical integration of Germany's large firms. Outstanding examples of this development were the Krupp and Thyssen firms. The Krupp firm was the first to realize the political and commercial advantages of acquiring adequate raw material supplies. Accordingly, it proceeded to acquire large holdings in the coal, iron, steel, fabricating, engineering and armament industries. Through political influence, which has been a potent factor in the Krupp progress, potential armament competitors were bought up or frozen out.

August Thyssen started his expansion in the 70's with rolling and tube mills. Later he acquired coal and iron mines and constructed the famous Thyssen Hutte at Duisburg which, in 1929, became a part of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke.

Unlike the cartel development in the coal industry which began as early as 1842, the steel cartels began their development much later. The impetus was provided by the huge coal cartel R. W. K. S. The establishment of this cartel in 1893 was the result of the efforts of Emil Kirdorf. He was the first to conceive the idea of acquiring the power to dictate the price policy of coal and coke industries. The syndicate included all coal mines not owned by the iron and steel producers and was therefore in a position to stabilize the prices at a profitably high level. Naturally, the steel producers resented Kirdorf's prices and began acquiring coal mines.

Since Kirdorf was unable to impose his prices on coal mined by the steel producers, he saw his own coal cartel threatened. As a result, he was forced to extend his interests to include iron and steel mills in order to provide a ready market for his coal output.

Eleven years later, in 1904, a sufficient number of iron and steel combines existed to cartelize this industry. Although prior to that period cartels for semi-finished and finished products had been organized, they were ineffective, small, and were little more than sales organizations authorized to regulate prices in marketing conditions.

THE GERMAN PEOPLE PAY THE PRICE

In 1904, the Stahlwerksverband, the top producers' cartel was established and the principal role was played by Kirdorf. This cartel provided for production quotas and for a two-priced policy:

(1) low export or dumping prices to establish a world market for surplus production against foreign competition and

(2) high monopoly domestic prices supported by the government and protective tariffs.

The first losers were the German people.

Two years later, a series of moves was launched to incorporate related industries such as transportation, navigation and public utilities. Simultaneously, a movement was set afoot to acquire foreign assets and to organize foreign subsidies. It was during this period that big banks first invaded the industry by arranging loans to the larger companies, thereby strengthening their position in the heavy industry.

By 1910, Kirdorf felt that a reorganization of the steel industry was necessary. He felt that the German steel production should be further expanded in order to beat its foreign competitors. By 1913, Germany's steel production reached 17½ million tons—second only to that of the United States. Although Germany was then preparing for war, which the steel industry helped to unleash, the steelmasters were most anxious to push their sales abroad. Thus, despite the Reich's heavy rearmament program, Germany exported approximately one-third of her total production. This clearly shows the policy, which became much more pronounced later, of developing capacity well beyond domestic demands and of building up export markets to compete with, or to prevent the growth of, the home industries in other countries.

GERMANY'S NEIGHBORS PAY THE PRICE

The net result was that Germany's neighbors found themselves in a distinctly inferior industrial position. These countries were left at the mercy of the German steel production. The results of this policy were clearly shown during the first months of World War I, when Germany's victims did not have the wherewithal to resist Germany's aggression. On the other hand, the fully developed resources of Germany's coal, iron and steel industries, enabled the Kaiser to enter the war fully supported by the strength of a unified and coordinated heavy industry, led by Krupp, Kirdorf, Thyssen, Poensgen and Reusch, who were well prepared to effect a more rapid conversion to war production than their prospective victims.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT

As was to be expected, the Kaiser's government was duly grateful to the German industrialists for their contribution to its preparedness program. On the other hand, the German heavy industry regarded the government and the military class as its ally in future expansion.

The same German characteristics that respected large armies saw nothing inherently wrong in the regimentation of industry either by cartels or by trusts. Indeed, the German industrialists could point with pride to the tremendous growth before World War I as compared with that of Britain. The following figures will show why no criticism availed.

PRODUCTION

Figures in millions of tons

	Pig-Iron		Crude Steel

Dr. Alfred Hugenberg, Chairman of Krupp (later Minister in the first Hitler cabinet) was an ardent Pan-Germanist eager to use every available means for the intensive propaganda in support of his schemes for the annexation of Belgium, Luxembourg and Lorraine. Hugo Stinnes, one of the biggest post-war I profiteers, was equally active in the exploitation of occupied territories, persuading Germany's major industrialists to combine for the utilization of Belgian plants, the transfer of machines to Germany, and the use of forced foreign labor.

August Thyssen and the Roechling brothers who had heavy interests in the French heavy industry, with the aid of French collaborationists, utilized their French holdings to aid the Pan-German movement. But seemingly all these facts were completely ignored after Germany's defeat in World War I, and are still being ignored today.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY RECOVERS HER LOSSES OF WORLD WAR I

Germany's heavy industry suffered a heavy blow after World War I. Under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany ceded 80% of its iron ore, 40% of the pig iron, and 35% of its ingot capacity. Lorraine was returned to France. The Saar with its coal fields and plants was held by France for 15 years. Luxembourg, representing heavy German financial and industrial interests, was temporarily removed from the German economic sphere. By 1920, the German steel production had dropped to 9.2 million tons and a further loss of German steel capacity was sustained in 1922 when a major segment of Upper Silesia was ceded to Poland after the Plebiscite.

However, the German industrialists did not concede defeat. They began a campaign to show the German people, as well as the world outside, that the iron and steel concerns were the core of stability essential to the economic recovery of Germany. This propaganda succeeded. The Weimar government proceeded to make huge indemnities to the iron and steel industry in order to compensate them for their investments lost under the Versailles Treaty. In addition, millions were paid to these industries to construct new facilities in Germany. With one huge backlog of war profits and government indemnities, and assisted by the spectacular inflation which prevailed in the early 20's, which created an abnormal demand for cheap German exports, the iron and steel industry rapidly replaced the obsolete and worn-out equipment ceded to the Allies with large modern plants, so much so, that by 1922 the German steel industry had recovered sufficiently to account for 21% of the world's steel production.

The inflationary period in the 1920's favored the big concerns, particularly the vertical trusts, the number and importance of which greatly increased.

THE REPUBLIC DID NOTHING TO CURB THE POWER OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY

Thus it can be seen that within a few years of the Weimar rule, the big industrialists who had been the economic collaborators of the pre-war militarists, were as powerful as ever. As early as 1923, a Law was passed "Against the Misuse of Economic Power" which aimed at restricting the activities of cartels and syndicates. This Law prescribed that all agreements regulating supplies and prices were to be written, giving the Reich Minister for Economic Affairs the right to appeal to the Court against any such agreements deemed by him to be contrary to the public interest.

If the appeal was upheld the Court could declare the agreement null and void. In practice, however, the results were quite different from those intended by the Law. Moreover, by enacting a cartel law, further legal recognition was automatically given to cartels. Most of the cases which came before the Court concerned the right of parties to secede from cartels, and most of these, again, were settled in preliminary arbitration proceedings.

The record of the Court proceedings shows that the arbitrators were extremely mindful of the cartel interests and not inclined to leniency to the recalcitrant members.

THE REORGANIZED CARTELS

By 1924, the steel industry felt that a reorganization of its cartel system was necessary. On November 1, 1924, the Rohstahlgemeinschaft was established to regulate production. All the members had to report their orders to the cartel, but no attempt was made to achieve a more direct control of prices or sales, this being the function of the subsidiary syndicates.

Thus the efforts of the German government to control the cartels came to naught and the iron and steel combines kept growing in size. Stinnes, who lost heavily in Lorraine, Luxembourg and the Saar areas, successfully negotiated a 30 year contract with the eagerly cooperative French ore interests. As early as 1920, he succeeded in forming the Rhein-Elbe-Union combine. The establishment of this group of basic industries dominated by Stinnes exerted a powerful political influence on the Weimar Republic, and any proposed government action inimical to Stinnes' interests or to their foreign affiliates, was immediately stopped. During the inflation period, Stinnes, with the backing of bankers, expanded into almost every line of industry in Germany, and the foreign interests of Rhein-Elbe-Union grew worldwide. In addition, Stinnes succeeded in acquiring the Alpine Montan Company—the richest ore deposits in Austria.

Similarly, the Thyssen interests which lost heavily under the Versailles Treaty, came back fast. Prior to World War I, Thyssen had acquired iron ore mines in Normandy, and with the help of French interests, constructed steel works at Caen. Although the French were anxious to resume their pre-war relations, Thyssen decided to concentrate on building up his empire in the Ruhr. It was Thyssen who supported Hitler and became most active in rallying the German industrialists to the latter's cause.

The early 20's saw a strong rapprochement between the German and French iron and steel producers. Most active were the Roechling interests which controlled mines and blast furnaces in Lorraine, steel works in the Saar, as well as widespread interests in Germany.

Hermann Roechling was the foremost opponent of the Saar occupation between 1920 and 1935. Despite his pronounced anti-French sentiments, even before the Versailles Treaty was signed, Roechling was able to gain the cooperation of the French interests. Joint sales agencies were established by Franco-German interests.

Special mention must be made of the establishment of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. The successful floating of the Dawes Plan in 1923 was used by the German industrialists for the purpose of enticing foreign capital into their country. The steel industry took ample advantage of American liberality to merge four large complexes: the Rhein-Elbe-Union (Stinnes), the Phoenix (Otto Wolff), the Thyssen group, and the Rheinische Stahlwerke, largely controlled by I. G. Farben. American money made the establishment of this super-combine possible. In 1926, this super-combine represented more than 50% of the then existing steel industry. The money was provided by a $125,000,000 bond issue floated by Dillon, Read & Company. Although publicized as a sound investment in view of its assured future position, trade circles in the U. S. regarded the merger with apprehension and feared not only competition in world markets, but invasion of domestic markets as well.

AND THAT IS EXACTLY WHAT HAPPENED

Strengthened by the establishment of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke, the German industrialists became powerful enough to force their foreign competitors into joining the international steel cartel, with Ernest Poensgan, Fritz Thyssen and Albert Voegler, all of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke and most active in its founding.

The Vereinigte Stahlwerke represented the entire German steel industry in the international steel cartel and dominated it ever since its founding. During the Nazi regime, it spoke and acted for the government not only at the headquarters of the steel cartel—Luxembourg—but in all foreign countries.

The foreign agencies of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke gathered intelligence for the government and collected funds for its political activities. To the coordinating center of this international network in Duesseldorf flowed a steady stream of political and economic intelligence from all parts of the world. The Vereinigte Stahlwerke agencies abroad, on their part, acted as centers for the distribution of Nazi propaganda.

Although Britain at first refused to join the steel cartel, it succumbed in 1935. By 1938, the U. S. steel interests became a party to it. With the establishment of the international steel cartel, the German steel industry acquired its dominant world position. World War II showed what the German steel industry's contribution to Hitler's war machine was.

CAN GERMANY PRODUCE STEEL CHEAPER?

It is frequently asserted that Germany produced steel cheaper than her neighbors. This too is one of the myths popularized by German propaganda. Not only were the Germans not able to produce steel cheaper than their neighbors, but the German government itself in 1930, after an extensive investigation of the German industry, flatly declared that the depression in 1930 was the result of the German corporate structure of large combines and their monopolistic power over the domestic market.

The following table shows the domestic and foreign prices, and explains how the German steel industry succeeded in acquiring the industrial dominance over Europe:

Product	End of Year	Home Market F.O.B. Ruhr	Export Market F.O.B. Antwerp
		(Prices per Metric Ton in Gold Marks)
Semi-Finished Steel Billets	1929	119.0	90.0
Semi-finished Sheet Bars	1929	124.0	93.0
Finished Steel Bars	1929	141.0	105.0
Finished Steel Joists	1929	138.0	89.0

It will be noticed that even in 1929, when business was extremely good and there was an international cartel in force to check excessive competition, German export prices were on an average of 27% lower than home prices. By 1932, export prices were less than 45% of export prices in 1929.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY UNDER THE NAZIS

The steel industry was the first to benefit from the Nazi regime which it helped to establish. It was the first to take advantage of Hitler's rearmament program. One of the first enactments of the Nazi government was the exemption from taxation of all income spent on replacement of capital equipment. This inducement to install modern equipment became a major factor in the conversion of production facilities to the requirement of the armament program. Under the Weimar regime, the German industrialists enjoyed government subsidies for the erection inside Germany of the plants to replace those lost in ceded territories, and had been kept busy by a home market bolstered by lavish spending and reckless borrowing abroad. Under the Hitler regime, rearmament took the place of public works and the general standard of living was not allowed to recover from the low level to which it had been forced by Bruening's emergency decrees.

Thus crude steel production, which had been as low as 5,770,000 metric tons in 1932, rose to 19,208,000 by 1936. This is the year, incidentally, that is called "normal" by the American special interests in their drive to rebuild Germany's heavy industry.

The Nazi regime did not bother the German steel cartel. The so-called Economic Groups created in 1934 were intended to compel industries "to conduct their affairs in the spirit of the National Socialist State."

After the announcement of the four-year plan, the economic groups were most anxious to assist the Nazi government in the use of domestically produced substitutes for imported materials. At the end of 1934, an Iron and Steel Supervisory office was created—a government body—with powers to issue decrees affecting the industry.

THE NAZI TOP CARTEL

In 1942, realizing that the war program could not be continued without the full productive capacity of the steel mills, all reserves of iron and steel were mobilized, scrap campaigns were intensified and rigid control measures decreed. The Reichsvereinigung Eisen was organized under Roechling, as chairman, to dictate every phase of production and distribution. This was known in Germany as "Esge," or Eisen und Stahlgemeinschaft in der Reichsvereinigung Eisen. All German firms that previously remained outside cartel organizations became compulsory members of Esge. (See previous article in Prevent World War III, No. 32.)

Special emphasis was placed on the self government of the industry. How important the establishment of Esge was can be gauged from the fact that the whole German press gave it the treatment accorded only to the deeds of the most prominent Nazis.

The following Nazi industrialists comprised the Board of Esge:

Chairman: General Director, W. Zangen (of the Mannesman Tube Co.).

Deputy Chairman: Direktor Scheer Hennings (Reichswerke Hermann Goering), Direktor Schwede (Vereinigte Stahlwerke).

Members of the Board: Dr. Burkart (Flick Group), Direktor Heimann-Kreuser (Arbed, Luxembourg), Generaldirektor Make (Otto Wolf Group), Herr M. C. Mullter (Berghutte, Teschen, etc.), Generaldirektor Tgahrt (Hoesch), Generaldirektor Kuchinka (Eisenwerke des Protektorats Bohmen-Mahren).

General Managers: Direktor Maulick (a member of the board of the Stahlwerksverband), Assessor Fabor (Manager of the Reichsvereinigung Eisen).

Of special significance to the world is the fact that Esge was not only of the utmost importance to German wartime economy but also to the post-war period, for, anticipating defeat, the German steel industry saw to it that it retain the power gained during the regimes of the Kaiser, Weimar and Hitler.

These Nazi-appointed officials, who were directing the Esge top cartel, are today back in power again in their respective industries.

HISTORY REPEATS ITSELF

On October 19, 1949, a group of leaders of the heavy industry met at Cologne and decided to establish a committee to study economic questions—Auschuss fur Wirtschaftsfragen. This committee comprises 32 national federations. The purpose is to frame a constitution for a National Association of German Industries. The guiding spirit is Dr. Reusch, an intimate friend of Schacht, and a former German representative of the Bank for International Settlements, Basel, Switzerland, and one of the spokesmen for the German steel industry.

Chancellor Adenauer is the spokesman for this group, and is at present pressuring High Commissioner John J. McCloy for an Allied initial investment of 300 million marks in the German steel industry.

To recapitulate, German heavy industry gained its mastery through the following means:

A. The Imperial Protective Tariffs and armament programs.

B. The compensations paid by the Weimar regime to those who lost their plants in Lorraine on condition that the money be spent on new plants inside Germany.

C. The encouragement given to capital development by currency inflation between 1914 and 1923.

D. The public works and construction boom inside Germany between 1924 and 1929 resulting from lavish spending of central and local authorities and borrowing in foreign financial markets.

E. The Nazi rearmament program.

F. There was never free enterprise in the German steel industry.

What has happened to the steel industry since Germany's second defeat? Not much! The 4½ years of occupation gave birth to the famous Law No. 75. Its main point says that the Germans themselves will determine—after the establishment of a government freely elected—the ownership of the steel industry. Stripped of its phraseology, this point means that instead of having six or seven top combines, the new German steel industry will be controlled by between fourteen and twenty combines.

The Germans have a word for it: Es ist eine alte aber immer neue Geschichte—an old but always new story. Will the French, Belgians, Luxembourgers ever listen to it?

Will our own policy-makers listen to it before the American people become again the victims of "Human Stupidity"—or of greed?

From Pastor Niemoeller to Herman Abs

A new phase in the strengthening of "cultural" ties between the Germans and the American people is under way. The Germans are beginning to discard their fronts in the U. S. which labored so arduously during and immediately after the war to preserve the good name of the German people. Apparently, they are confident that the "poisonous war propaganda" about their crimes against humanity has been purged from the minds of forgetful Americans.

FIRST HERR NIEMOELLER . . .

One of the first to pioneer in this new approach was Pastor Martin Niemoeller. It will be recalled that he visited this country shortly after the end of hostilities. Since he came as a Minister of God and posed as a repentant sinner, it was comparatively easy for him to make public appearances in this country. Pastor Niemoeller's appeal was directed in particular to religious groups who were anxiously seeking for an indication that the Christian spirit among the Germans had not been completely destroyed by the long years of Nazi indoctrination! Niemoeller was therefore welcomed despite his notorious record as an ardent pan-German. (See reference to Niemoeller in editorial, "Auction for Germany" on page 5.)

Niemoeller's successes in the religious field opened the way for other members of the German clergy to tour the U.S.A. Thus, it was becoming more and more evident to the Germans that they could effectuate a solid "cultural" understanding with the American people, even apart from their pro-German mouthpieces in this country.

Consequently, they took out of the mothballs another representative of German "culture," this time, Count Felix von Luckner. Von Luckner first made his reputation as the German submarine commander who spearheaded the U-Boat warfare campaign during World War I which resulted in the loss of thousands of lives. By the time he had visited the U. S. in the 1920's, von Luckner's militaristic inclinations and his close association with the German General Staff were discreetly played down. Now he was the glamour boy—just an old "romantic sea pirate"— an "old salt" who loved ships, kissed little babies, and would not even hurt a fly. His exploits in the U. S. during the 1920's was simply overwhelming and he very proudly described his tour in his book "Seadevil Conquers America." It was a cynical tale of how von Luckner succeeded in "squeezing tears from the ladies' eyes and dollars from the capitalists' pockets."

. . . THEN HERR VON LUCKNER . . .

Von Luckner was a specialist in tear-jerking stories about the poor, poor Germans. On one occasion, he relates "they (the American ladies) came with tears in their eyes and gave me their hand and said 'You have restored the best in us—the love of your fatherland.'" He was wined and dined and made an honorary citizen of many cities in the U. S. "All doors, even in the most exclusive circles, were thrown open to me," bragged von Luckner. "The most fashionable clubs entertained in my honor. I lectured in 300 clubs, 36 of them made me an honorary member. My many lectures at universities were attended by thousands upon thousands of students who in a few years as men will influence the opinions and policies of their country."

The old romantic "sea pirate" has now returned to the scene of his first propaganda success. On his recent arrival in the U. S., he told reporters that he will speak to American youth whom he is confident can be depended upon in the future to shape U. S. policies in a way that would be favorable to the German cause. Von Luckner has memorized his lines well. It is a safe bet that if he is successful, other agents of the German General Staff will follow in his footsteps.

As would be expected, German efficiency is carefully guiding this "cultural" drive. There is a division of labor which extends even to the field of high finance. For this purpose, the Germans have chosen Herman J. Abs. Unlike Niemoeller and von Luckner who came to the U. S. with fanfare and noise, Herr Abs arrived under a thick veil of secrecy and silence. Why all this hush-hush? Admittedly, there is nothing "romantic" about Herr Abs, but that would not explain his modesty. Abs may not be as well known to the American people as Adolf Hitler, but Hitler would have remained an obscure hair-brained agitator were it not for men like Abs.

Abs is a major war criminal and this is known to the State Department and John J. McCloy. Abs never fired a gun, but he was the paymaster for the gunmen and it was he who gathered up the loot. Instead of being placed on trial as an arch war criminal for looting and spoliating the occupied territories. Abs has become a leading figure again in German banking circles. As a matter of fact, he is Chancellor Adenauer's financial brains.

Abs was the leading spirit of the notorious Deutsche Bank which, according to U. S. Government documents, was an "excessive concentration of economic power and a participant in the execution of the criminal policies of the Nazi regime. . ." These same official documents reveal that it was the Deutsche Bank which "showed the way to all German commercial banks with its contributions to the rearmament program. It provided the Reich with vast funds for rearmament purposes."

. . . AND NOW HERR ABS . . .

Abs, as head of the management committee of the Deutsche Bank, made certain that the Nazis had plenty of guns and tanks with which to conquer other peoples. His power and influence with the Hitlerites was described by Baron Kurt von Schroeder, the German banker and midwife of Nazism, as "tremendous."

Von Schroeder added "Abs proved very valuable to the Party and to the Government by using his bank to assist the Government in doing business in the occupied countries and in other countries."

With the help of German bayonets, Abs became a member of the Board of Directors of the "most important industrial and financial organizations in countries dominated or occupied by the Nazis." In addition, U. S. Government documents disclosed that "by personal acquisition of former Jewish property (Abs) became an even more direct beneficiary of the Nazi regime."

It seems that Abs has always been allergic to publicity. He was content to allow Schacht to take the bows. This was clever strategy for it enabled him to work behind the scenes with greater efficiency.

U. S. Government officials reported that Herr Abs' grip on the "German economy was so great that both Hjalmar Schacht and Walter Funk independently stated that 'Abs from the Deutsche Bank' was one of the few men in Germany who might be able to clarify for the American authorities some of Germany's past operations."

Finally, the War Department in March, 1945, characterized Abs as among those leading German financiers who "in an outstanding way thrived under National Socialism . . . welcomed it in the beginning, aided the Nazis to obtain power, supported them in office, shared the spoils of expropriations and conquest, or otherwise markedly benefited in their careers or fortunes under the Nazis."

Space does not permit us to continue enumerating his criminal activities, but is it not clear from the above that Herr Abs has good reason for staying in the shadows?

Why has Abs come to the U. S. and whom was he talking to? Why was this war criminal permitted to come here and who are his friends and protectors?

Could it be the Chase National Bank, Kuhn and Loeb, or Dillon, Read again?

What future catastrophes are being planned for the American people again by Herr Abs and his friends?

Here is the new "cultural" drive of the Germans. It is operating on all levels. It appeals to the religions, to the youth, to the ladies, to the military, and last but not least, to certain elements in the financial community who are eager to make a dollar at the expense of American security.

Is it not strange how easily these agents of pan-Germanism and Nazism are able to enter the United States? Times have changed, it seems, and it is no longer fashionable to get excited about the crimes of the Germans. The "new" policy, as The New York Times stated very recently, consists in "riveting a reviving Germany to the Western World. . ." It is not a "new" policy. It is the same old program which embroiled the world in two devastating German wars. Indeed, Germany is reviving—the same old Germany symbolized by the likes of Herr Abs.

"Democracy Is Your Business"

The following is the text of a broadcast recently made over Station KVOR in Colorado Springs, Colorado, by commentator Clen Robertson. Mr. Robertson's series of broadcasts, which he delivers every Friday at 9:30 p.m., are devoted to a discussion of topics vital to the preservation of American democracy.

"In fascist and communist countries, the leaders tell the people what to do. In a democracy the people tell the leaders. That's why democracy is your business."

These are the words with which Clen Robertson's comments are introduced to the listeners. The particular broadcast which we publish here is considered by the editors of Prevent World War III as a clear analysis of a much discussed problem.

We are often reminded of the great contribution to our American history made by German Americans; Von Steuben who gave us our drill regulations in the American Revolution; Karl Schurz who led in the relentless fight against slavery; the millions of farmers who draw from the Valley of the Mississippi the nation's food supply; names like Eisenhower, Nimitz, Spaatz, Huebner, who lead our forces in war against Nazi brutality. Every newspaper, every radio today carries the name of some German American high in the business, political or diplomatic life of his country. As a matter of fact, our German Americans are a selected group. Their ancestors were men and women of courage who loved liberty, repudiated tyranny and braved the unknown stretches of sea and land to breathe the free air of America. For a century or more those democratic tastes have grown stronger under the stimulus of a free life in a free land.

Meanwhile, the Cousin Anna and Onkel Karl they left behind were being immersed in the brutalities of Bismarck's blood and iron, the Kaiser's patent leather goose step and Hitler's Dachau and Buchenwald. Let me assure you from first-hand observation that our own Americans of German descent are a different breed of cats from the people of Germany today.

For instance, German drivers of American cars will frighten and often injure their own people in order to spread antagonism toward the American occupying forces while we are spending several billion dollars a year to feed and clothe them. German mothers almost push their baby buggies under the wheels of American vehicles to show their disdain. This ability to put hate above love is not American.

Flying back from Germany to the funeral of my mother, I was seated beside a priest of German descent. He was returning home to America from what he thought would be a last visit to his own sick parents in the old country. Our mutual bereavement raised our conversation far above my Protestantism and his Catholicism. After a night of talk and somewhere above the endless glow of an Atlantic sunrise, we agreed that the German in Germany had lost his ability to distinguish truth from falsehood and right from wrong. Hitler's twelve years of brutal killing and more brutal propaganda left only the weak, the too old, the too young, or those who were hopelessly twisted.

It is tremendously important to the security of this country that our citizens of German descent should at one and the same time be charitable toward the shattered mentality of their German cousins and yet should recognize the tremendous gulf which it creates between them.

For beginning with the earliest German immigration to America, strong forces have tried to enlist the German American under the banners of the Fatherland. The settlers of Missouri in 1834 left Germany under the auspices of a society whose ideal was not the search for individual freedom but the foundation of a new Germany in North America. In 1835 the Germania Society called German residents of Wisconsin not to the enjoyment of democracy but to the preservation of German speech, customs and traditions against destructive American influences. German settlers in Texas had to repudiate their parent organization, the Mainzer Verein. The purpose of that company was not to transport future American citizens, but "to plant German nationality in the West where it would some day become an incalculable advantage to the Vaterland."

Efforts of German agencies in World Wars I and II to turn the German American population to Pan-German uses are well known. Less known is the extent of those efforts today. Sparked by recent arrivals from the old country, the German American press has recently villified General Marshall and his plan, characterized Dachau as a place of "harmony and beauty" and tried to soil the life and work of Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt, far beyond the decent limits of political partisanship.

Much of this activity has centered around a group called the Steuben Society. This Society proclaims a strictly loyal character. It is named after the German hero of the American Revolution. It includes many honest and unsuspecting German Americans. But since 1919 the Steuben Society has both hidden and given voice to the worst agents of German tyranny. Its leaders paid respectful visits to Adolf Hitler and his Nazi "Institute of Germans abroad." They have smeared in turn the League of Nations, the Fourteen Points, the Atlantic Charter, a tough peace for Germany and everything which might bring order in a world where Germany sought to profit by chaos.

In the last few years the Steuben Society has urged its members to organize the votes of 32 million German Americans into a German racial bloc. On December 13, 1946, the German language newspaper, California Staatszeitung, published a letter entitled "Americans of German Descent, Wake Up." The letter says in part, "It is high time for us Americans of German descent to merge into a great powerful political group . . ."

As to foreign policy, Howard K. Smith, CBS correspondent in London, reports that in the past few weeks we have given much pleasure to the ghost of Hitler. The Allies of World War II, increasingly divided among themselves, are raising up a strong but un-denazified Germany, beside peoples impoverished and tortured by the Nazi war machine. What can account for this madness?

Is this America? Could such things happen here?

Pretense of Security

by

ERNEST LEISER

MILITARY SECURITY BOARD

Nearly a year ago France, Britain and the United States agreed to form a Military Security Board as the "watchdog of the occupation." Today that watchdog is still badly in need of a menacing growl and a sharp set of teeth.

A considerable number of British and French technical experts in Frankfurt and Berlin believe that the Board as presently constituted is inadequate to "do a job," even granted German cooperation. And it is naive, they believe, to expect the Germans genuinely to support the activities of an agency whose main purposes are to control industrial development and scientific research and to prevent the military or paramilitary use of German manpower. It becomes especially naive when the board itself is too weak to enforce that cooperation.

The total planned strength of the Military Security Board, including secretarial help, is only 250—approximately 83 for each of the three participating nations. Although the French and British have their full components, there are only 58 American "professional and clerical" staff members now assigned to the MSB, only about half of whom are in investigative jobs.

Those jobs involve an enormous area of responsibility. The men who hold them are charged with scrutinizing all scientific research, all industrial plants and all German manpower in the United States zone, to see that none of the restrictions or prohibitions imposed in these fields by the Allies is being violated.

There are 16 Americans with scientific training checking on all phases of research in science in the U.S. occupation zone. Since there are thousands of laboratories of all sizes and kinds throughout the zone, obviously only the larger ones can be checked at all, and only superficially. Approximately the same situation obtains in the industrial field; and only in the Military Division can the MSB's investigators keep anything like an adequate check.

The total personnel working in connection with the functions of the Board is still far too small, critics insist. And they point out that the three Powers still have not been able to agree on a location for a permanent headquarters for the body, further complicating the work of the skeleton staffs.

To achieve the aims outlined for the Military Security Board, it is believed, there can be no reliance on German "cooperation," either in the provision of statistics or in the control of investigations. Past experience has shown that the planned controls can only be effective if vigilantly operated by sizeable and qualified staffs.

It is to the German interest to twist or pad statistics on such a subject, say, as steel output. How can they be expected, therefore, to be scrupulously correct in their reports?

It is to German advantage to operate a number of industries prohibited by Allied directive. Why should German inspectors report to the Allies that those plants are operating, even if they are?

Either the Military Security Board should be strengthened to a point at which it need not rely on any outside agencies for its information, critics of the present setup say, or else the pretense of investigation might as well be abandoned. To say that the MSB at present provides real "security" is simply dangerous self-delusion.

"OCCUPATION STATUTE" FACADE

Officially, the Occupation Statute through which the Western Allies have agreed to control the new West German Federal Republic cannot be revised until the fall of next year. Actually, the Statute has already been basically, if unofficially, revised and the controls of the new state made far lighter than originally planned . . .

Perhaps the most important "reserved power" to be largely lifted, in the legal experts' views, is that over foreign trade. A new decision of the High Commission has given to the Federal Republic power to draw up its own trade agreements with foreign countries, an authority up to now held tightly in Allied hands. The Germans can conduct their own trade talks and reach their own decisions. While the Allies may withhold approval of such agreements, it is not expected that they will be vetoed often.

To strengthen this new German authority, the Allies have now also ruled that the Germans may establish consulates, commercial offices and trade missions throughout the world. This is an unexpectedly long step forward to German trade autonomy, despite terms of the Occupation Statute.

In addition, the Allies have now largely turned over responsibility for "decartelization," once regarded as one of the

Could the millions of grandsons of German-American settlers be so duped by the slick talkers of Nazidom as to be stampeded into a political bloc and over the precipice of national disunion? These are delicate questions. They must be raised and they must be answered.

One thing is already certain. In its war against Communism, this nation will not survive intrigues from what Theodore Roosevelt called "Hyphenated Americans," German-Americans, Irish-Americans, Italian-Americans, Anglo-Americans. For all of our ancestors arrived here from other shores. If the lands whence we came keep a stern hand on the shoulders of respective national groups, seeking to steer each in the course beneficial only to the old country, this nation will have no policy of its own but only a babel of conflicting national minorities. That would be the ruin of American democracy.

No, the day has come when you and I must renew allegiance to ideals peculiarly American. To the conviction that truth does exist; and falls not from the commanding mouths of Communist and Fascist supermen, but rises rather from independent agreement of simple reasonable people; allegiance to the conviction that people of all races have found happiness in America, within limits and laws protecting the happiness of others, limits set for each by his own conscience, and laws passed for each by his own vote. We must renew allegiance to the unified nation thus created and thus preserved. We must re-commit the power of that nation to the protection of simple people everywhere under all nations and to the association of those nations with reason and independence in unity and in peace.

The Case of the Nazi Bigwigs In Argentina

by
JUAN ACEVEDO

A host of high-ranking German Nazis now hold key government posts in Argentina. Not only have hundreds of Hitler's former hirelings secured haven under dictator Juan Peron, but many now occupy strategic positions in the police, the transport and agricultural ministries, and top military and industrial projects, including atomic research. Moreover, the 60,000 influential members of the Argentine Nazi party continue to wield political power, despite the party's official dissolution in 1944 and Peron's iron-fist policy towards Socialists and liberals.

Among the Nazi bigwigs now in Argentina, according to information reaching the Argentine Socialist party, are Anton Pavelich, former Nazi gauleiter of Croatia; S.S. General Otto Skorzeny, who rescued Mussolini from imprisonment; ex-gauleiter of the Tyrol Hans Hofer, sentenced to death in Austria; former Gestapo chief Robert Kessler; and a host of former officials of the Foreign Office, SS, Hitler Jugend, Volksgericht (people's tribunal), and the Wehrmacht.

Most important strategic centers penetrated by the Nazis are the government's research laboratory and air force training bases at Cordoba. There, according to Seften Delmer of the London News Chronicle, 300 German technicians are hastily working on atomic energy research and new designs for jet-propelled aircraft.

In charge of the jet research is Prof. Willy Tank, former aircraft engineer for Hitler who goes under the name of Mathies. The atomic research is directed by a German named Decker.

According to Delmer, "three aces of the German air force are at the head of the German groups which are training the Argentine Air Force: General Adolf Galland, General Baumbach, and Col. Hans Ullrich Rudel."

Delmer also believes that former Black Sea commander Admiral Litzman is now a top adviser to the Argentine Navy's High Command. And Dr. H. Theiss and three other former Gestapo members are now teaching Gestapo methods to the Argentine secret police, the English journalist charges.

Long before these accusations, the Socialist party of Argentina compiled an impressive list of ex-Nazis now receiving succor and support from the Peron regime. It was Socialist Deputy Silvano Santander who asked the government to explain the surreptitious arrival of Pavelich. According to Santander, the ex-Croation gauleiter arrived in the disguise of a priest aboard the Italian vessel S.S. Andrea Gritti.

Santander's query was never answered, nor were his questions about former Gestapo technician H. Theiss. Santander named Dr. F. Adam, H. Richner, and J. Paech as the three other ex-Gestapo men aiding Theiss to sharpen up Peron's secret police.

The Socialist deputy also first charged that Tank, Skorzeny, Galland, and Rudel were working in the top echelons of the armed services as technicians. In the ministry of Transport, Santander declared, were no less than 22 ex-Nazis who arrived in Argentina in 1947. They got high posts as a result of negotiations carried out by Dr. J. Hensath, another German. Their names:

Franck Schulte, Walfort Schlichting, Ernest Stamm, Wilhelm Banike, Kurt Kunner, Egon Bonner, Albert Wisner, Radu Bratesca Huber, Karl Keller, Christian Schmidt; Wilhelm Tigges, Karl Kallus, Werner Jahus, Eric Lippeheide, Eusebio Sticts, Heinrich Buhelle, Roland Siegel, Funck Waligens, Heinrich Krets, Frederick Walfgandt, Wilhelm Bambe, Frederick Mulhelm.

A prewar Nazi newspaper, Freie Presse, has been continued under the direction of Robert Kessler, a former SS colonel and Gestapo hatchet-man who at one time functioned as a Sudeten newspaperman in Czechoslovakia. This paper also employs Hofer, the ex-Tyrolese gauleiter whose career has been even more interesting. Hofer was once sentenced in Austria for sexual crimes, but he acquired a huge bankroll (through expropriations of Jewish property) during the German occupation of Tyrol. He escaped the death sentence and now lives with his wife in Bariloche.

Kessler, Hofer and Karl von Merck, former chief of Nazi espionage in Brazil, are also the editors of the magazine Der Weg published in Buenos Aires. This magazine was banned by American Military Government from Germany as an out-key reserved powers, to the German Federal Government.

Since Chancellor Konrad Adenauer has maintained close relations with the "industrial barons" of the Ruhr, it remains to be seen with what vigor that responsibility is discharged; nevertheless, for better or worse, Britain, France and the U.S. have given the task to him. Similarly, the Allies have given to the Adenauer Government primary responsibility for the prevention of discriminatory trade practices, also listed by the Statute as a reserved power.

While "disarmament and demilitarization" still remain under Allied control, through the Military Security Board, the Germans have now been given "co-responsibility" for enforcing them. Dr. Adenauer has promised, as one condition of the Allied concessions on dismantling, consular relations and shipbuilding, to cooperate with the Security Board. This in itself is a considerable modification of the original meaning of the Statute, the lawyers say, since the Allies originally did not intend to require, or rely on, German initiative in this field. The same modification has also taken place in the related reserved powers of scientific research and industrial restrictions.

Foreign affairs does still remain under General Allied control, the legalists concede. However, they maintain, even here the presence of consulates gives the Germans a big opening wedge, as does permission to conclude their own trade treaties.

By default, the German regime has also virtually assumed the power to enforce "respect for the Basic Law and the State Constitutions" which the Allies had reserved to themselves. In the intensity of their desire to "give the fledgling Government a chance to try its own wings," the Allies have consistently kept hands off in cases apparently involving violations of the Basic Law or of "democratic government."

and-out Nazi sheet. Von Merck, expelled from Brazil during the war, returned to Germany and was sent, by personal order of Hitler, to the Junkerschule (political school).

Another Freie Presse contributor is Dr. Hochleuten, former judge advocate in Hitler's tribunals. After the war, Hochleuten escaped to Spain, where he served in Franco's Foreign Ministry for a while, before coming to Argentina.

Various lesser Nazis are employed in the agriculture ministry and in the airplane factories and agro-technical Institute at Cordoba.

Now receiving 1,400 pesos a month salary, and 1,700 pesos expense allowance at the Agriculture Ministry are Albert Louis Durigen, Max Voigt, Helmuth Weekamp and Detlef Klose. Each has a one-year contract with an option for renewals.

At the Cardoba installation, receiving from 1,000 to 1,400 pesos a month are the following:

Roland Kalpas, Rudolf Freyer, Johan Puffert, Georg Neumann, Theodore Quast, Hermann Brunemann, Rudolf Veigsberger, August Siebricht, Paul Klages, Eik Werner, Wilhelm Bansemir, Reimar Horten, Kurt Rothe, Otto Ernst Pabst, Hans Schubert, Karl Schaaf, Herbert Wolff, Ludwig Mittelhuber, Otto Behrens, Friedrich Heintelmann, Ernst Schottler, Erwin Ruth, Gustav Pluger.

The Argentine Socialists conclude their charges with this indictment:

"Peron's Argentina aided and promoted the military revolutions in Peru and Venezuela; it gave arms to Morinigo to crush the Paraguayan democrats; it sent arms and funds to the bloody September revolution in Bolivia; it conspired in Chile according to formal charges brought by the President of that republic, Dr. Gabriel Gonzalez Videla.

"It is through conspiracy and revolution that Peron-nazism and Peron-communism are agitating for a divided Latin America.

"Was not this the objective of Nazi strategy?"

". . . The Germans struck me as being just as aggressive and determined as they were then. I saw no indication they consider themselves a defeated nation. Elsewhere in Europe, I found conditions tough, but the people were leisurely and calm. But in Germany, practically everyone was rushing around as if they were again preparing to take over the world."

OLD BANKERS BACK IN WEST GERMANY

Jack Raymond reports to The New York Times from Frankfort, Germany:

"Leading personalities of the big German banks during the Nazi period are making their way back into bank institutions in Western Germany and initiating practices that appear to be developing monopolies, it was reported by a high German source.

"The former big bankers are returning as directors of the decentralized institutions that were created by the military governments after the end of the war, he said. They are not responsible to a board of directors or to a general meeting of stockholders..."

INFLUX OF EX-NAZIS

Ernest Leiser reports to the Overseas News Agency:

"There has been a new, rapid influx of former Nazis into government posts of all kinds since the Federal Republic of Western Germany began operation two months ago, according to information collected by the staff of U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy.

"One report notes a 'continuous increase' over the past year, with the sharpest rises in the last 60 days. Another declares that the 'bars are practically down' in the U. S. Zone State of Bavaria.

"Despite the aforementioned findings by his staff members, Mr. McCloy stated recently that he did not regard the current trend of German nationalism to be extreme in nature and that he saw no imminent danger of the formation of 'Neo-Nazi' groups.

"This would appear in conformity with the position of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer that, in the new State, there should no longer be any attempt at discrimination between non-Nazis and Nazis except those in the highest categories. His justification is that the time has come to forget the political past in order to achieve political 'solidarity.'...

"A recent survey in the U. S. zone State of Hesse shows that the most rapid influx of former Nazis has been in the Finance Ministry where an estimated 55 per cent of those at policy-making levels and more than 80 per cent of those in the middle, or working, levels were persons coming under the denazification law.

"Ironically, the figures are even higher at the policy-making level, and almost equally as high at the working level, in the Ministry of Justice, which includes all persons employed in the state judicial system. The 'Culture Ministry,' which runs education in the State, employs former Nazis in approximately 35 per cent of its top posts and in 40 per cent of those at lower levels.

"All these percentages, U. S. officials note, are far higher than they have been and they indicate that, in a considerable number of cases, non-Nazis have been 'released' from the civil service ranks to make way for the former Nazis who were intrenched in the posts until dismissed after the collapse of the Hitler Reich."

"MUTUAL CONFIDENCE REIGNS..."

From a dispatch by Ernest Leiser datelined Bonn, Germany:

"During the brief visit of Secretary of State Dean Acheson to Germany in November, the West German Federal Republic took a long step toward reacceptance of what statesmen hereabouts call the 'Family of Western Nations.'...

"For the first time since the conquest of Nazi Germany, an American Secretary of State has been treated on terms of equality with the representatives of a German Government. Observers who accompanied him note that at no time was the protocol of Mr. Acheson's visit that of the victor vis-a-vis the vanquished. . . .

"In his call on President Theodor Heuss, titular head of the Federal German Republic, the American Secretary of State went through the same amenities which any Ambassador or Foreign Minister would observe in visiting the President of the United States. Mr. Acheson cheerfully and obligingly cooled his heels in the reception hall of the Presidential castle until Dr. Heuss indicated readiness to see him...

"Nor was it by any means only what he did which made clear the Secretary of State's attitude toward the 'new Germany.' It was also implicit in virtually everything he said. He hoped, he declared, that his visit had established 'relations of trust and confidence, and personal regard' between the German heads of State and himself. He stressed strongly that the intention of the United States in Germany was to 'assist' the country; he proffered that assistance in the terms and in the tone which he might have used had he been speaking to former allies, not former enemies...

"A good many Allied observers, especially those with day-to-day contact with Germans at the 'working level,' are inclined to doubt seriously whether there has been sufficient political and moral rehabilitation in Germany to warrant Mr. Acheson's new approach. The German political leaders, however, have been quick to seize its import. They have seen the Secretary of State's evident determination to make friends in Western Germany, and have already indicated their intention to set a price—in new demands for concessions—for that friendship...

"The Secretary of State had made it clear that the Germany he visited was no longer an enemy land, but rather a country of potential allies."

THE FOLLY OF OUR POLICY

From a column by Dr. Frank Kingdon in the New York Post Home News:

"...Whenever any critic of our policy in Germany objects to the restoration of German industry, he is immediately accused of saying that there are no good Germans. This is not our position at all. There may be many good Germans, but German industry is in the hands of bad ones.

"Since German industry dominates the business of the country, its owners and managers rule Germany's economic life. This makes them the most powerful persons in the nation...

"The industrialists ran the Kaiser and made Hitler. They moulded the social system which produced the German who blindly followed these two megalomaniacs.

"My criticism of our present German policy is that we are putting these same men back into power, and thus perpetuating the system which will continue to produce the same kind of Germans...Our present policy gives Germany no chance to create a democratic government...This is a focal point in the folly of our German policy..."

A NEW BLACKMAIL

From a Berlin dispatch to the Overseas News Agency:

"An important Western German daily newspaper, one licensed by the U. S. Military Government during its efforts to create a democratic press in Germany, has now brought 'counter-charges' of war crimes against the Western Allies.

"The Muenchner Merkur, published in Munich, has just printed an editorial in which it demands the Allied conquerors 'forget the past.'

"'Not only do the German people reject the (Allied) charge of collective guilt,' the newspaper declared, 'but we also believe we are justified in making counter-charges. When British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin speaks of the bombing of Coventry and London, we talk of Dresden and Wuerzburg.

"'If the German people are accused of systematically murdering five million Jews, we point to the barbaric expulsion of 15,000,000 Germans from their homes after the war, and the resultant death of 4,000,000 of these'...

"Now that the Western Allies are taking rapid steps to include West Germany in the European 'community of nations,' German publicists are more and more frequently arguing that exclusion was unwarranted in the first place.

"Inherent in this theme is the implication that, unless the Western Allies are willing completely to forgive and forget, the Germans will accept the 'caresses' of Soviet Russia. One U. S. official noted that Dr. Adenauer, now West German Chancellor, declared in Berlin last winter that German support of the West was dependent on 'how well the West treats us.'

"Discouraged Americans who have been charged with the job of 'reorienting' Germany toward a repudiation of Nazism, recognition of war guilt and comprehension of Western democracy, have cited the Muenchner Merkur editorial as additional evidence that their mission had, at least in part, failed.

"Although the editorial can be considered an attack on the 'prestige of the Allied Forces' and therefore a violation of the Occupation Statute under which the Western Powers control the new German State, no punitive action has been taken, or is being considered..."

GESTAPO MAN WORKS FOR SOVIETS

William Attwood reports to the New York Post Home News from Berlin:

"...Although the M. V. D. is keeping a tight grip on Germany, routine Russian intelligence functions are being gradually turned over to trained German specialists who learned their trade under Hitler.

"The new East German republic, for example, is creating a counter-intelligence organization whose chief will be Hans Adelbert Baeumler, a former official in the Nazi Sicherheitsdienst. This outfit, to be called the state security office, will have agents planted in all German ministries in innocuously entitled Information Divisions.

"This is part of the trend towards letting German Communist stooges administer the Soviet zone—under watchful Russian supervision.

"That's why you see so few Russians in uniform on the streets of Berlin—and so many armed German 'People's Police...'"

HITLERIANA

From an article by R. K. in the U. S. News and World Report:

"German editors are finding that few things attract readers like a picture and story of Adolf Hitler. In recent months, dozens of publications have printed special articles about the Fuehrer and his life. The demand seems to be growing.

"Little-known individuals and well-known personalities out of the Nazi past have been writing to 'tell all.' Among others, memoirs have been published by valets, adjutants, secretaries, mistresses and chauffeurs of Hitler and other members of the Nazi inner circle...

"This recent trend toward Hitler stories is being investigated by U. S. officials, who already have made a preliminary report to John J. McCloy.

"'What is disturbing,' the report says, 'is the fact that there seems to be a flourishing market for the Hitler literature. The general impression left on the reader is that the Fuehrer was, after all, rather a good Joe, more sinned against than sinning.

"'The apparently growing appetite of the German people for literature which slyly glorifies the Fuehrer is catered to by an increasingly impressive list of weeklies . . .'

"Another type of Hitler literature is typified by three books that have been widely syndicated for newspapers in serialized form. These are 'Hitler as Strategist,' by former Army Chief of Staff Gen. Franz Halder; 'The Last Month,' by Luftwaffe Gen. Karl Koller, and 'Settling Accounts With Hitler,' by Hitler's former Economics Minister and financial expert, Hjalmar Schacht. The latter book alone sold 300,000 copies. These books place the blame for Germany's aggression, defeat and subsequent troubles on Hitler's shoulders alone.

"There seems to be a vogue for still another type of Hitleriana. One Stuttgart weekly is publishing in installments a series of conversations held with Hitler's ghost by a medium identified as Madama Fr. Ch. According to the medium, Hitler said:

"'Today from the beyond, I see things from an entirely different point of view. We worked knowingly to build up an arms industry to prevent economic chaos...We committed errors which could only end in the catastrophe of unconditional surrender. But not everything for which we strove was bad...'"

DARK PERSPECTIVES

Drew Middleton reports in the New York Times:

"One of the most disturbing elements in the German picture is that at the moment when nationalism and neo-fascism are reviving, the end of dismantling has left Western Germany with a steel production capacity that British experts estimate at about 15,000,000 tons.

"Here, in the Ruhr, there are strong fears among British officials that the end of dismantling may be followed by the removal of existing controls on coal and steel production and the recovery of control by the Ruhr industrialists who backed Hitler.

"These fears are shared by United States officials on the Combined Coal Control Group...

"The officials fear the return of German control for two reasons. The first is that the old owners will be in a position to back any radical right-wing party that appears to insure their hold on industry and that will keep labor at bay.

"The second reason was expressed by a British official who said: 'If the old bosses get back, they are the fellows who can and will "play" with the Russians. We and the Americans have fought to keep the Russians out of the Ruhr. But if the owners get back, once they find there's a market in the East, they'll make economic agreements with the Russians. They'll make money and the Russians will get what they want.'

"Henry Parkman, U. S. member of the Authority, sees the Authority as 'a consultative and study' group rather than an executive body. Under such circumstances it is difficult to envisage the Authority's exercising of the basic controls enforced by the two existing groups...

"...'In that situation the Bonn Government will know what the Authority wants to do immediately and will be able to oppose it and to propagandize against it,' one official said. 'The essence of control is secrecy'..."

"THE NOBLEST SERVICE TO THE FATHERLAND"

Ernest Leiser reports to the Overseas News Agency:

"The best-dressed men in Eastern Germany today are the members of the 'people's police.'

"As a part of their effort to build up this para-military force to its target strength the Communist bosses of the new East German 'Democratic Republic' are now issuing smart, military-type uniforms to all 'volunteers.'

"Throughout the Soviet zone, there is at present an acute clothing shortage. The population is shabbily clad, almost entirely still in pre-war costumes. In contrast to their raggedness, the 'people's police' stand out in sartorial splendor. Only the top men in the Communist party and a few industrialists who have thrown in their lot with the party hierarchy can match their elegance.

"At the same time, a new publicity campaign is on to make service in the 'people's police' attractive to young men—and women. It is described as 'the noblest service to the Fatherland' and 'a career to which we desire to draw our finest young men.' Young men who are jobless are 'asked' to join the police ranks—if they indicate conscientious or other objection, they are drafted for service in the Soviet-zone uranium mines and, in infrequent cases, thrown into prison...

"The most recent analysis made by Western sources, on the basis of information obtained from the Eastern German Interior Ministry itself, has set the target strength of para-military police at 110,000 and total police target strength at 170,000. Present strength, as indicated, totals approximately 280,000.

"This group, Western sources note, may not be as large as reports up to now have indicated, but it is certainly larger than normal security for a 'nation' of 17,000,000 people would warrant. Western intelligence also expresses greater concern with the type of training—in military formations, with heavy weapons, and in barracks—given, than with the numbers of the 'people's police' themselves."

". . . One cannot warn early enough against a revival of German militarism, no matter how well supervised.

"Many Americans being as fairminded as they are, have held that Hitler came into power because the Treaty of Versailles after World War I was too harsh on Germany. Nothing is more fallacious than this statement. The opposite is true: Hitler was helped into power by the fact that the disarmament clauses of the Treaty were not carried out properly. . .

"If our policy of helping Germany establish a second democratic republic is to succeed, Germany should stay disarmed. Militarism of the German-Prussian brand and democracy are incompatible. Aside from communism, the perils that threatened the Weimar Republic of Germany came from the Reichswehr, as the professional army was then called. The German generals persuaded the old president von Hindenburg to give Hitler a chance by appointing him chancellor; the first truly democratic regime Germany ever had was buried in the trenches dug by the militarists. Rearming Germany, and helping Prussian militarism again to rear its ugly head, would endanger the second German democratic republic we are trying so hard to get started...

"If Germany were called upon to rearm, and her army were integrated into a composite European force, German generals would regain authoritative power. In addition, there are German generals belonging to the rightist camp who have always been in favor of cooperation with Russia, despite the fact that Russia is a Communist state. Quite a galaxy of German officers joined the Free Germany Committee in Moscow after they had been taken prisoner, and many of them are still serving in Eastern Germany with the Russian occupation administration. They would not regard themselves as Benedict Arnolds if they were to sell out to Russia; they would consider themselves true German patriots for having made a military alliance which, in their opinion, will redound to Germany's everlasting good. . ."

NEO-NAZI INSOLENCE

A substantial number of Jews in the French occupation zone of Germany are receiving postcards, postmarked Freiburg, requesting them to "report to the State Crematorium for extermination," according to a dispatch appearing in the newspaper, Droit et Liberté.

One such postcard, the account stated, addressed to Jews at Emmerdingen, read:

"As you have reached the required age, you should report immediately to the State Crematorium, Portal No. 9, Furnace No. 36, Door No. 5, in order that your bodies may be burned. You should bring some firewood, coal and a container for your ashes, which will be used for the manufacture of soap. You should close all pores and openings in your bodies so that your gases will not poison employes of the crematorium."

NO NAZI LEANINGS . . .

Herbert Blankenhorn, righthand diplomatic attache to German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer in his negotiations at Bonn with the Western Big Three was a notorious pre-war agent of the Nazi regime in the U.S.

Blankenhorn was attached to Hitler's Washington Embassy staff as Secretary at the time of Pearl Harbor. During the preceding three years he had collaborated with Manfred Zapp and Guenther Tonn, well-known Nazi agents who were arrested and deported.

BIDDING FOR THE GERMANS

Richard S. Weil, International News Service Staff Correspondent, reports from Berlin:

"A high American source said the Allies may be forced to establish a West German military force to meet the threat of a 400,000-man East German Communist police army reported in the making.

"Soviet Foreign Minister Vishinsky was disclosed to have authorized the vast Russian-equipped East German puppet force on his recent stopover in Berlin.

"A leading U.S. official said the Western powers may have to sanction a Bonn-controlled counter-force 'if the Russians are successful in building a Communist army on the scale they apparently are planning'."

ROVING CATTLE?

The ONA reports from London:

"A resurgence of anti-Semitic propaganda in the German press of the Western zones . . . resulted in a recent wave of desecrations in Jewish cemeteries, reaching a new peak and thus necessitating greater efforts at placing memorials to Nazi victims under international protection. The German authorities are either unable or unwilling to bring the perpetrators to justice, and most of the time attribute the desecrations to 'playing children, gypsies or roving cattle.'

"The latest of a series of outrages was the erasure of one zero in the figures engraved on memorial headstones at Belsen, former site of a Nazi extermination camp, indicating the number of victims buried in each mass grave, thus reducing the figure 5,000, for example to 500—2,500 to 250, and so forth. 'Probably for such acts, roving cattle were also responsible,' was the bitter comment of Joseph Rosensaft, leader of the Jewish Central Committee in the British Zone."

DR. ADENAUER'S IDEA

Harold Callender to the New York Times from Paris:

". . . Dr. Adenauer's suggestion to pool the Ruhr with its neighboring rivals looked to experts like a revival of the former European steel cartel under a new guise. . .

"If this is Dr. Adenauer's idea, it runs directly counter to the known views of Mr. Hoffman, who considers cartels the antithesis of what the European Cooperation Administration seeks in Europe. . . A new European steel trust would presumably not foster competition. . .

"The Western Germans have found it difficult to reconcile Dr. Adenauer's steel proposal with their professed aim of replacing the traditionally controlled German economy by a free one.

"Steel experts say that if permitted to do so, German and French steel interests would return to an international cartel as ducks to water; particularly since the French steel industry has an excess of ingot production and would like to send it to Germany for finishing. Thus French steel producers would favor increasing German steel capacity as regards finishing plants.

"It is generally assumed here—even in the political circles where higher German steel output is regarded as a red flag to the French public—that expansion of German stel production beyond the present limits is inevitable as dismantling is wound up. . . ."

ALL OVER AGAIN

Student "corporations," known in pre-Nazi times as centers of super-nationalism and political reaction, have now been re-established at all the major universities of Western Germany, according to a report just completed by the Student Council at the Free University of Western Berlin.

To the outside world, the corporations were best known for the swordmanship they sponsored in their membership. Duelling, with saber-scars as symbols of prideful distinction, has been their most publicized tradition.

However, the Free University report noted that duelling is one of the lesser evils sponsored by the corporations. Not only are they exerting a strong influence in support of the caste system which has long characterized German higher education, but they are working closely with the near-Nazi political parties which have sprung up in West Germany since the new Republic was formed.

They have been given active backing by the class of "Alte Herren"—the old-line academicians—who are once again striving to recreate the universities in the image of German imperial times, when students were members of a political elite. Efforts by student groups of new types—such as the Free University's Student Council—have been seriously curtailed in competition with the corporations by lack of funds and backing. The corporations have had both.

Germany: Back to 1921?

by CAROLUS

East and West are struggling, each in its own way, to get possession of Germany, of the German labor force and the German industrial plants, including those in the Ruhr; they are casting covetous eyes on the human and material war potential of these seventy million people in the heart of Europe. The lamentable power politics of the post-war period have brought the European problem to a head in Germany, just as they have brought to a head in Europe the conflict which has divided the world into two armed camps and threatens it with a catastrophe of measureless proportions. . . .

The West puts its trust in the appeal of democracy. Moscow relies on its almost religious faith that capitalism is dying. Moscow does not intend to stand still on the Elbe; it wants all Germany. And if the Western powers think they can defend their Germany with the democratic idea of a United States of Europe, Moscow counts on marching to the Rhine under the banner of German nationalism and German unity.

In this contest for Germany the West has certain valuable trumps. It has the nine million refugees who fled to the Western zones from the East. It has the traditional hatred of the Germans for Poles, Czechs, and indeed all Slavs. The tragic fate of Berlin speaks for it, as do the dictatorial processes in the East German state, the concentration camps, the compulsory labor, and in comparison with West Germany, the low standard of living. Surely these things ought to immunize West Germans to contagion from the East; Soviet Russia and its East German state have not many attractions to offer.

But Russia has a trump to use against the United States and its allies in German nationalism and autocracy, which are much more deeply ingrained in the German psychology than internationalism and democracy. It has another trump in the conflict of interests within the Western bloc—the disagreements over the dismantlings, over the Saar region, over the solution of the West German state's primary problem, the export of its products. Unless it can export, the new state cannot live—cannot keep its people at work, cannot feed them. It is getting along fairly well today, thanks to Marshall Plan aid, but tomorrow, when that aid stops, it will collapse like a house of cards.

Whatever lives has its inner dynamism; and seventy million Germans have a tremendous will to live. Of course, they are reaping every possible advantage from the competition for their favors between East and West; of course they are playing off one against the other. And it is not surprising that the sense of power thus gained is developing into an unbridled arrogance that makes their so-called re-education pure farce. They are probably building on sand and will again meet catastrophe—but that is beside the point. The only thing that matters is whether the Western powers will be able to save their protégé from being drawn into the orbit of the East, and perhaps even make it a magnet for the twenty million Germans in the Russian-controlled East German state.

The high commissioners for the Western Allies—McCloy, Robertson, and Francois-Poncet—do what Washington, London, and Paris prescribe, and that is in most cases the wrong thing. In the interest of their own countries they meddle in German politics and business, paying particular attention to the industries of Rhineland-Westphalia, which produce the bulk of Germany's coal, iron, and steel. A vast majority of the German people—not only the Social Democrats but all of German labor, including the workers organized in Catholic unions—have openly demanded the nationalization of key industries. They cannot envision either a democratic or a peaceful Germany if these industries remain in private hands.

The preservation of the status quo will mean that the same powerful financial interests which have two world wars and the Hitler regime on their conscience will become the masters of the new state. The opposition of these interests to the Socialist reorganization of the German economy, which is the precondition of real democracy, is reinforced by the admonition of the United States: Germany must be made safe for private enterprise. . .

Though Chancellor Adenauer's majority is made up of many opposing elements, his government has shown itself to be a faithful and efficient steward for private business and the propertied classes. It is already hated by the people. The Parliament simply serves as democratic scenery; if it should aspire to be more than that, its smoldering antagonism to Dr. Adenauer would develop into an open conflict which might quickly bring on a government crisis.

Private enterprise, a Continental coal-and-steel trust, European Union—unfortunately, all these together will not raise German exports to the level required for the economic and social stability of the West German state. West Germany's export market is in the East, and the middle-class elements squinting in that direction are considerably stronger than official propaganda tries to make out. Russia could throw open that market. A few nationalist Fatherland Union Party, and Karl Meissner, chairman of the right-wing German Bloc Party and a member of the Bavarian State Parliament.

"According to local press reports, 70 former Nazi SS officers, Gestapo agents, and members of the Gestapo security service attended a secret meeting of the Fatherland Union December 15.

"A usually reliable source said Herr Feigenhansel shouted at the meeting: 'Down with the anti-Nazi traitors who have sold out to the Allies.'

"Social Democrat Jean Stock told the Bavarian Parliament December 16 that Herr Meissner said at a meeting of his German Bloc Party at Memmingen December 8 that the present political system in Germany 'must be crushed.' "

Why?

WHY was Herbert Blankenhorn named diplomatic attache to Dr. Adenauer despite the fact that he was a notorious pre-war Nazi agent in the United States?

WHY did the State Department not protest the nomination of Blankenhorn who, as secretary of the Nazi Reich's Washington Embassy, worked hand in glove with Manfred Zapp, the most prominent Nazi propagandist in the United States?

WHY was Dr. Achenbach designated Foreign Minister of the Western German Government, a man who from 1940 to 1944, during the German occupation of France, was first attache at the German Embassy in Paris and a close friend of Otto Abetz?

WHY did Dr. Max Brauer, Mayor of Hamburg, see fit to declare during his recent visit to the U. S. that "Nazism is dead in Germany," although all the facts disprove this wishful thinking?

WHY has the final report by Brig. Gen. Telford Taylor, pointing to an "alarming resurgence" of Nazism in Germany and accusing U. S. occupation authorities of "playing down" and "soft-pedaling" the war crimes disclosures, suddenly become "unavailable"?

WHY has no American paper reported that the Foreign Minister of the Soviet sponsored Eastern German Government, Georg Dertinger, was a reactionary monarchist in pre-Hitler days, a member of the Herren-Klub, a close friend of Herr Franz von Papen, a member of the ultra-rightwing Stahlhelm and editor of the reactionary newspaper Der Tag?

WHY has Senator William Langer come out in defense of Mrs. Ruth Moore, German-born daughter of Otto Kuehn (resident of Hawaii, sentenced to death for treason during the war and later deported to Germany) claiming for her property confiscated by the government?

WHY has the extraordinary statement of British Field Marshal Wavell, made during his recent visit to Canada and bluntly calling attention to Germany as a danger to peace, not been given the attention in the press that it deserves?

WHY do American newspapers pay no attention at all to the extremely interesting trial before a British Court in Hamburg, Germany, of Nazi Field Marshal von Mannstein?

WHY have American correspondents failed to direct attention to the dangerous activities of the Deutsche Rechts Partei and in particular to one of its leaders, Franz Richter, who calls denazification "a dirty business" and emphasizes that his party will soon ask for reparations of all the damage caused by denazification? (The same man still signs all his letters with the classical Nazi slogan, "Mit Deutschem Gruss.")

WHY have the Allies turned over responsibility for "decartelization," once regarded as one of the key reserved powers, to the German Government?

WHY has nobody reported that Dertinger's Chief of Protocol at the Foreign Ministry in Berlin is a former Junker, Count Ferdinand Thun zu Hohenstein, who now calls himself simply Georg Thun, but belonged to the Moscow Free German Committee?

WHY have not extradition proceedings started against the following top Nazi war criminals, who presently live quietly in Argentina: Gestapoman Dr. Theiss and his assistants, F. Adam, H. Richner, J. Paecht, all active as advisers to the Federal Argentine Police?

WHY has nobody objected to the election of the following members of the FDP to the Bonn Bundestag: Dr. Ludwig Preiss, member of the SA since 1933 and of the SS since 1934; Dr. Otto Kneipp, member of the Nazi Party since 1933; Karl Ruediger, member of the Nazi Party since 1937; Dr. V. E. Preusker, member of the SS since 1933; Dr. Richard Hammer, member of the SA and of the Nazi Physicians League, and Heinrich Fassender, member of the Nazi Party since 1931?

WHY have American correspondents failed to report that Kurt von Dittmar, once the Wehrmacht's radio commentator, is now writing editorials for the Westdeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung?

WHY did the French Communist periodical, Peuples Amis, dishonestly state in its November issue that "in Eastern Germany demilitarization has been completed" while the facts show that Soviet remilitarization of the Germans is in full swing?

WHY do our State Department diplomats not officially expose the Soviet ultra-nationalistic flag-waving among the most chauvinistic German elements?

WHY have our correspondents in Germany not checked more carefully into the strange background of ex-Major General Vincenz Mueller, Chief of the Soviet-sponsored National Democratic Party and one of the Commanders of the People's "Police," who in pre-Hitler days supervised the von Papen putsch on June 20, 1932, the last step in paving the way for Hitler?

WHY has the Soviet-supported Eastern German Government named Hans Adalbert Baumler, a former topnotch official of the Nazi SD (Gestapo), to head its Counter Intelligence Service?

WHY, of the 49,121 officials employed in Bavaria, are there as many as 14,443 former Nazi Party members, while since 1945 only 265 politically and 92 racially persecuted people were given jobs in the government of Bavaria?

weeks ago hardly a day passed without lamentations for the 250,000 Germans kept in Czechoslovakia because of their technical skill at the time of the expulsion of the rest of the German minority. Today they are never mentioned, and few West Germans know that they have all been resettled in their former homes in Bohemia. Russia can do many things. It can make Rokossovsky master of Poland; it could solve the problem of the refugees from the East.

The overwhelming majority of West Germans, especially the workers, are in no wise attracted by the so-called "people's democracy" of a Russian satellite state. But there is a terrifying parallel between the present and the past. Hitler did not have a majority of the people behind him and yet came to power—largely because of the weakness and apathy of his opponents. German democracy was so rotten in 1933 that it did not seem worth defending. The new, oh so tender West German democracy is already attacked by decay from within and without. The bitterest enemy of the Federated Republic, even Moscow, could not wish it to have a government different from Dr. Adenauer's.

DISCREDITING THE U. S.

How, despite all assurances to the contrary, the Neo-Nazi parties in Western Germany try by all means to discredit the United States and even its help to Germany, is evidenced through the following statements made in various meetings and assemblies of these Neo-Nazi groups:

"The Marshall Plan is no unselfish aid but rather a cleverly conceived system of the U.S. to get out more reparations from Germany. . ."

"Whatever the Americans are sending to Germany will never compensate for the value of those German patents which were stolen by the Americans. . ."

"The material for suits and dresses which the Americans are sending to Germany as gifts are of no value at all — because of their crazy colors they cannot be sold anywhere. . ."

"The reason food is being sent from the U.S. to Germany is that otherwise the Americans will have to destroy it because they have too much of it. . ."

"The Americans should be glad that now they can send their young men as soldiers to Germany; here these men can learn about culture because in the United States there exists only a superficial civilization. . ."

These statements are based on personal notes made by Dr. Robert M. W. Kempner.

". . . In preparing 'the defense of the U.S.S.R. against the Western capitalist warmongers,' the Russian general staff is said to favor assistance by the Prussians rather than the Poles. The new Wehrmacht created in the East German republic—which is expected to reach its full strength of 300,000 men by next summer—is composed principally of former SS (elite guard) troops. The ease with which this army came into existence as an active military force can be explained by the fact that these former elite troops required only a refresher course to make them fit to fight.

"These men had ample experience in all forms of warfare, but they have become somewhat rusty during the five years since Hitler's defeat. A few months of intensive training, however, has enabled them to recover their mastery of the art of war.

"In case of Soviet aggression against the West these men can be relied on far more than could the Poles. The East Germans, who have always been more warlike than the West Germans, enthusiastically accepted the Russian call to arms. They were moved less by the physical advantages—such as better living standards for themselves and their families—than by the idea that on Russia's side Prussia — and later all of Germany — might once again become a foremost power in Europe.

"After a trial period of more than a year, the Kremlin has realized that it can count on the Prussians to greater extent than it can on other satellites, although communism itself is not popular among the East Germans.

"The Kremlin is playing the nationalist game to make the Germans their loyal allies. This is not difficult, since nationalism and imperialism already have replaced ideological communism in Soviet policy itself. . ."

(From a column by Constantine Brown in the Washington Post)

". . . Disillusion in America over German policy has reached a point of disgust. And there are two conflicting kinds of discontent at precisely opposite directions.

"On the one hand are those who feel, with a great deal of reason, that the net result of American intervention in Germany is to restore to power the very industrialists who made possible Hitler's rise. The bitter critics of past blunders and deliberate intrigue are convinced that in continued dismantling of German industry is the only hope of preventing a new German war potential.

"At the other pole are those who believe that to strip Germany further is suicidal folly. They argue that 45,000,000 Germans in the West must earn their own way, that the American taxpayer cannot—and will not—go on pouring out money to sustain a dependent people willing to work.

"Even more extreme is the position of the American military. Top American military planners want to re-arm West Germany as quickly as possible as a bastion against the East. . ."

(From a column by Marquis Childs in the New York Post)

". . . Russian tactics of obstruction have been exploited shrewdly by those who wanted to rebuild a strong Germany. 'A bulwark against Communism' it is called, just as after the first World War. And so we have played into their hands and today find ourselves lined up, in effect, with the very thing we sought to destroy, and are rebuilding it. We have been caught between the right and the left because we did not have the courage of our democratic middle way for which we shed so much blood. We have compromised the idea for which we fought.

"Russia talks now of a German army in her zone. Privately our military men talk of one in our zone, though our civilian officials repeatedly deny it. Does anyone think Germans are going to fight each other? They will all line up one way or the other, and we are gambling with a nation that signed the Hitler-Stalin pact in 1939, and has much more kinship with Communism than with democracy. At the same time we are permitting the cartelists to rebuild their warmaking industry. . ."

Power Politics In Japan

R. P. MARTIN

Japanese obstructionism is keeping American aid expenditures at a higher level than they should be. Occupation officials are convinced the Japanese are diverting too large a proportion of their capital goods production into the domestic economy, instead of exporting these goods to help pay for imports. This serves a dual purpose: United States aid is being utilized to modernize Japan's industrial plant and at the same time Japan, by curtailing exports of capital goods, is retarding the industrialization of other countries which might be competitors at a future date.

One example: the Japanese Government campaigned for permission to increase steel production with the plea this would enable it to increase their exports. After permission was granted, however, the Japanese attempted to reduce rather than increase steel exports. India, for instance, tried for months to buy 60,000 tons of steel sheets but the Japanese set their price at a dollar a ton higher than the Indians could pay. This meant that the steel sheets would remain in Japan and be used in the domestic economy, instead of paying for raw materials which could be imported from India.

Although the U. S. is saving substantial sums this year on its aid program to Japan, this does not necessarily mean a bright future. Obstruction by the Japanese and failure by the U. S. to lead Japan into normal trade relations with other Asian countries, especially communist China, may mean that the U. S. will have to continue its subsidies for many years. Gen. MacArthur hopes to have Japan on a self-paying basis by 1953, but there is only one possibility of meeting this target date—if Japan can shift the great bulk of its trade from the dollar to the soft-currency areas.

The majority of the Japanese people apparently have their hearts set on a peace treaty with their former enemies. They prefer one which would guarantee their complete and absolute neutrality in the event of another war. But Japan's leaders are playing their cards deliberately and carefully to insure that their country profits to the utmost from the conflict between Russia and America.

"A LA STRESEMANN"

Premier Shigeru Yoshida told the Japanese House of Councillors that "Japan may not have to accept or may even leave the conference room in case an extremely disadvantageous peace treaty is offered to it." The following day Premier Yoshida termed this and other portions of his remarks a "slip of the tongue" and requested that they be withdrawn because they might "invite misunderstanding."

Premier Yoshida is too clever a politician and too experienced a statesman to make a "slip of the tongue" of that proportion without good reason. It seems more likely that he was warning the United States, as strongly as he could, that Japan, despite her defeat, has bargaining power. For the Communist victories in China, the bitterness of the East-West "cold war" and the ever-present possibility of a Soviet-American conflict have catapulted Japan into a position of great strategic importance.

The United States apparently wants bases in Japan, but she also wants a peace treaty which would relieve her of the occupation burdens. American thinking apparently follows the line that since Japan will be unarmed, the logical solution is for the United States to guarantee Japan's integrity and implement this guarantee by holding bases.

NEVER TO REARM?

But history has caught up with the United States. The victorious Powers agreed that Japan should never again be permitted to rearm or support any kind of military force other than that needed for internal security. Japan underwrote that agreement by adopting a constitution authored by Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The constitution renounces for all time the right to wage war.

If the Japanese did not like the peace treaty terms (for instance, if they were denied the right to develop a merchant marine or engage in whaling operations), they could refuse to sign a military agreement with the United States on the grounds that American bases in Japan would violate the American-authored constitution.

The U. S. is in an unenviable position. It wants strategic bases in Japan, but in order to get these it must offer the Japanese very advantageous terms. And if the U. S. decided that bases were unnecessary, it would still be in a tight position. For the U. S. and the other Western Powers would still be required to guarantee Japan from aggression.

Of perhaps greater importance in the long run would be Japan's position if peace terms were made with the West but without provision for United States military bases here. Both Russia and China could offer Japan great economic benefits and an even more favorable peace treaty if the two Asian Powers thought they could wean Japan away from the West. Russia could offer fishing rights such as Japan had before the war, an opportunity to help in the development of North Korea and a tremendously profitable two-way barter trade between Japan and Manchuria. Expansion of this trade could easily make Japan independent of the West.

The U. S. could offer dollars to keep Japan in the "democratic" fold. But almost any Japanese businessman will say that long-term trade with China is preferable to dollar aid which could be shut off at any time.

A NATURAL ALLY?

Many Americans apparently believe that Japan is a natural ally of the United States. That is very far from the truth. Unlike Britain and America, which are bound together by common ideological ties and a similar way of life, the Japan-America "engagement" is solely one of convenience.

If Japan becomes a partner of the West it will be in a completely cynical manner. The Japanese leaders, as is natural, will go the way they think is best for Japan—and democracy and freedom will have very little to do with the decision.

Some Japanese leaders want to side with the United States. They foresee war and an ultimate American victory. Since Japan would participate, they see themselves demanding and getting, as spoils of war, such areas as Manchuria and Formosa, which would be seized from the Chinese Communists.

As one official of the foreign office told me: "Japan would be very careful to choose the winning side. After all, we are quite tired of being losers."

Many Japanese object to a defensive alliance with the U. S. as the alternative to absolute neutrality.

The Japanese want to control their own affairs, within limitations imposed by the peace treaty, and presence of American troops here would invariably be felt in domestic issues.

Furthermore, an alliance with the U. S. would drastically limit Japan's freedom of action in the international field. The Japanese, whether the Americans like it or not, are going to chart their future course on the basis of what is best for Japan. But an alliance with America would involve Japan in Washington international policy. The U. S., for instance, might want to embargo trade with Communist China. America would feel no ill effects; its China trade is only two per cent of America's total foreign trade.

An embargo similarly applied by Japan would have disastrous consequences on Japan's economy. For trade with China may mean the difference between self-sufficiency and pauperism for Japan.

Many ultra-conservative government officials, however, are content with Japan's current status of "peace without a treaty." They are winning the "peace" hands-down. Democratic reforms are gradually being nullified; reparations have been cancelled; Japan is receiving a million dollars a day in subsidies from the United States; Japanese are gradually getting freedom to travel and participate in international conferences; the U. S. guaranteed Japan's territorial integrity, which means that the Japanese have no burden of defense costs.

WHAT THEY WANT

For six months or more the Japanese press has been talking about the advantages of "peace without a treaty." At a round-table discussion, the president of the Jiji News Service declared "it is not clear whether the conclusion of a peace treaty will be advantageous." Dr. Kisaburo Yokota, an authority on international law, declared that "Japan has benefited by delay in the opening of peace talks." Articles in a similar vein have appeared with monotonous regularity.

The Foreign Office still has decided views on the most important aspects of the peace treaty. Officials hope the treaty will incorporate provisions dealing with two of Japan's most pressing problems: its lack of raw materials and markets, and the pressure of an expanding population confined at present within the borders of an extremely poor country.

Japan's population crisis is just as pressing today at it was when the crisis was utilized as a pretext for military expansion. Japan has too many people and too little land; its farmlands are over-crowded and factories top-heavy with employes.

Japan's population is increasing at a rate of 1,000,000 a year, and by 1970 may be more than 100,000,000.

Two years ago the Japanese had hoped that Formosa, Okinawa and some other Pacific islands would be restored to them to provide room for emigration. That hope is now more or less dead, and the Japanese are hoping for permission to emigrate to sparsely populated areas, such as North Australia and New Guinea. But Australia is certain to resist such requests.

Peace in 1950 is the goal of the Japanese and the Western Powers. But considering the time consumed in agreeing on technical points, the disparity in views of the Western Allies (Australia, for instance, views expansion of Japanese fishing facilities and the problems of over population in a different light than the United States; and the Philippines regard with great concern American efforts to reestablish Japan's industrial machine), drafting of the treaty and agreement on essentials will take a long time.

As one Western diplomat pointed out: "Japan may get a treaty in 1950, if the U. S. wants it seriously enough and is willing to ram it down the throats of its Allies."

"The Germans, in their own words, have won 90 per cent of what they wanted. That is a lot. It is too much for a Germany which is mainly unregenerate, as we all know. . .

"There is no inherent harm in conciliation —even in appeasement. These may be Christian virtues. All depends on whom you appease, and to what extent, and whether you get an adequate return.

"In previous appeasements we got scraps of paper. We are getting only promises today. . .

"Some of the promises ring hollow. No one can expect us to believe that Germany does not want an army. Has a miracle occurred in her young men? Of course not. The traces of nationalism and militarism abound among them. Dr. Adenauer seems to indulge in wishful thinking. . .

"The truth is that policy toward Germany has lately been made in Germany rather than in the Foreign Office, State Department, or Quai d'Orsay. I prefer it to be home-made."

(Lord Vansittart in the London Daily Mail)

"The Russians and the Americans are worrying about which side the Germans will be on. Any Frenchman can tell you. The Germans will be on the Germans' side. They'll finish by getting more out of the Russians and the Americans than anyone else in Europe."

Business as Usual During Alterations

We Applaud . . .

. . . LYALL T. BEGGS, Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who recently said that the American "top brass" in Germany has "gone soft" and that "Nazi ideas are cropping up more and more into the open while we blink our eyes and do nothing," adding that "we cannot permit the rise of aggression again whether Communist, Fascist, Nazi or under any other name; we must be strong and vigilant; otherwise, we will help to bring on World War III, instead of stopping it while we have the chance."

. . . AMERICAN OCCUPATION AUTHORITIES in Germany for banning the vicious Nazi periodical Der Weg, of Buenos Aires, Argentina, stating that "nothing as violently pro-Nazi has appeared since the heyday of the Hitler regime."

. . . BRIGADIER GENERAL TELFORD TAYLOR, the American Military Government's chief prosecutor of Nazi war criminals for his recent warning that a resurgence of "militant nationalism in Germany is on the way," adding that "a militaristic German government . . . would be a terrible threat to world peace; it would surely seek to exploit and irritate international attention, and would regard another war as an opportunity to revive German might."

. . . GEORGE F. HALLGARTEN, visiting Professor of the University of Munich, for his fine letter-to-the-editor of the Washington Post, calling attention to the neo-Nazi activities in Munich of a rabble-rouser named Feitenhausel, who boasts that he has assembled a new personal S.A. of 2,000 men and who tried to make a comeback in Bavaria.

. . . THE DECISION of the Immigration Service of the Department of Justice to deport to Germany the former Nazi agent V. Sittler, a man who despite his dark record was permitted to become a professor at Northwestern University at Evanston, Illinois, and later at the Michigan College of Mining in Houghton.

. . . THE NEW YORK TIMES' excellent editorial titled "What to Do with Germany," in the November 20th issue of that paper, which contained the following conclusions worth quoting: "We owe it to ourselves and to our children to make certain in whatever we do about Germany that neither form of tyranny prevails against Western civilization. Because we hate the despotism of Stalin we must not be tender with any surviving relics or any newly growing sprouts of the despotism of Hitler."

. . . WALTER WINCHELL for his recent splendid column titled "The Poor, Poor Nazis," exposing various aspects of the soft-pedaling of the Nazis in Western Germany, and requesting his readers to mail the column to their respective U.S. Senators with the demand for immediate investigation of conditions in Germany.

. . . LLOYD G. SIEGL of Brooklyn for his excellent letter-to-the-editor of the New York Daily News, blasting that paper's editorial policy with regard to Germany and stating emphatically that "We should bear down on the Germans and supervise them more closely than ever before—not loosen any present restrictions."

. . . THE BRITISH COURT of Hamburg, which recently found the owners of Germany's largest shipyard guilty of illegally attempting to evade dismantling, and condemned Rudolf Blohm, senior partner of Blohm & Voss, his brother Walter, and four other defendants to prison sentences and fines.

. . . C. SEAMAN OF PALM CITY, California, for his fine letter-to-the-editor of Collier's magazine, in which, after returning from a two-and-a-half year stay in Germany, he wrote, "The Germans still say Hitler is the greatest leader Germany ever had, and as soon as we get another leader we shall again be a great nation."

. . . GERHARDT H. SEGER, the German Social Democrat and former editor of the Neue Volkszeitung, with whom we have often strongly disagreed in the past, for his excellent article, "German Rearmament Revival of Militarism," in a recent issue of the New Leader.

. . . EVARTS A. GRAHAM, Jr., staff writer of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, for his brilliant series of articles, "Germany's Future—East or West?" which in our opinion is one of the finest pieces of research done recently on the German problem.

. . . CONGRESSMAN JACOB K. JAVITS, Republican of New York, who as a member of a four-man group on a study mission for the House Foreign Affairs Committee, upon his return from Germany strongly came out opposing German rearmament "under any circumstances."

. . . SENATOR JAMES E. MURRAY for inserting the article "Whither Western Europe?" by Jean Pajus from Prevent World War III in the Congressional Record.

. . . SENATOR GUY M. GILLETTE for his letter to the State Department protesting the presence in this country of Herman J. Abs, Director of the Deutsche Bank and chief looter of the Nazi occupied countries.

. . . CONGRESSMAN ARTHUR G. KLEIN for inserting the article "There Must Not Be A Third World War" from Prevent World War III in the Congressional Record.

. . . CONGRESSMAN JOHN A. BLATNIK for inserting the article "Gravediggers at Work" from Prevent World War III in the Congressional Record.

. . . CONGRESSMAN ABRAHAM J. MULTER for inserting the article "The Malmedy Case" in the Congressional Record.

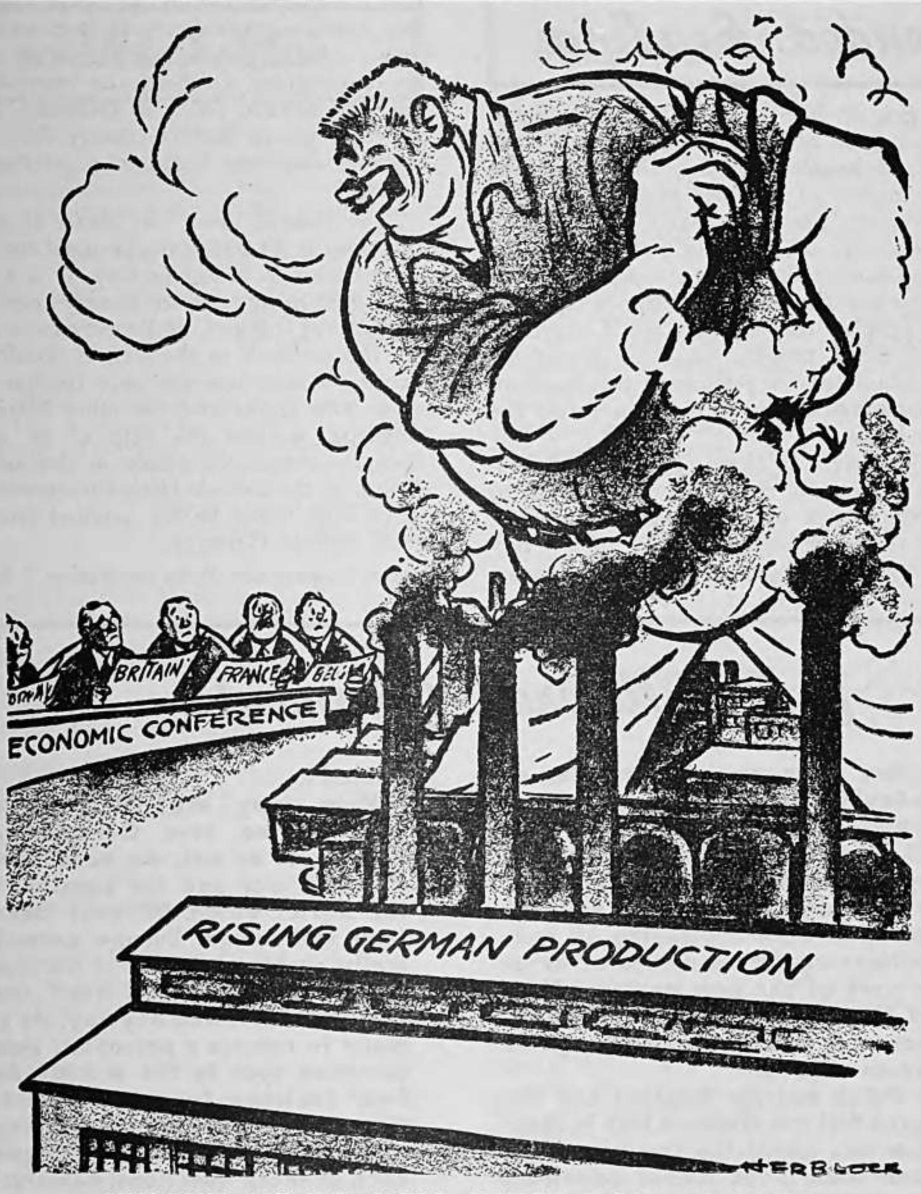
. . . DREW PEARSON for his excellent exposé on Herman J. Abs in his Washington Merry-Go-Round.

. . . THE BRITISH MILITARY COURT in Hamburg which found Field Marshal General Fritz Eric Von Mannstein guilty of war crimes and sentenced him to eighteen years in prison.

. . . JUDGE ARTHUR H. F. LEDERLE of the U. S. District Court in Newark, New Jersey, for dismissing an application by August S. Klaprott, former German American Bund leader, which the latter had made to have the 1942 revocation of his American citizenship set aside.

. . . U. S. MILITARY GOVERNMENT officials who, as reported by Jack Raymond in The New York Times, have expressed the belief that $800,000,000 requested by Washington for allotment to Germany by the Army and the Marshall Plan is too high.

. . . SENATOR HUNT of Wyoming who, returning from Germany, said, "There is no de-Nazifying a Nazi," adding that the best thing to do is to place a U. S. Superintendent over every German school and a U. S. President over every German university: "It would cost us less than the first month of World War III."



"WANT ME TO HELP UNIFY YOU AGAIN?"

Cartoon by Herblock.—Courtesy Washington Post.

". . . It is one thing, to participate in the task of economic reconstruction, to support German democratic and labor groups, many of whose leaders resisted Nazism long before we did; it is another to attempt to deny the memory, to shake hands with Nazis as if we had played a tennis match against jolly good sports and to start out anew, four years after V-E Day, as if Dachau and Buchenwald had never existed and no Americans had ever died under Nazi fire. Admittedly the Russians are now engaged in the gentle care and rejuvenation of former Nazis inhabiting the Soviet zone, but their friendship, after all, goes back to August, 1939; it was simply interrupted by Hitler's betrayal of Stalin.

We corrupt the best values in our own cause by displaying an equivalent inability to tell a totalitarian from a democrat. The handling of General Telford Taylor's report may be described as a single blunder but it is an exceptionally revealing one! It points up the essential contradiction in our national policy. We cannot let our Secretary of State grace the streets of Bonn, grasp the hand of Adenauer and speak as if Nazism were a brief chapter in man's suffering, if we remember the crimes unveiled at Nuernberg. And so the Pentagon wants to teach us to forget."

Recommended Reading

"We Survived," by Eric H. Boehm (Yale University Press. $3.75) is an excellent account of first-person stories of fourteen "of the hidden and haunted of Nazi Germany." The author, a former interrogator of German prisoners of war, has done an outstanding job. Despite the fact that his book is published rather belatedly, after a long series of similar ones, it ranks, in our opinion, undoubtedly among the best.

The Nazi victims who tell their individual stories represent a real cross section of people—Rabbis, Protestant Clergymen, noveltists, intellectuals, plain people, etc. Yale University Press ought to be congratulated for publishing this book today when only too many would like to make us forget the incredible crimes of the Nazis.

"The Struggle for Germany," by Drew Middleton (Bobbs-Merrill Co. $3.00) is an honest report by the well-known New York Times correspondent of conditions in Germany. His book is important for being completely free of any personal dogma. Having been a war correspondent for five years and a correspondent in the Soviet-Union for two years, before spending two years in post-war Germany, Middleton draws a vivid, interesting picture of the situation, based on his observations. Of particular interest are the chapters dealing with Russian policy in Germany. His main thesis is that we must insure that "Germany does not through our own mistakes fall into Communist pressure and ally itself with Russia."

"The Fateful Years," by André Francois-Poncet (Harcourt, Brace & Co. $4.00) is the personal story of the former French Ambassador to Nazi-Germany. It is a most interesting story, and while many facts are already known, it is still fascinating to read, for instance, of Poncet's meeting with Hitler, preceding the outbreak of the war. It should not be forgotten that Francois-Poncet was the only foreign diplomat able to converse with Hitler and the other Nazi bigwigs in their own language, without the help of an interpreter. Today, the book has even more interest in view of the fact that Francois-Poncet is the French High Commissioner for Germany. It is to be hoped that he has profited from his previous experiences with the Germans.

Give us a few more weeks or months of the Acheson-Bevin "Build Germany" policy and we shall hear harsh German voices "demanding" this or other forms of equality and hinting at reprisals if they do not get it.

Secretaries Acheson and Bevin will, of course, answer that they are taking all necessary precautions against a return of arrogance on the part of our new partner. They will point out that . . . the allied armies remaining in Germany will be quite enough to keep the Germans "good."

Maybe the Dutch and the Belgians and the French who have felt the German iron in their own flesh know less about the Germans than the English and Americans whose countries were not invaded. Maybe when the great shipbuilding firm of Bloom and Voss in Hamburg was caught red-handed concealing properties marked for destruction, it was not a replica of the deceit that served the Germans so well after World War One.

Maybe the nationalistic howls rising from the throats of "Democratic" German Socialists are in no sense like the protests of the same German Socialists after their first defeat in 1918. Maybe — despite the all but unanimous reports of observers including this writer — the new post-war Germans are deeply and sincerely democratic and not waiting for some new Fuehrer to lead them back to power and glory.

Maybe not.

But if they are?

At this point the defenders of the new "Build Germany" policy tend to lose their tempers.

Here they are likely to exclaim that whether the new Germans are peaceful democrats or not, we need them because of the cold war and the possible hot war with the Soviet Union. Without German industry, they will argue, Europe cannot be economically restored. Without German manpower, Europe cannot defend itself against invasion from the East. And anyway, do you want Germany to remain a poisonous slum at the most sensitive spot in the world? And can Uncle Sam continue to support forty-five million Germans in enforced semi-idleness?

There is, of course, an adequate answer to each of these questions, namely:

The same industry taken from Germany and established elsewhere would have contributed approximately the same amount to the restoration of Europe—without political danger.

It is by no means certain that "German manpower" will fight loyally on our side against the Russians, except on conditions that the West will find intolerable.

And finally, it is not necessary that Uncle Sam should cough up to keep the Germans on a level equal to that of the rest of Europe. That is for the Germans to look after.

But all this is now water over the dam. The U.S. Administration has obviously taken the decision to restore and cooperate with Western Germany. Willy-nilly, the American people have been committed to a great gamble.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir:

"Now that Germany has partially regained her former prestige, and will eventually be reinstated among those whom a few moons ago she sought to destroy, what are your future plans to offset this real menace?

"I am making a lone fight of it here, in the heart of plenty of German sympathizers.

"Please send me all data. I can and will use it to best advantage."

SGT. JOHN T. PECK.
Lincoln, Nebraska.

Dear Sir:

"As the Chairman of the Universal Relations League, I wish to thank you for the material which you have already sent to my group, and hope that you will be able to continue to send literature so that we may keep abreast of events in Germany. We are operating on a very limited budget since most of the groups are college or graduate school students, and such material is a real boon to us. . . ."

JOHN J. MORRISSEY, JR..
West Medford, Mass.

Dear Sir:

"It was 8 years ago when the Empire of Japan's airforce, under pressure of Adolf Hitler, attacked Pearl Harbor, in the Pacific, and thus officially made the United States a fighting member of the Allies of World War II.

"It was 8 years ago that every American called our enemies of then all sorts of names.

"But what is happening today?

"We pity the poor Germans, who were dragged into a war they did not want.

"We feed the poor, hungry Germans, send them soap, and clothing, and rebuild their industries, without a thought of the future. A future, that might prove even more disastrous than the last 35 years have been.

"World War II is not over by a long shot.

"World War I never was over. The period between these two world wars was just a weapon-stand-still—a suppressed war, that only flared up a little here and there, now and then.

"The Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71 was never completed. The Germans always will want Alsace-Lorraine, and the French always will want control over the Ruhr Valley.

"Instead of sending food, clothing, soap, and cigarettes to Germany; instead of us rebuilding Germany's industries, send the Germans the raw materials to grow and raise their own food, to manufacture their own clothing, and to rebuild their own industries on a limited scale—merely to improve their own economic situation and conditions—and keep the management divided under international control.

"Let Germany prove herself worthy first of the honor of being a peaceable nation among peace-loving nations of this world, by officially and in the hearts and minds of the population rebuking any ideas and power-dreams of Nazism, Communism or Fascism—and then, and only then accept Germany into the group of Western civilized Democracies. . .

"What will happen, when our occupation forces leave Germany? Which way will the Germans turn?

"Towards Communism?—Maybe.

"Towards Prussian Supremacy (Nazism)?—Could be.

"Towards Western Democracy?—No!

"Don't forget, soft-soaping a defeated nation or person will never make them see it your way. On the surface they will appear polite, nice and friendly—as long as you keep your eyes wide open and on them. But watch out, if you should ever turn your back on them, or close your eyes—the knife stuck between your ribs need not have a steel blade; it can be much worse—ridicule, sarcasm, irony and eventually World War III.

"Lest we forget—Hitler-Mussolini-Tojo; and the total support the people of Germany, Italy and Japan gave their leaders in starting and fighting the 3rd longest war since 1600, World War II."

WILLIAM OSTEN,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

". . . You may rest assured that I am in full accord with your program and shall do my share in acquainting others as to the real type of Americanism program as sponsored by your organization. . . ."

BRUNO FRANKEL,
Bronx, New York.

Dear Sir:

". . . I was quite astonished at the comprehensiveness of the material contained in your magazine. In fact, the range and detail of the material might very well serve as an 'Outline of Current History,' that is an outline illustrating how certain of our leaders are choosing for us THE SHORTEST ROUTE TO SUICIDE. I believe that suicide is the simple, accurate term for our current destination. Perhaps it is possible to be charitable regarding the causes of World War II and so allow something for ignorance. However, the lesson of the recent past is too close upon us to allow the same ignorance to be an excuse for a repeat performance. . . .

"What is most discouraging is the fact that German inventiveness culminating in its greatest triumph, 'Human Bakeries,' has not been proof enough for most people of the German capacity for destruction. Crematories are merely brushed aside as unrelated to American policy and foreign to the 'New Germany.' The failure of our Western Conscience to grasp the significance of the crematory is the strongest possible commentary on our culture and our leaders. I only hope that The Society for the Prevention of World War III will be able to exert enough influence to bring to the conscious minds of influential persons the simple fact that the 'New Frankenstein' possesses all the traits and motives of its forefather—Nazi Germany.

"Again let me thank you for your letter and material. If I can be of use to you thru some application of the written word or otherwise, I will be most happy to donate my services."

GEORGE MARQUISEE.
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir:

". . . As a former Chief Prosecutor at the Nuremburg War Crimes Trials, I am familiar with present conditions in Germany. Your observations and conclusions concerning the future danger of a German resurgence are in harmony with the conclusions of the most able of Western European diplomats.

"In addition, your publication clearly points out the dangers inherent in another alliance between Germany and the totalitarian regime of the U. S. S. R. In my opinion, the U. S. S. R. remains our primary concern, but it can not be disputed that Germanic support of the Russian foreign policy would seriously aggravate the situation and precipitate another major war . . ."

versity Press. $4.00), translated from the French and edited by Willmoore Kendall, is particularly interesting to us for its chapter dealing with the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939, in view of present Russo-German relations.

"A Treasury of Great Reporting," edited by Louis H. Snyder and Richard B. Morris with a preface by Herbert Bayard Swope (Simon & Schuster. $5.00), is a brilliant compilation of what the authors call "literature under pressure." It contains 175 masterpieces of journalism from Dickens, Victor Hugo and Mark Twain, to Walter Winchell, John Hersey, Edward R. Murrow and Quentin Reynolds. We are glad indeed that the anthology also contains two excellent reports on the first visit of U.S. correspondents to the Nazi death factories, one by Gene Currivan from the New York Times of April 18, 1945, and one by Tarick Gordon-Walker, titled "I Went to Belsen."

It is also good to find here Rebecca West's classic story on the Nuremberg war criminals (originally published in The New Yorker magazine), as well as Kingsbury Smith's brilliant eyewitness account of the execution of the Nazi bigwigs of Nuremberg.

"A Treasury of Great Reporting" is a lasting book of enormous value and we are happy that one of the editors, Louis M. Snyder, associate professor of history at the College of the City of New York, was formerly on the staff of the Society for the Prevention of World War III.

McCloy's Speech — A Turning Point?

The speech made by American High Commissioner, John J. McCloy in Stuttgart on Feb. 6th, was characterized as a "major policy" address. In reading it, however, we cannot get out of our mind the fact that Mr. McCloy took the opportunity to make this major policy speech at a time when there are bills and resolutions in Congress which call for an investigation of our policies in Germany under Mr. McCloy as well as his predecessor, General Lucius D. Clay.

Far be it from us to say that Mr. McCloy, in delivering this talk, was trying to anticipate the moves of his critics in Congress or to steal the thunder from those who have been exposing the grave shortcomings in our German policy. Regardless of the reason which impelled Mr. McCloy to make this speech, it cannot be denied that he has now openly recognized the fact that this German policy has not fared very well. We are happy indeed that Mr. McCloy has had the courage to speak up and admit some of the abuses which are manifesting themselves in Germany today. We believe that honesty is the best policy and it is our fervent hope that Mr. McCloy will continue to speak out without mincing words and without reservations or qualifications, which could mean one thing to the Germans and another to the Americans.

Not that all of the things which Mr. McCloy said were clear cut and devoid of misinterpretation. Undoubtedly, the American people are gratified by Mr. McCloy's statement: "Germany cannot be allowed to develop political conditions or military status which would threaten other nations or the peace of the world. That means that there will be no German army or air force. German security will best be protected by German participation in a closely knit Western European community."

This appears to be a clear statement which tells the Germans that they will not be able to glory again in a new Wehrmacht. But there are certain things which remain to be clarified. For example, Mr. McCloy states that the Germans would not be allowed a military status "which would threaten other nations or the peace of the world." Does this mean that the Germans could obtain military status if it were assumed that this would not be a "threat" to other nations or the peace of the world?

As a substitute for military status, Mr. McCloy declares that German security "will be best protected by German participation in a closely knit Western European community." Just exactly what does this mean? According to reliable information, circles close to Chancellor Adenauer's party and important figures in the Bonn Government are thinking of the following scheme: A German military unit should be permitted to join the defense forces of Europe. Such a unit, however, should be composed of volunteers. The German Officer Corps should be called in without establishing a German High Command. These officers would not be sworn in on the German state. In addition, there is no urgency to create a German armament industry at once as it would be far too exposed and as the production of weapons should proceed along a system of coordination. The London Economist in one of its issues advocated approximately the same kind of program. Is this also envisaged by Mr. McCloy?

While Mr. McCloy announces that Germany would not be permitted to develop an army or air force, he tells the Germans that other than this prohibition they will "have the widest freedom to shape their future." In one of our editorials, we showed that this was a contradiction and a very basic one. How can Mr. McCloy be so positive that there will be no German army when he gives them free rein to develop their industrial war potential?

It will be recalled that Germany was never disarmed after World War I because there was no provision for limiting her industrial might. Temporarily part of her army was disbanded, but there was no effective provision for restricting the rebirth of her great industrial war potential. Therefore, the attempt to keep Germany disarmed was futile, for the Allies never tackled the basis of modern armies. In the 20's and 30's, the Germans were not actually concerned with the establishment of large armed forces, but rather with the development of a heavy industry which could equip future armies. In that connection, Germany received billions from the United States to achieve this objective, and the rearmament of Germany when Hitler came to power became a comparatively simple task. Therefore, it is not sufficient for Mr. McCloy to say that Germany shall have no army, while on the other hand he permits the Germans to have the basis upon which such an army can be revived in the future.

On the question of the Saar, Mr. McCloy, who hurried to Washington after Adenauer's threats, tells the Germans that "a sensible statesman-like solution can readily be found. . . ." But why should Mr. McCloy talk about a solution of the so-called problem of the Saar when he knows very well that his government has already made firm commitments on that issue. He is fully aware that Secretary Acheson, with the approval of the President, has given full support to the French position. Under these circumstances, we are at a loss to understand the talk about a "statesman-like solution." Perhaps Mr. McCloy does not agree with the position taken by the United States? This is the opinion of the U. S. News & World Report which disclosed in its February 3rd issue that "John J. McCloy, High Commissioner for Germany, has not been pleased by the definite stand taken by the United States State Department against re-incorporation of the Saar into Germany. Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, is inclined to try to regain for his Department a larger voice in his country's policy with regard to Germany." So much for the Saar.

As regards the question of renazification of Germany, Mr. McCloy expressed his concern over the reemergence of neo-Nazi and nationalist forces. He deplored the fact that "many undesirable former Nazis and nationalist forces were finding their way back into important places" and that there was still "too much traditionalism and authoritarianism in German life." This is an important admission.

The renazification of Germany is not incidental to our present policy which ignores German history in the first place and adopts a "business as usual" approach to a problem which cannot be solved by ostrich-like methods. Mr. McCloy expresses his concern. He is appalled at the fact that the Nazis and their supporters are becoming bolder and bolder. A year ago, his predecessor, General Clay, literally declared that Nazism was dead. Of course, General Clay was indulging in wishful thinking, to say the least. Yet it was our hope that when Mr. McCloy took over, he would adopt a more realistic and effective approach to the question of denazification. What did he do?

In an interview which appeared in the December issue of the Information Bulletin put out by his office, we find him expressing his opinion on return of the Nazis to positions of power. "It is ridiculous," he said, "to say that you can exclude all these people forever from the economic, political, and social life of the community." That was only two months before his Stuttgart speech. Perhaps Mr. McCloy expressed undue optimism and is now trying to correct an erroneous approach. If this be the case, then Mr. McCloy should act now. Certainly the Nazi bigwigs could not retain their positions of influence for long if Mr. McCloy showed that he meant business. However, when he paroles criminals like Farben's George von Schnitzler and Emil Puhl, the banker who made a hobby of collecting the gold teeth of Nazi victims, can we expect the Germans to take Mr. McCloy's admonitions seriously?

We take note of Mr. McCloy's warning to the Germans that the American press is keeping the people at home informed of developments in that country. We hope that Mr. McCloy does not object to this kind of reporting which is in the true tradition of a free press. Whatever shortcomings are reported, it is better that they be aired in public rather than be concealed and accumulate to a point where they one day will explode in the face of the American people.

Mr. McCloy has also criticized various utterances on the part of the Germans "which do incalculable harm and set back the cause of Germany." Just what does he mean by that? Does Mr. McCloy want these people to keep quiet for the while until they are so strengthened that they will have no fear of producing "incalculable harm"? Does he want the neo-Nazis to stay under cover and remain silent? If this tactic were adopted—so that the German cause is not harmed—then the American people would be ignorant of the true feelings of the Germans. But what is the German cause? Is it not precisely expressed by those very elements which Mr. McCloy would like to see silenced for the while? In our opinion, the problem is not to keep them quiet nor to allow them to sound off. The real problem is to make sure that these elements are not in a position where they influence American policy.

We congratulate Mr. McCloy for certain passages in his address which we endorse wholeheartedly.

Speaking "of those Germans who would not only deny their own guilt but also seek to place the responsibility for the consequence of that guilt exclusively upon the shortcomings of other people," Mr. McCloy stated:

"There has been recently a tendency of certain spokesmen (in Germany) to jump all the way from a denial of collective guilt to an assertion that other peoples and countries are responsible for Germany's post-war difficulties and problems. . . . Such utterances . . . display a deep misunderstanding of the events of the past 17 years. They call to my mind what people are now disposed to forget—that is, the amazing docility and acquiescence of the greater part of the German population toward Nazi outrages. After all, it was these outrages which brought about the distress from which Germany now suffers and much more besides."

We cannot but applaud also another passage of Mr. McCloy's speech, namely, when he said:

"Let me emphasize, however, and this I say particularly to the political leaders of Germany: we Americans are not here exclusively to feed the German people and to promote economic recovery, nor merely to see that tanks and planes are not built. Our main purpose is to help Germany achieve political recovery. By that I mean to help the German people establish a political democracy in which they can live as free men and enjoy the benefits of their freedom. . . ."

Mr. McCloy also spoke about American policy to "foster free trade practices through a program of decartelization and deconcentration of industry." We are indeed very happy that this is American policy. It has been all along, but up to now practically nothing has been done to carry it out. Mr. McCloy knows that this has been largely due to the fact that key officials in the Military Government sabotaged the program, and General Clay backed them up. We hope that the American trustbusters who are coming over will receive a better break, but that remains to be seen too.

All in all, we would say that Mr. McCloy's speech is a recognition of the fact that the German problem will not be solved by billion dollar subsidies or that efficiency for efficiency's sake will take the Germans off

CHINESE MARKETS — A BIG STAKE

To check the growing expansion and influence of Communism, our State Department launched the policy of containment. In the words of X, reputedly to be George Kennan, writing in Foreign Affairs (July 1947), the policy of containment would "confront the Russians with unalterable counter forces at every point where they show signs of encroaching upon the interests of a peaceful and stable world." At the same time, however, that this doctrine was being put into practice, a new program for Germany was under way which, if carried to its logical conclusion, will burst asunder the chains of containment as envisaged by Mr. Kennan.

By the end of 1949, this self-defeating policy in Germany had made significant progress. The reparations program, designed to whittle down Germany's industrial war potential, was scrapped. There was a drastic revision in Germany's favor of the list of prohibited war industries. The programs for decartelization and denazification were emasculated. German heavy industry was given the green light to rebuild its terrible power.

The London Economist, in predicting the shape of things to come, declared recently: "Specifically, the Federal Government, which leans heavily on the support of the industrial and business circles, will seek to end the restriction of steel production to 11.1 million tons, the restrictions on shipbuilding, the bans on civil aviation and on the manufacture of synthetic oil and rubber, and the unilateral subordination of German heavy industry to the Ruhr."

Thus, the building up of such a Germany in the face of contracting world markets and increased competition among the nations of the world is virtually an act of setting the fuse to a powder-keg. Containing Communism —while we revitalize German economic power is like trying to build a house during an earthquake.

The Germans, given excessive economic power and capacity, will eventually open the way for new Communist expansion throughout the world. In this connection, it is well worth recalling that the rebuilding of German industry after World War I with the help of American dollars, not only gave Hitler the basis for an army, but after his defeat opened new fields for Communist expansion. This is how German heavy industry and its rulers have served the cause of democracy!

The prospect of German economic power breaking up the containment policy, is not a fantastic dream. Indeed, there is much reality to it already, as can be seen from certain events in Communist China.

The spirit of Rapalloism, born in 1922 with the Russo-German Treaty of Rapallo, continues to spread in present-day Germany. One result of the Rapallo Treaty was that German officers and generals were dispatched to China after the first World War to organize and train the Chinese armies. The Weimar Republic constantly sold weapons and arms to China and did a boom business, in violation of the Versailles Treaty. In the late twenties, high-ranking members of the German general staff shuttled back and forth between Berlin and China.

It is interesting to note that the chief protagonists in this affair were those members of the German general staff with avowed Russophile inclinations. General Hans von Seeckt himself, who is responsible for the re-creation of the German army after the first World War, went to China and stayed there for some time supervising the organization of the Chinese armies.

This chapter of history has not been forgotten by the Germans nor by the Russians—and today we are witnessing the same story all over again.

Reports from Europe disclose that a number of German agents and officers who were formerly members of the Free German Committee in Moscow, have recently left for Communist China with the intention of resuming where their predecessors left off 25 years ago. It has been reported that the Chinese Communists have purchased and received from the Russians German weapons from the last war. If this is true, the Chinese would find it very convenient to have German technicians and officers return to China to acquaint them with the use of these weapons.

Alongside of these reports, it is noted that the Russians are tempting the industrialists of Western Germany to resume business with China on the grounds that this would afford a very profitable outlet for the products of German heavy industry.

According to the Swiss daily, Tages Anzeiger of Zuerich, the first inducement of an order for China was recently extended by the Russians to the Western German industrial magnates. The paper reported that a contract was offered to the Germans to deliver 100,000 tons of railway trucks to China. The British learned about it and intervened.

Vera Micheles Dean, writing in a recent issue of the "Foreign Policy Bulletin" (published by the Foreign Policy Association), openly states that "Russia might invite Western Germany, already looking about for export outlets, to provide technicians and machinery for the industrialization of China." And she adds significantly that "such an invitation could not be lightly disregarded by any German government, whether controlled by industrialists hostile to communism, or by Communists."

Another keen observer of the political scene, Marquis Childs, recently wrote in one of his columns from Berlin: "(Leaders of the Free German Committee) are said to have gone to China where along with Russian observers they are attached to headquarters of Communist military leaders. According to one source, General Paulus himself is in Peiping. Back of all this speculation is the solid fact that the owners and managers of German industry want to find an outlet for their products and their skills in Eastern Europe and Asia."

It is therefore not surprising that German industrialists as well as conservative and right-wing politicians see their great chance for the future in an alliance with the back of the American taxpayer. His frankness in recognizing the rise of Nazism should be applauded and in our judgment emphasizes the need for an impartial investigation of the occupation—with the cooperation of Mr. McCloy. Honesty is always the best policy, and it is our hope that Mr. McCloy will continue to proceed along the paths which he appeared to outline in his speech and to finally formulate a positive program for Germany which will strengthen American security and the welfare of our Western Allies.

Soviet Russia. A typical example is Herr Josef Mueller, vice-president of the Christian Democratic Party. As reported by Drew Middleton in The New York Times, Mueller "seeks the immediate expansion of trade with the Eastern German Communist state and Eastern Europe." The German industrialists know that a trade agreement with Eastern Germany and with the countries behind the iron curtain would pave the way for gigantic markets in Communist China.

MODEL NAZIS

"Five men were freed from the Landsberg War Crimes prison recently. In 1945 all had been sentenced by the Nurenberg tribunal to serve five-year terms; they were released months ahead of schedule. Among those so favored were these illustrious citizens of Hitler's Reich:

"S.S. Gen. Ernst Wilhelm Bohle, once the Nazi-designated fuehrer of all Germans living outside the Third Reich. In that role Bohle directed Nazi espionage and propaganda on a world scale. In 1938 Bohle was thundering: 'Citizens of the Reich cannot have one view of life and those outside our borders another. We demand that Reich citizens abroad shall be permitted to shape their life within the German colony according to Nationalist Socialist principles . . .'

"Georg von Schnitzler, a director of the infamous I. G. Farben cartel, found guilty of plundering occupied nations. The Nurenberg judgment against von Schnitzler read: 'He was the leading figure in Farben's general policy designed to achieve domination of the dyestuff and chemical industries of Europe.'

"Dr. Emil Puhl, director and later vice-president of Hitler's Reichsbank which converted into war cash the gold teeth and jewelry taken from slaughtered concentration camp prisoners and gas chamber victims. The Nurenberg verdict: guilty of crimes against civilian populations.

"Karl Holdt, a Wehrmacht general who served in France, Greece and Russia and was a major strategist in plotting the invasions of Poland and Yugoslavia. At Nurenberg he was found guilty of atrocities against war prisoners and civilians.

"Joseph Alstoetter, a top official of Hitler's ruthless Ministry of Justice, sentenced for membership in the criminal S.S.

"American officials stolidly explain that these five distinguished leaders of the dark Nazi age are being paroled for 'good behavior' during the four years they served at Landsberg. They didn't kill a soul while they were in jail . . .

"The reprieve in the setting of modern Germany is a frightening symbol of our competition with the Russians to woo the favor of unreconstructed Nazis—just five years after the Battle of the Bulge. We wonder how Adolf Hitler would have fared if he had survived long enough to go on 'good behavior'; he might have been enormously helpful around the jail, painting things, writing books and never shooting anyone."

(Editorial in the New York Post)

The possibility of closer ties between Germany and Soviet Russia through such arrangements would open up new areas for Germany's industrial power. The German industrialists are aware that Moscow needs and wants the industrialization of Communist China and who would be better equipped for carrying out such a gigantic task than the industrial war lords of the Ruhr! Needless to say, these industrialists are solely concerned with the profitability of such a venture as it would enhance their power, just as the German militarists would be happy to practice their art in China for reasons of their own. The Russians, on the other hand, believe that they can use these German ambitions for their own political aims in the Far East.

The West German Government "has distorted the true picture of economic revival by altering the index of industrial production to make the state of recovery appear less than it actually is."

(Jack Raymond, in a dispatch to the New York Times)

"It will strike many in the United States as unpleasant, but it is nevertheless true that if the West is to retain its position and prestige among those it favors in Germany, it cannot return to government-by-fiat. All the signs—growing nationalism, return of Nazis and nationalists to important office, slowly gathering sentiment for remilitarization—may indicate that this would be the correct course. But the day is past when the United States—or its Allies—can say "Do this" or "Do that" in Germany. For this would give aid and comfort not only to the Russians but to the fiercely nationalist right-wing groups who, in the end, through their affinity with the extreme left, may compound with the Soviet Union a danger that will make our present difficulties insignificant."

(From a dispatch by Drew Middleton to the New York Times)

Thus, every plant not dismantled and every concession granted to Germany which helps to rebuild her industrial war potential in the Ruhr, undermines our policy of containment. The Germans, however, will not only reach out to China, but their economic power will impel them to seek every means possible to extend their influence at the cost of our containment policy. More than that, it will be the American taxpayers who, through their billion dollar subsidies to Germany, will be contributing to the breakdown of the containment policy.

Do our policy makers in Washington favor such a course of action? Do they agree that American policy in Germany should undermine the containment policy against Communism? They act as if they would.

BLACKMAIL TACTICS

Some weeks ago Chancellor Adenauer of the Bonn Government informed U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy that unless German demands on the Saar were met, the Bonn Government might reject cooperation with the West.

Adenauer's curt warning to Mr. McCloy received considerable publicity and now we find that the Saar has become one of the great "problems" that needs to be "solved."

Recalling how German reparations became a great "problem" to be "solved," we are not at all surprised that now it is the Saar which should come under the German axe. The Germans and their mouthpieces in this country are not unwilling to debate the future of the Saar. Indeed, they are trying to give the impression that it is a question which can be debated pro and con. They want to make it appear as though the Allied powers were unprepared to meet this issue and that there had been no commitments or agreements made on this subject.

In truth, however, the issue of the Saar was resolved several years ago by agreement among the U. S., France and Great Britain. It was an agreement which accepted the French position that the economy of the Sarr should be integrated with that of France.

Under these circumstances one may ask the question why the Germans should at this time pretend that the Saar is a lively and unresolved problem. It is not hard to find an answer. Recall for one moment that the Allied powers made solemn agreements and pledges regarding the delivery of German reparations to the victimized nations. Those agreements were emasculated beyond recognition thanks to the undermining work of the Germans and their cartel supporters in the United States and Britain. This was precedent enough to prompt the Germans to raise the "question" of the Saar. By granting the Germans concession after concession it is only natural that they should now be howling about the Saar.

We have stated on innumerable occasions that the German appetite is insatiable. They have never and will never reconcile themselves to the fact that the world is changing and that the peoples of Europe as well as the vast majority of Americans are no longer in the mood to accept a Germany which aims to dominate her neighbors economically or politically.

The world obtained a preview of the German position on the Saar when the Bonn Parliament first met last year. On that occasion German politicians vied with each other in drumming up nationalistic and chauvinistic sentiment. They said then that they would never be satisfied until all "their territories" were returned to the Fatherland, including the Saar. This ominous development was ignored by Allied officials in Germany who regarded this imitation of a Hitler rally as a healthy sign of democracy. The nationalist politicians were defended on the grounds that they were exercising free speech and that it was far safer to allow them to sound off in public rather than conspire behind closed doors. Consequently, the Allied occupation authorities preferred to sit on their hands while the German propaganda arsenal continued to blast away at Allied policy.

This is the genesis of the so-called Saar issue. After having allowed the Germans to build up a very cunning propaganda story about the importance of the Saar to the Fatherland, it would be asking too much for the Allies to take drastic action at this time to silence them.

Thus we are now presented with the so-called problem of the Saar which actually had been disposed of three years ago. The Germans became so emboldened in their campaign that they even threatened to break off trade negotiations with the French until they received complete satisfaction.

The German propaganda machine works on all fronts. Some of their leading politicians made fiery speeches which would have endeared them to Adolf Hitler. One of these harangues was made by Thomas Dehler, Minister of Justice in the Adenauer Government. Dehler was the gentleman who initiated the drive to free German war criminals on the grounds that the conviction of Hermann Goering and his henchmen would have never taken place today because things are regarded with more "dispassion." In his speech at Hamburg Herr Dehler attacked France for "starting" the first World War. He denounced the International Control of the Ruhr. He declared that it was a "myth" that Germany was an aggressor nation. Dehler declared that France was responsible for World War I and for the rise of Adolf Hitler!

Other politicians took up the Dehler line which undoubtedly made a great hit with the Germans. When the French protested, Dr. Adenauer told the press that the Dehler statement was "thoroughly improbable." On the other hand, Paul Bourdin, who was Public Relations officer for the Adenauer government let it be known that there was no fundamental difference of opinion between Dr. Dehler and Dr. Adenauer.

In reality there is no contradiction between the denials of Dr. Adenauer and the assertions made by his Public Relations officer. Dr. Adenauer is an old fox and knows how to play a double game. On the one hand he does not want to cause too much opposition among the occupying powers, and on the other hand Dehler's agitation is very helpful insofar as it increases Adenauer's bargaining power.

According to one report, the German strategy "seems to be to keep the question alive rather than to expect any speedy settlement." This is exactly what Mr. Adenauer is trying to do and this is certainly in line with the past performances of blackmail tactics pursued by former German governments.

While it is true that there is no treaty of peace with Germany as yet, it is also a fact that the fundamental principles with regard to the disposition of the Saar have been settled. In accordance with these agreements, France has gone ahead to develop the Saar in relationship to her own industries. The resources of the Saar have been integrated with those of Lorraine, and this has helped the French to recover from the devastating German occupation. The Saar has become, in fact, an intrinsic part of the French economy. In this connection, both France and the inhabitants of the Saar have benefited from these arrangements. Indeed, without the Saar, France today would be in an inferior position economically to that of Western Germany.

These are the fundamentals which attest to the correctness of the agreements made by the Allies on the Saar. They also explain the reason why the Germans are so violent in their opposition. In their long range plans the Germans hope to regain their former position of economic superiority and thereby reduce France to a subordinate role. Without the Saar it would not be easy for the Germans to accomplish this objective.

Therefore, in terms of the defense of Western Europe as well as the recovery of Germany's neighbors, the Saar must stay out of the German economic orbit.

Ever since our Germany Firsters have taken hold of the reins of the occupation, the United States has been losing friends in France and in other countries of Western Europe. This process was greatly accelerated after we consented to scuttle the German reparations program. We predict that if the United States should consent to any program which would nullify the original agreements and commitments on the Saar, we would alienate the overwhelming majority of the French people and many other nations in Western Europe.

Perhaps it was in recognition of this fact that Secretary Acheson told a press conference on January 18 that the United States, with the approval of the President, had supported and would continue to support the French position "which was that the Saar should be detached from Germany and that it should be financially and economically integrated with France." This is the least that we can do in terms of making sure that the Saar never becomes a part of Germany's industrial war potential.

United States support on this issue will most certainly receive the warm response of the French and other peoples of Western Europe. We think it will receive the firm support of all security-minded Americans.

AGRICULTURAL REFORM—WHEN?

Every now and then we are obliged to turn to the food situation in Germany because it is of fundamental importance in analyzing the real needs of the German economy. We have shown through facts and figures that the German food situation since the end of the war has been no worse than that which has obtained in the countries which were ravaged by the German armies. In spite of this fact, the Germans have received A-1 priority in food shipments from the U. S. which has been accompanied by an overwhelming propaganda campaign. We have declared time and again that this great concern over the German food situation has been often motivated by other than humanitarian principles.

The real reason for this agitation was to provide an excuse for the preserving of Germany's industrial war potential which, according to the Germany-Firsters, would produce products in exchange for necessary food stuffs. It was this spurious argument which helped to scrap a great many of our agreements, including those on reparations.

Naturally it has not been a pleasant task for us to expose this propaganda for it could be misinterpreted as a denial of the fact that hunger knows no boundaries. However, we have never for a moment advocated a policy which would deprive the Germans of necessary foodstuffs. All we have said is that the Germans, during the early post-war period, were eating much better than official statistics showed and that they could have a better diet if they were willing to rationalize their agriculture. This also pre-supposed an Allied program which would have been realistic and effective. It did not work out that way because the Germans deliberately created one obstacle after another, and the Allied authorities tolerated this sabotage.

In assessing the potential resources of German agriculture, we asked the following question: how could one know just exactly what the Germans need in the way of foodstuffs when they have not exhausted all the possibilities of producing indigenous agricultural products. That question, which touches the core of the problem, was never answered. The other day, however, we got an answer from Mr. Charles Bingham, an American businessman, who was former chief of the Foreign Trade Division of the Joint Export Import Agency at Frankfurt. In early February, he spoke before the Commerce and Industry Association in New York where he discussed matters pertaining to German trade and economics.

Among other things, Mr. Bingham said, "the basic need of Germany and of all of Europe is to produce more food especially of the basic types which Europe lacks, namely, bread, grain, sugar, fats and oils". In this connection, he said, "a program of land consolidation is necessary before any mechanization can be applied to German agriculture. Through consolidation of land and through improvement of animal husbandry, the food production in Germany can be increased from 10 to 25%". This pertinent information received scant attention and it needs to be aired even more now than ever before. Mr. Bingham implicitly reveals that the Germans, thanks to our paternalism, have refused to modernize and expand their agriculture.

This is confirmed by Mr. Robert Hanes, chief of the ECA in Germany. He recently wrote a sharp letter to Dr. Adenauer reminding him of the importance of increasing agricultural production in Germany. Mr. Hanes brought out the fact that 70% of total U. S. aid to Germany has gone for food. On the other hand, he disclosed that less than 10% of Germany's counterpart funds have been assigned to the development of agricultural resources. If Mr. Hanes is incensed about this situation, he should not only blame the German politicians and land owners, but those Allied officials who have tolerated this state of affairs.

In the U. S. Zone alone, 1,235,000 acres owned by 700 individuals and organizations were to be subjected to land reform, but as of April, 1949, only 71,000 acres were redistributed! This in spite of the fact that the law for land reform was passed 3 years ago. The failure to reform German agriculture has provided the excuse for the Germans to ask for more handouts at the expense of the American taxpayer, who thus are not only subsidizing German exports, but also supporting feudal conditions on the land in Germany. In terms of social as well as economic significance, this state of affairs is definitely detrimental to the democratization of the German people.

But apparently the Germans are not at all concerned. The Bonn regime has finally done away with rationing with the exception of sugar. They have done so, not because they have earned the right but because our policy, in fact, guarantees that no matter how little they produce, Uncle Sam will make up the difference. In contrast to the plethora of foodstuffs in Germany today, our British Allies are still under rationing controls. As a further contrast, we point to the millions of peoples throughout the world who are living on a starvation diet and who have never attacked the United States.

The question of a self-sustaining Germany is directly related to the problem of agricultural reforms. Even Mr. Charles Bingham, who is all in favor of unlimited German industry, admits "there is literally no prospect that Germany within the foreseeable future can pay for American goods except through Marshall aid or through the increasing of German imports to America." The problem of importing to the United States, however, is not one which concerns the Germans alone. They are in for a rude awakening if they believe that they can recapture their old markets. Certainly with such poor prospects, there is no point in defending a program which emphasizes a huge industrial potential which will be able to produce the commodities which are supposed to be exchanged for foodstuffs.

If the Germans want to eat better and on a more stable basis and if the American taxpayers hope to be relieved of subsidizing German food imports, then agricultural reforms must be instituted and the sooner that is done, the better for all concerned.

THE TAXPAYERS "MUST"

Once upon a time the Allies made an agreement which stated, "in the imposition and maintenance of economic controls established by the Control Council, German administrative machinery shall be created and the German authorities shall be required to the fullest extent practicable to proclaim and assume administration of such controls. Thus it should be brought home to the German people that the responsibility for the administration of such controls and any breakdown in these controls will rest with the Germans themselves."

The idea that the Germans should be held responsible for the solution of their own problems was stressed by President Roosevelt as early as August 26, 1944, when he criticized the original Military Government handbook for Germany which had been prepared by the War Department. This view was also clearly expressed in the Joint Chiefs of Staff Directive 1067 to the Commander-in-Chief of United States forces in Germany, April 1945: "You will estimate requirements of supplies necessary to prevent starvation or widespread disease or such civil unrest as would endanger the occupying forces. Such estimates will be based upon a program whereby the Germans are made responsible for providing for themselves out of their own work and resources." In short, this was official U. S. policy, but things did not work out as originally conceived by either the President or the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

On the contrary, the real program pursued in Germany was one of paternalism. The American people were told that it was their obligation to see to it that every German was well-fed, well-clothed, and well-housed. It was such an unusual policy toward a nation which had committed horrible crimes against humanity, that even General Clay, in an unguarded moment, admitted that no other conquered nation had ever been treated with such consideration as the Germans.

It did not take long for the Germans to catch on to this spoon feeding policy and all that it implied. They put on an act of helplessness which to this day has reaped rich dividends. As a result, the American taxpayers have been obliged to pour billions into Germany and the end is by no means in sight.

The strange part about this situation is that very early in the game the Germans demanded complete freedom from Allied control. Our officials rushed in and said this was a wonderful thing because the Germans were learning the art of self-government. But there was a catch to all this. While the Germans demanded and received unprecedented powers they never let go of the fat money bags which Uncle Sam is placing at their disposal year after year. In short, they have achieved the miraculous; they are not only eating their cake but they have it as well.

The Germans are enjoying the ride on Uncle Sam's gravy train and they have no intention of getting off. They want to do and go as they please and they want their generous Uncle to finance whatever actions they decide to take. They make no bones about that. For example, Ernest Leiser, chief correspondent for the Overseas News Agency in Germany, reveals that the new German economic policy has encouraged the importation of many luxury and semi-luxury items, including goose liver and other non-essentials. On the other hand, this same policy has de-emphasized German exports which, it will be recalled, were supposed to be the "key" to European recovery.

Mr. Leiser reports that American officials are becoming critical, declaring that the Germans are living far beyond their means today, while the United States foots the bill. But this does not disturb Herr Ludwig Erhard, the Economic Minister for the Bonn Government. On the contrary, he told Mr. Leiser, "in spite of our increases in production, it will be difficult to balance the economy by 1952. It is up to the United States. The Americans must furnish the industrial capital we need and must lower its tariffs against our exports if we are to be self-supporting."

Note the word "must." This is a favorite expression of the Germans and they know how and against whom to use it. Herr Erhard's ultimatum was seconded by that paragon of German ingenuity, Hjalmar Schacht. Schacht was never an admirer of democracy and he does not hesitate to say so. "What is called democracy in Germany today is nothing but the empty trappings of the occupying powers." After mocking democracy, Mr. Schacht then assumes the same "must" attitude as Herr Erhard. "Let them (the Allies) abolish Germany's distress," Herr Schacht demands, "and there will never be a Hitler era again." Schacht, who should have been hung at Nuremberg with Goering et al, is not speaking for himself. He has become a favorite oracle of influential Germans and his views are rapidly becoming official German policy.

We are not interested here in the substance of these statements, but rather in the implications of the ultimata thrown out to the Allies by Erhard and Schacht. Herren Erhard and Schacht have made it clear that we, that is, the American people, "must" abolish Germany's "distress" and if additional billions are not forthcoming, then the Germans will take the path of Hitler.

We must bear in mind the fact that there are scores of nations which were devastated just as much and even more than Germany. Yet, is it not strange that only the Germans seem to have the predilection for Hitlers as a way out of their distress?

It is immaterial at this moment whether the Germans are bluffing or not. More important is the fact that their arrogance is a logical result of our paternalism. It does not matter if in compliance with these ultimata we rush into Germany with additional billions for that will not appease these people; Munich did not appease Hitler. The question, therefore, is how long will the American people take it.

If some of our readers believe that we are exaggerating when we say that the Germans still think the world owes them a living, permit us to quote from the London Economist of January 31, 1950:

"The Germans would like to return—and find it hard to grasp why this should not be so — to the days of Schacht and Funk, when almost every European country had to sell more or less unrequited exports in return for block balances in Berlin. The idea of getting something for nothing is deeply imbedded in the German mind."

SOVIETS FLIRT WITH GERMAN RIGHTISTS

"Some 4,000,000 Germans with Nazi leanings may be laying the groundwork for another Hitler who could, ironically, lead his followers right into the camp of Red Russia." Thus an Associated Press dispatch from Frankfurt called attention to a development which does not come unexpectedly to those who have carefully followed the trend of political events in Eastern and Western Germany.

For some time now, it has been obvious that strange cross-connections exist between some of the neo-Nazi groups and parties in Western Germany and their counterparts in Eastern Germany, officially sponsored by the Soviets. It is a matter of record that the extreme right-wing Nationalists and neo-Nazi in Western Germany hate and despise the West German Republic. They represent approximately 12% of Western Germany's 31,000,000 eligible voters. They have three common aims:

1. to disparage democracy
2. to build a powerful militant Germany
3. to fight for a united Germany.

Today it is no longer a secret that these extreme right-wingers and neo-Nazis are being openly courted by the Soviets. The drive for reunification of Germany was a clever move on the part of the Russians to woo these right-wing groups and personalities into their camp. The Russians know that nothing attracts a German right-winger more than a battle-cry for reunification of the Reich. As a result, the "National Front" sponsored by the Russians has gained adherents among the most reactionary and right-wing elements in Germany.

According to Drew Middleton of the New York Times, Communist pressure for the unification of Germany is directed especially against Western Germany's estimated 10,000,000 refugees; this pressure is exerted "through the medium of the radical right-wing political groups." Many of these rightists have recently taken an outspoken pro-Soviet orientation. These Nationalists include all kinds of people. Among them are industrialists who hope for a strong authoritarian state that will force the worker to slave labor levels. There are former officers with their passion for a revival of militarism. And there is finally a scattered fringe of anti-Semites, professional rowdies and opportunists.

Drew Middleton reports that German right-wing leaders not only follow the Soviet line, but look for financial support either from industrial and commercial interests who see better economic prospects in a united Germany, or from the Russians who dispense money now for future "cooperation." As far as Communist propaganda on the refugees from Eastern Germany is concerned, we should like to quote from Drew Middleton's dispatch:

"Soviet political strategists have penetrated a mass of often conflicting, never simple factors in Western Germany's political situation to establish a dual basis for action.

"The first is that the refugees, largely unemployed and many of them living in desperate poverty, present an area for political agitation unparalleled in any Western European country since the advent of the Marshall Plan.

"The second is that since most of these refugees have fled or been expelled from Central or Eastern Europe, they are not receptive to communism, but will listen to those right-wing politicians whose goals, in many cases, are in accord with the initial steps in the Soviet program for Germany.

"The principal goal is unity, which to the refugees means an eventual return to their homelands or at least resettlement in the more familiar Eastern area, where, they are told, there is work for all.

"To the Russians unity means a reunited Germany in which, if the Communists are not at first the dominant party, they at least will have a chance to achieve domination of all Germany, and all that this means to the long-term plans of the Soviet Union."

Little wonder, therefore, that the propaganda for a united Germany with the capital in Berlin gains momentum, and it is not surprising that hand in glove with this propaganda, slogans now appear telling the Western Allies to "go home."

This fits perfectly into the pattern of Soviet strategy: on the one hand a drive for a strong united Germany and on the other hand the prospect of the withdrawal of the occupation troops. It is obvious that every German, leftist or rightist, will endorse such objectives.

INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE POLICY

The International Chamber of Commerce, which has branches in many countries, including the United States, is ostensibly devoted to the creation of sound economic relations throughout the world. This is a very fine purpose and it is a goal which is shared by all peoples concerned with the strengthening of peace and security through world prosperity.

International cooperation received a terrible blow when Hitler launched his wars of aggression. One would expect that international organizations, such as the I.C.C., would have had to curtail some of their activities, in view of the fact that the free world was engaged in a life and death struggle against totalitarian forces. But this was not the case with the I.C.C.

The German Economic Press Review, prepared under the direction of Allied authorities in Germany, disclosed the following information with regard to the activities of the I.C.C.: "Since its foundation after World War I, this economic organization took up a genuinely business-like stand toward all economic policy matters which arose in abundance during the time between the two wars. It gave as much consideration to German suggestions as to those of other countries. The connections between the I.C.C. and the German business world have actually never been severed."

We have come across too many of these "business as usual" approaches during the time when American boys were sacrificing their lives, to be shocked by this disclosure. Nevertheless, we believe that our readers should be acquainted with some aspects of the I.C.C. It has great prestige and as a matter of fact is one of the few international organizations which has consultative status with the Economic Social Council of the United Nations. The United Nations was originally formed out of those states which banded together in a common effort against the Germans. Under these circumstances, it seems to be an incongruous situation that among its member non-government agencies there should be an organization which dealt with the Germans during the war.

The fact that the I.C.C. never severed its relations with the former enemy of the United Nations prompted us to examine this organization, and our preliminary findings show that its pro-German inclinations are indeed very pronounced.

For example, the Honorary President of the I.C.C. is one F. H. Fentener van Vlissingen. With few exceptions, there was no one in Holland during the German occupation who so actively collaborated with the invaders than van Vlissingen. Van Vlissingen helped finance and operate a silk plant in Germany which made parachutes for Goering's Luftwaffe. He was the leading spirit in the huge international rayon cartel, A.K.U., located in Holland.

The infamous Deutsche Bank, headed by Herman J. Abs, maintained very "excellent relations" with the A.K.U. group through van Vlissingen, according to U. S. Government sources. Through Abs' close ties with van Vlissingen, Abs was appointed vice-chairman of the A.K.U. in 1939.

Baron Kurt von Schroeder, Hitler's SS banker, told American investigators that the Deutsche Bank obtained the majority of the shares of A.K.U. Abs and van Vlissingen divided their labors directing the affairs of the A.K.U. According to von Schroeder, the German shareholders were told by Abs how to vote, while the Dutch shareholders were instructed by van Vlissingen. Van Vlissingen's tie-ups with the Deutsche Bank were very close. According to a key official in the Speer Ministry for Armaments and War Production, van Vlissingen "was a customer of the Deutsche Bank. They valued his account very much."

American investigators found that van Vlissingen "had considerable interests in German heavy industry, mostly where the Deutsche Bank figured prominently. His ties with the leaders of German industry and state were strengthened with his family's relationship with Joachim von Ribbentrop, the Nazi foreign minister, and the Henkell family. He was a commander in the Hitlerite order of the German Eagle, and subsequently cooperated with the Germans during the occupation of Holland."

In 1945, the Subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee characterized van Vlissingen as an "arch collaborationist" of the Nazis. In addition to his German industrial holdings, the Senate Subcommittee revealed that he had important property interests in the United States which were vested by the United States Alien Property Custodian in 1943.

During the years 1928-1938, van Vlissingen was a director of the German steel trust. In the same approximate period, according to the Subcommittee, van Vlissingen was President of the International Chamber of Commerce. Eight weeks after the Dutch capitulation to Germany, van Vlissingen joined up with the National Committee for Economic Collaboration with the Nazis. This organization was superceded by the Committee for Industrial Organization "which had as its admitted task, the gearing of Dutch economic production to the needs of the German war machine in Holland." It was Adolf Hitler, who, in July 1937, decorated van Vlissingen with the Star Merit Cross of the German Eagle.

Van Vlissingen visited the United States ostensibly to attend a session of the I.C.C. in December, 1945. He told a press conference that the United States should provide Holland with $1,000,000,000 in order to heal the wounds of war. Van Vlissingen did not tell his press audience that he helped in no small way in making it possible for the Germans to devastate Holland.

Another important bigwig in the International Chamber of Commerce is Lord Riverdale of Sheffield, England, who is the Honorary Chairman of the Budget Commission of the I.C.C. Riverdale has always been a pro-German and is a close friend and collaborator of van Vlissingen. Riverdale's attitude toward Germany was revealed by the London Telegram of October 23, 1933, a few months after Hitler seized power in Germany. He was quoted as having said, "Will the Germans go to war again? I do not think there is any doubt about it, and the curious thing about it is that I am almost persuaded that some day we shall have to let the Germans arm or we shall have to arm them.... One of the greatest menaces of peace in Europe today is the totally unarmed condition of Germany." Lord Riverdale should have consulted Brig. Gen. J. H. Morgan who, as the British representative for carrying out the demilitarization of Germany after World War I, revealed that the Germans had never been disarmed.

Lord Riverdale, who is a British steel tycoon in his own right, was of course a strong advocate of the appeasement policy which finally brought England to ruin. But his conscience apparently never got the best of him. Indeed, after having attended the same session of the I.C.C. with van Vlissingen in New York, Riverdale told an American press conference that German industry—steel in particular—must be revived without delay. "I think," he declared, "there most certainly will be a German steel industry again. . . . Germany must become a strong industrial nation once again."

The influence of these two gentlemen in the I.C.C. must be very strong indeed, considering the programs which the I.C.C. has advocated with regard to Germany.

For example, in its pamphlet on the economic conditions of Germany and their international repercussions which appeared in 1947, the I.C.C. stressed the "importance" of reviving Germany's industrial power for the alleged purpose of stimulating economic recovery in Europe. The pamphlet stated, "the world and Europe especially needs every contribution that Germany can make to general rehabilitation." It deplored the "continued paralysis of Germany's productive powers since the end of the war."

The I.C.C. believed that this so-called productive paralysis was the result of certain factors including denazification. Thus it said, "The long drawn-out nature of the denazification policy has had serious effects on the efficiency of government and industry. Suitable men fear to put themselves forward lest they should be victims of jealous (sic) denunciation. Decisions are too long delayed and prevent able and experienced men from filling responsible positions." Was the pamphlet referring to Herman Abs, Hjalmar Schacht, Krupp, or the gang of criminals that ran I.G. Farben?

As for decartelization, the pamphlet expressed dismay over the "uncertainty about the future ownership of German industry [which] has resulted from the American policy of decartelization and the declared British policy of decartelization." The pamphlet spoke about the "dangers" of decartelization which has made "German industrialists and managers completely uncertain of their future status and property rights with a consequent adverse effect on production."

Apparently, the I.C.C. was more interested in what they called "efficiency" than justice and human rights. As far as property rights are concerned, which the I.C.C. is so anxious to uphold, the pamphlet did not take to task the Germans for looting the properties of other peoples and countries. In their practical way of looking at things, this must have been "water under the bridge".

The entire pamphlet stresses the importance of building up Germany, of having export markets for the herrenvolk, yet it contains a very curious comment: "It is likely that the beneficial effect of an increase in German trade will tend to become progressively less if German trade revives, as the most urgent of other nations' needs are supplied and the competitive element becomes stronger. It is also probable that a German export trade artificially concentrated on light industries (as envisaged under the first Level of Industry Plan), will have fewer beneficial effects on Europe's economy and more harmful effects from a competitive point of view than an export trade which was allowed to develop along 'natural' lines. Security reasons may make such a concentration desirable but it would be unwise to overlook the disadvantages to competitors of forcing German competition on a comparatively narrow group of products."

This is a very interesting statement as it reveals that the International Chamber of Commerce opposed the original American program for Germany which sought to reduce the war potential in her heavy industries and encouraged the development of light industries. But the I.C.C. was not concerned with the security of other nations which in the past have been the victims of German heavy industry's products, guns and tanks, but was more anxious to avoid hypothetical repercussions resulting from an intensification of the light industries.

To those who are informed on cartels, the I.C.C.'s fears are understandable. They know that it is far more difficult to straight jacket competition in the field of light industries, whereas in heavy industry, effective apparatus can be set up, such as cartels and trusts, which can exercise proper controls over the danger of "undue" competition. In other words, the I.C.C. was making a plea for the resumption of the cartel structure in German heavy industry which could be more easily controlled. Security did not figure into the calculations of the I.C.C. It was more interested in resuming the old business methods in Germany which caused so much ruin and misery throughout the world.

The pro-German slant in I.C.C. policy is therefore unmistakable. Whether by coincidence or otherwise, it has found influential advocates among some of our high officials.

GERMAN BANKS

A short while ago the press reported that a group of American trustbusters had been sent to Germany to take up the fight against the German cartels. Up to the present, every round has been won by the Germans who, strangely enough, have had Americans in their corner coaching them on how to deliver the most effective blows against the Allied decartelization program. We sincerely hope that this will not occur during the

". . . A few weeks ago Mr. McCloy assured the world that the revival of German nationalism was inconsequential. Now all that is changed. Most important, McCloy revealed that the U. S. will not tolerate the resurrection of a German army and air force. . . .

"An even more meaningful clue to the course of our policy in Germany may be the ultimate fate of those leading Nazi war criminals who have so far evaded the noose. . . . McCloy was said to be weighing pleas for an amnesty for some of Hitler's most distinguished lieutenants. What happens to these men will be viewed throughout the world as a measure of the earnestness of McCloy's speech. He has said in effect that the Soviet threat will not blind us to the peril of armed German fascism. Execution of the top Nazis whose death was decreed at Nuernberg would be a new and needed reassurance to those Germans who never did business with Hitler."

We hope that this new investigating team will not overlook the German banking system. A great deal of noise has been made about the so-called reorganization of German banking along the lines of our Federal Reserve System. The reorganization of the German banking system took place shortly before currency reforms were instituted and was supposed to break up the banking monopoly enjoyed, in particular, by the Deutsche and Dresdner Banks. Accordingly, a central reserve bank for all of West Germany was set up which is called the Bank Deutscher Laender. In addition, each of the eleven states in the German West Federation has its own autonomous central bank which is directly linked to the Bank Deutscher Laender. The BDL has enormous powers of credit and ostensibly is the ultimate controller of banking policy throughout Western Germany. Private banks, such as the Deutsche and Dresdner, have been "broken up" so that according to the regulations no private German bank may maintain branches in more than one state. This was to prevent these former banking monopolies from regaining control over German industry.

We do not question the sincerity of those who instituted this reform. We are certain that German banks will no longer be allowed to include the gold teeth of concentration camp victims as part of their assets. Nevertheless, we are not so sure that what has been accomplished in the way of reforming German banking practices has produced the desired results. There is not much official information as to how the system actually operates, its personnel, etc., but there are indications which we believe could be significant and certainly deserve the close scrutiny of the American trustbusters.

For example, we have recently received a copy of a German trade publication titled The German Market. This publication advertises the wares of many of Germany's foremost industrial outfits which only a few years ago were producing the guns and tanks for Hitler's war machine. The magazine also carries advertisements of a number of German banks. The names of these banks would not be familiar to those who have done business with Germany in the past, but this difficulty is easily solved because below the name of each bank we read the following caption: "formerly Dresdner Bank" or "formerly Deutsche Bank." It is well known, of course, that these two banks not only provided the financial kitty for Adolf Hitler, but were the arch spoliators of German occupied Europe.

Is it not strange that these so-called new banks should continue to identify themselves with the Deutsche and Dresdner monopolies? Is it merely a sentimental gesture or does it show that while the form has changed, the substance remains unaltered? We think that our trustbusters should try to find the answer.

The magazine carries an article on the German banks "as auxiliaries of foreign trade." The article contains several passages which also deserve the attention of the new decartelization team. "On the resumption of German foreign trade the occupying powers immediately made use of the German banking institutions which have remained intact, and allocated numerous tasks to those institutions which had been nominated as foreign trade banks. . . . In practice the foreign trade banks can today again carry out many of the normal transactions and international banking activities. The restrictions still in force are practically the same as those existing in other countries in which currency controls exist. There are indications that at a not too distant date further relaxation will be notified. . . . The banks were able within a comparatively short period of time to resume and extend the very good foreign relations which they enjoyed prior to the war. Their world-wide connections, the concentration of all foreign business transactions in their hands as also their close intercalation in the foreign trade procedure, permitted them to gain ample experience and made of them centers of the informative and consultative services."

Judging from these remarks, it would seem that the power and influence of the German banks has not changed in spite of "reforms." It may be worthwhile for our trustbusters to delve into this matter.

In discussing the new banking set-up in Germany, the London Economist declares that in its actual operations "the weaker members have usually been quite willing to allow a few men of standing to call the tune." To this, the Economist adds, "many influential posts in the new system are filled by old Reichsbank officials to whom decentralization is anathema."

In connection with the kind of personnel which seems to be dominating the German banking system, the U. S. News and World Report of July 29, 1949, stated: "Men who were powers of German banking and investment operations before and during the war are back in positions of inflence. Herman Abs, a Berlin banker, who was highly regarded by Hjalmar Schacht during the Nazi rise, often is called 'the most powerful man in Germany' . . . Now he is the head of a German corporation set up to finance the growth of industry. In his new job he dominates industrial investment in reviving Germany."

Senator Guy Gillette of Iowa has recently drawn public attention to the criminal background of Herman Abs and readers of Prevent World War III will recall that the Society has also gone into much detail on the notorious pro-Hitler background of Abs.

Aside from the reappearance of the same elements which financed Hitler, the London Economist, in appraising the results of the so-called breaking up of the Deutsche and Dresdner banks, says the following: "Thus the old Deutsche Bank in the Ruhr, previously the largest bank in Rhineland-Westphalia, has become the largest bank under the new regime (it now operates under the title of Rheinisch-Westphaelische Bank). By contrast the successor of the Commerz Bank . . . has perforce dwindled to relative insignificance. Since the currency reform the larger banks in the larger states have increased their lead by attracting the lions' share of new deposits."

Statistics on the results of the banking reform show that from July 1948 to July 1949, the number of banks in Western Germany decreased by 634, while during the same period, savings deposits increased eightfold, from 312.9 million d.m. to 2584.4 million d.m. On the face of it, these statistics show that there is now a tendency toward greater concentration of the German banking system than during the most profitable days of the Nazi regime. Again, we would not want to pre-judge the findings of the trustbusters, but we certainly believe that what has been said above should be thoroughly investigated.

It seems incredible that after suffering so much at the hands of these predatory German banks, there should be certain special interests in Allied countries who are whooping it up for the re-monopolization of German finance. Certain circles among the British would like to see a re-concentration of the old Deutsche and Dresdner banks. In fact, their government has been negotiating with German bankers and American authorities on this subject.

Even some Germans are frightened as to the prospects of a return of the old scheme of things. The New York Times of December 29, 1949, reported the following: "A high German source recently expressed grave apprehension over the infiltration of former big bankers into German banking life. He said that while they had been cleared as Nazis, they nevertheless had been accustomed to conducting their business along cartel lines traditional in Germany."

If the British, and we have no doubt that certain American circles feel the same way, are ready to recartelize the banking system in Germany, we can hardly expect the Germans themselves to become enthusiastic proponents of decartelization. Which explains why Franz Bluecher, the vice-chancellor of the Bonn Government recently advocated a return to the good old days of German banking. Bluecher said this was the only way Germany could amass enough capital both at home and abroad, to get things going again.

In line with this agitation, it will be recalled that a few months ago Herman Abs visited the United States to reestablish the old friendly relations between the German financial community and some of the folks in Wall Street. Whether in his discussions with his friends here, Mr. Abs called for their support for the recartelization of the German banks is not actually known. But, judging from Mr. Abs' record, it would not surprise us at all if this was part of his mission.

Following Mr. Abs, Bluecher himself traveled to the U.S.A. According to his biography, Bluecher was a top official in the National Bank in Essen during the days when Hitler was running rampant throughout Europe. The National Bank was associated with Abs' Deutsche Bank in aryanizing the banking house of Simon Hirschland of Essen. Aryanization, of course, means in plain language the looting of property belonging to someone else. After having looted Simon Hirschland, the Deutsche and National Bank set up a purely "aryan" institution called Burkhardt & Co. According to the War Department, the top personnel of the Burkhardt Bank consisted of "individuals who in an outstanding way thrived under national socialism, who welcomed it in the beginning, aided the Nazis to obtain power, supported them in office, shared the spoils of expropriation and conquest. . . ."

In the December, 1949, issue of the notorious pan-German publication Der Weg, which is published by the Nazis in Argentine, Bluecher was quoted as having said: "We will have to have a serious talk with the occupying powers about the amnesty of all those condemned for political reasons after 1945." This is a tall order for it would mean the freeing of most of the war criminals.

The fact that Bluecher has come back into prominence with his friend Abs, should be a broad enough hint to our trustbusters as to the real situation in the German banking system today.

"John J. McCloy, the American High Commissioner in Germany, talked tougher, more specific and more forthright language to the German people in a Stuttgart address . . . than any allied spokesman for many long months. The rebuke he administered was deserved; the timing was right. The lessons must not go unheeded . . . (the Germans) have been inclined to forget at times matters that are of the most immediate concern to the Allies. These matters are abuse of power, abuse of responsibility, failure to assume duties imposed upon them by their new position in Europe, inability to understand or accept basic principles laid down by the powers . . .

"It is now up to the Germans, including the free German press which he applauded, to see to it that his words are heeded. For unless they are obeyed, more drastic measures may be necessary to achieve the denazification and democratization to which the Allies are pledged . . ."

"Rapalloism" Soviet Russia's secret weapon in Germany

Prussian general calls Stalin message "A moral alliance between Germany and the Soviet Union"

The intense degree to which German Communist leaders in the Eastern Zone continuously stir up the hate campaign against the Western Allies is not too well known. American correspondents in Berlin have so much to report on the level of high policy that news of the anti-American hate campaign is not given the prominent place it deserves.

The extent to which these Communist hate mongers spew their lies is best evidenced by the fact that February 12th, the so-called fifth anniversary of the Western air raids against the city of Dresden, was officially observed in the Eastern Zone with an almost unbelievable barrage of falsehoods against the United States and Britain.

The official Berlin newspaper of the Soviet High Command the Taegliche Rundschau, sounded the keynote when it screamed to the Germans that "destroyed Dresden should remind you to fight against the imperialist robbers." The official newspaper of the SED, Neues Deutschland, prominently displayed an article by the Mayor of Dresden, Walter Widauer, who spoke of the raids as "a dreadful deed" which killed 35,000 civilians but "had not been a military necessity."

This theme was echoed through the Communist press in Eastern Germany. In speeches, lectures, articles, radio broadcasts, etc., the Western Allies were bitterly criticized for the bombing of Dresden which occurred at the height of the war. The implication was plain that Soviet Russia had been opposed to such bombings!

The Red newspapers used this occasion, as reported by the AP to print "lurid tales of planes sweeping low to strafe fleeing civilians, as refugees and wounded milled helplessly about the city."

The fact that the German Communists are openly permitted by the Russians to incite the Germans against the Western Allies for military activities during the war, should be exposed for its hypocrisy. While no rebuttal was made by the American authorities, the British Foreign Office hit the nail on the head when it pointed out that the Dresden bombings were carried out to support the troops of Marshall Zhukov. The British declared that "At the Yalta Conference it was decided that the Western Allies would give all possible tactical support to the advancing Russian forces." And the British spokesman added that it should not be forgotten that "Dresden was the main communication center for the defending German Armies."

Touching another side of the story, the British spokesman stated: "When speaking of bombing, the German people should remember the German bombings of Warsaw on September 1, 1939, which started the whole chain of events."

Hand in glove with this hate propaganda, the Taegliche Rundschau recently went so far as to announce on its front page that "Anglo-Americans murdered 600 concentration camp inmates." The dispatch, which was dated at Kiel, declared that a few days earlier a mass grave with 89 bodies of concentration camp victims was found near Haffkrug-Scharbeutz. The Taegliche Rundschau added that these concentration camp victims were killed by Western Allied bombings in the last days of the war while working in the port of Kiel. Even if this news is true, it is significant that the official Soviet newspapers headlined it with "Anglo-Americans murdered 600 concentration camp inmates," completely disregarding the fact that their deaths resulted from an action carried out in the midst of war.

Sometimes the anti-Western campaign backfires, as in the case of the comment by the Moscow Isvestia, which was widely quoted and reprinted in the Eastern German press. While the trial against General von Manstein was going on in Hamburg, the Soviet newspaper and its German stooges called the trial "an impertinent demonstration of solidarity between British-American warmongers and Hitler's henchmen." According to Isvestia, the goal of the Manstein trial was not only an acquittal but a justification for future alliance with the "fascist murderers." The faces of these editorial writers must have been pretty red when they learned that the British Court condemned the German general to 18 years in prison.

While no day goes by without the Western Allies being exposed and smeared for permitting the Nazis to gain high positions in their respective Zone, the official Soviet line in Eastern Germany has gone to extremes in whitewashing the Nazis. The slogans "National Front" and "Unity of Germany" are being used as a pretext to pave the way for the participation of all former Nazis in the movement under Communist emblems.

Some documentary evidence on this point seems to us quite interesting. On October 4, 1949, the SED Party issued an official decree which was not reported in the daily press but only in the party's indoctrination periodical Neuer Weg. This party decree stated "We are for cooperation with all German patriots, among them also with the former members of the Nazi Party; the former officers; the small and average employers; and that part of the grossbourgeoisie in Western Germany which cares for the interests of Germany, and which wants to aid the efforts of the German people to regain its unity and independence."

As far as the juridical status of former Nazi party members in the Soviet Zone is concerned, an article in Neuer Weg (November, 1949) stated "It is clear today, at a moment when the inclusion of all honest Germans into the national front is the order of the day, that the question should not be asked any longer to which Nazi organization a person had belonged—because the criteria can only be the individual person's position toward the unity of Germany, and where he stands in the fight for peace."

It seems that many anti-Nazis presently members of the SED did not particularly like the idea of Nazis being put on an equal footing with themselves. It seems also that these anti-Nazis felt rather uneasy about the new situation. How they were rebuked by Communist boss Walter Ulbricht is best evidenced in a speech which he made before the party activities group of the SED:

"The questions who was a Nazi and who was not a Nazi are at present no longer open to discussion. At present only one standard counts: Who is a peaceful person? Who wants the unity of Germany? We do not ask what party book he previously had; whether or not he belonged to the Hitler Party. The problem is very simple. Whoever under these conditions brings the question of the former Hitler party membership of a present fighter for Germany's unity into discussion, works against the national front."

The other day one Kurt Schumann was named President of the Supreme Court for the whole Eastern Zone.

The Communist newspapers reported his nomination, but only one paper, the National Zeitung, official organ of the National Democratic Party, probably unconsciously—frankly stated in the biographical note on the new president that from 1935 until 1942, he was a judge in the Nazi Wehrmacht Courts. Thus a man who had the high job of a judge in Hitler's Wehrmacht courts for a full seven years, partly during peace and partly during the war, is today given the chair of a President of the Supreme Court of the Soviet Zone.

The SED party has a so-called Reichs party school in Klein-Machnow near Berlin. In this school a "progressive intelligentsia" is being indoctrinated in the new ideology. One of the instructors is a woman named Sonja Klinz, who today is a fanatical Communist despite the fact that she was a high-ranking leader of the Bund Deutscher Maedchen — (the Hitler Youth Girl Association of the Third Reich). Another professor at that SED party university is a certain Behrens—a former leading Nazi party propagandist.

Then take the case of Dr. Otto Lang. He is presently the chief of the new Red Gestapo in the Eastern Zone with the special task of infiltrating Eastern Zone Communists into the Western Zone. He is persona grata with the Soviets and enjoys high privileges. This Dr. Otto Lang was an ill-famed torturer of Himmler's Gestapo!

The Russians do not care whether somebody was a Nazi or a Gestapo man or a torturer—if he now has become a fanatical Communist. One must not think that this one hundred per cent acceptance of Nazism is restricted to Germany. In Austria too, the Soviets are openly dealing with the Nazis.

The American correspondent Richard Mowrer had a very interesting report recently in the St. Louis Post Dispatch and the Christian Science Monitor. Writing from Vienna, he reported that a new fifth party had just appeared on the Austrian scene—with full blessing of the Soviet authorities. The party calls itself "Nationale Liga-Bund Schaffender Oestrreicher" (a long-winded appellation meaning: League of Working Austrians). By calling itself League instead of party the group bypasses or hopes to bypass the scrutiny of the Four-power Allied council which has the power to authorize or veto new parties in Austria. According to Mowrer, it looks as if the new party could well turn out to be, in time, a Soviet fifth column designed to bring all Austria eventually under Soviet control.

The group has similarities with the Soviet sponsored extreme rightwing parties in Germany, like the National Democratic Party, and with the so-called Nauheim circle of Professor Ullrich Noack, who advocates closer German relations with Soviet Russia under the concept of neutrality. The new Austrian group also takes the same line.

Let us quote from Richard Mowrer's dispatch:

"It is interesting to note that the kind of people who make up the fifth party in Austria, the Nazis-under-the-skin, former army officers, and Hitler youth leaders, are simply the Austrian counterpart of the pro-Soviet extreme rightists who make up the National Democratic party in East Germany. It is well-known that an important segment of the right wing military caste in Germany is more attracted to Russian totalitarianism where the regime's power rests largely on the army, than to the democratic West where it is the civilians who govern. Moreover, the Soviets struck responsive chords amongst the German military by reiterating their wish for a 'strong Germany.' This makes it possible, in Germany, for extreme right wingers to be pro-Russian.... It is a useful reminder that the extreme right and the extreme left, the fascists and the communists, have so much in common that it is the easiest thing in the world for them to get together to contrive the subjugation of the anti-totalitarian masses."

Thus, the outline for Soviet policy becomes clearer every day. On the one side Nazi leaders, SS men, Gestapo chiefs, Wehrmacht officers are being accepted as full fledged citizens in every job they might desire if they become members of the new right-wing pro-Soviet parties. On the other hand, under the slogan of "German unity," all these nationalist right-wing elements are being wooed, together with the leftists, into a super-duper "National Front." The key to the whole propaganda setup is a continous drumming into the ears of the Germans that their only chance of survival and reconstruction is a close friendship with Soviet Russia.

A typical example of this propaganda line is a speech made recently by Johannes Dieckmann, President of the People's Chamber of the German Eastern Republic. In this speech Dieckmann said:

"Whoever has read the speeches which Stalin made during the war to the Soviet people and to his army, knows that the Russians still expected, during the war, a German mass revolution against fascism. . . . Significant for the Soviet viewpoint with regard to Germany was Stalin's sentence spoken at that time during the war, that Hitlers come and go but the German people will remain. This statement by the leader of the Soviet people is worth a place in the memory of every German, for as the German democrats of all political shades see today, the National Front is the only way to regain prestige for the German people."

Perusing the Soviet-sponsored German press of the last few weeks, there is not one day when in one way or another either Stalin's statement during the war or his now famous congratulatory message to the new Eastern German Republic is not stressed. A few new slogans have recently appeared which seem to us quite significant. Up to the first world war there was a pacifist slogan in Germany: "Nie wieder Krieg" (Never Again War). Now the new slogan spread all over the Eastern zone says: "Never Again War Against the Soviet Union." Another slogan says: "Das Ganze Deutschland Muss Es Sein!" (It has to be the whole of Germany!)

Georges Blun, the Berlin correspondent of the Paris daily, Le Monde, in one of his recent dispatches, analyzes what he calls "the progress of 'Rapalloism'. . . ." In his opinion, Rapalloism has been making quiet but considerable progress in very important and powerful German intellectual and industrial circles. The term "Rapalloism," derives from the so-called Treaty of Rapallo between Germany and Russia, which since has become synonomous with a Russo-German alliance. A large number of conservative and even right wing Germans have recently joined the ranks of the Rapalloists, among them Pastor Niemöller. Another figure whose role becomes stranger every day is Dr. Josef Mueller, present Vice-President of the Christian Democratic party in Bavaria, who during the war belonged to the Abwehr under Admiral Canaris. Mueller too has recently taken an outspoken Rapallo line.

Some of the fanatical neo-Nazi rabble rousers, usually considered as belonging to the lunatic fringe like Karl Feitenhansl and Otto Ernest Remer (See Page 24 of this issue), have more or less secretly taken up connections with the Eastern zone. The usually well-informed London newsletter, German Affairs, recently confirmed other reports of cross-connections between Herr Remer and ex-General Arno von Lenski, chief of the Soviet-sponsored National Democratic party in Berlin.

There is no doubt that people like Remer and Feitenhansl will play the Soviet game if it suits their purpose, for basically there is no difference whatever between a German general like Von Lenski, a former member of the Free German Committee now in an important place in the Eastern zone, and a nationalist of the type of Remer, who is inciting the people in the Western zone. Basically, a new Russo-German alliance would be as enthusiastically welcomed by certain German generals, SS leaders and Gestapo men in the Eastern zone as well as in the Western zone.

The Russians know this only too well and they don't miss a trick to work toward their goal. Along these lines is the most recent and probably most effective slogan launched by the propaganda minister of the Soviet zone —Gerhart Eisler. Addressing himself to the Western Germans he shouted the other day:

"You must pound into the ears of the occupation powers, 'go home'. . . ."

In conclusion—we must quote a few remarks made recently at the end of a speech by General Otto Korfes, former member of the Free German Committee and now Chairman of the National Democratic Party.

Speaking at the "House of Soviet Culture" in Berlin, Korfes declared that "All true German patriots struggle today in the national front in close cooperation with the Soviet Union on which they rely." Korfes told his listeners that all his energies are concentrated on expanding the National Front and that he "has a tremendous correspondence with a number of generals, officers, soldiers, businessmen and workers in Western Germany."

Referring to Stalin's congratulatory message on the occasion of the founding of the Eastern German Republic, Korfes called the message "a moral alliance between Germany and the Soviet Union." Then he went on to say that whoever wishes the best for Germany should claim the help of another power. That was the leitmotif of German heroes like Scharnhorst, Gneisenau, Clausewitz and many other Prussian officers who worked together with Russia. Finally, comparing the development of the Soviet Union with that of Russia, Korfes finished his speech with the words: "Long live Soviet Prussia!"

What is this but the handwriting on the wall? . . .

E. T.

LET'S FACE THE FACTS

". . . Defiance and hatred gleam from millions of German faces. They await only 'der Tag' when they will reverse their defeats against their soft and spineless enemies who do not even, in victory, know how to be conquerors. And if we continue to be blind, perhaps they will succeed next time and darken the lights of civilization forever.

"Is Russia a justification for our present policy? Russia is a dynamic, expanding dictatorship and therefore today's greatest enemy of democracy and liberty. But what assurance have we that a militarily restored Germany will not join hands with Russia to crush us? It did last time. Even after Hitler called Communists 'scum,' he made a pact with them. Remember, it was not Stalin who broke that pact. He ruthlessly shared the spoils of this partnership and remained loyal to it. It was Hitler who broke it. The next Hitler might be smart enough to destroy the West before turning on his Russian associate —if he turns on it at all.

"In building up Germany, we are making available to Russia the very military assets she lacks at present—modern industrial efficiency and military science of high order. Some may differ about the inevitability of a Russian-German alliance, but let anyone concerned with peace honestly ask himself whether the risk is not real and too great to be taken. It is natural for dictatorships to stand together in their program of pillage and conquest. There is genuine affinity between them . . ."

The German Inch Equals a Mile

"Bonn Said to Slant Recovery Figures"...
"Bonn to Protest Saar Mine Leases"...
"Bonn Says It Owns Saar Coal Mines"...
"Farben Owners in Drive to End Allied Control"...
"Germans Accused of Cutting Prices"...
"Scandal Is Bared on Denazification"...
"Bonn Set to List Economic Burdens"...
"Top officials in Reich Civil Service called Threat to Real Democracy through Ability to Sabotage Laws"...

This is only a short selection of recent headlines in The New York Times, Herald Tribune and St. Louis Post Dispatch. The headlines are self-explanatory and illustrate clearly what's going on. After a period of meekness and tacit consent, the Germans are once again at their old game of blackmailing the Allies.

A political observer who carefully analyzes the daily dispatches from Germany appearing in American, British and French newspapers will constantly read phrases like "Adenauer Asks," "Adenauer refuses," "Bonn demands," "Bonn does not want," "Bonn protests," etc. After achieving in a comparatively short period of time a tremendous number of successes and gains which annihilate slowly but surely the Allied victory, the Germans cleverly use the present East-West tension to their own advantage.

Ludwell Denny, Scripps-Howard's excellent columnist, in one of his recent columns spoke of "West Germany's campaign of bluff, bluster and blackmail." Wrote Mr. Denny:

"Mr. Adenauer knows from experience how easy it is to play the three Western powers against each other. . . . The German method is the ancient one of asking an inch and taking a mile. That is how they licked the Allies on the issue of dismantling war plants. Each time the Germans pressure the Allies into saving another batch of plants on the promises the issue will not be raised again. But within a month they are at it again, chiseling more."

Being an expert on the German problem, and having returned only recently from a prolonged stay in Germany, Mr. Denny knows what he is talking about. His statements should, therefore, not be taken lightly!

"In addition to trying to exempt more plants from dismantling, in violation of the recent Bonn agreement, the Adenauer government's immediate objectives include: Disguised remilitarization through civil aviation, production of war supplies for the Allies, and German troops for a West European Army. Recovery of the Saar territory by plebiscite or otherwise. Foreign capital for German economic expansion."

Walter Lippmann, too, stated his opinion that Adenauer's policy "is to obtain every possible concession from the Western nations before he comes to grips in his negotiations with Eastern Germany and the Soviet Union," and Lippmann adds:

"(Adenauer) wants enough soldiers to offset the East German soldiers if and when the Red Army withdraws. But he wants also to have a free hand in his negotiations with the East. He would have a very free hand if there were nothing left—as regards territory, reparations, or sovereignty—which he has to negotiate with the West. There is almost nothing left now except the Saar, permission to rearm, and the American subsidy which gives the Western Powers a hold on the Adenauer government. If he could get the Saar now, if he were allowed to rearm now, and if he could be assured that the American subsidy would continue for some considerable time to come, then the German settlement and the German peace treaty would be made—with France, Great Britain and the United States on the outside of the real negotiations more or less committed to the unreserved support of Dr. Adenauer but without any certainty that they knew what was going on. Dr. Adenauer would then have everything that the West has to offer before he began to deal with the East. . . ."

Let us examine some of the recent violations committed by the Bonn government:

1. As reported by Jack Raymond in The New York Times, the West German government "has distorted the true picture of economic revival by altering the index of industrial production to make the state of recovery appear less than it actually is." According to Raymond, a memorandum by an Allied official states:

"There is strong reason to believe that the change in the index was not motivated by a purely professional desire to improve the index." And Raymond continues: "Another Allied official accused the economic Ministry at Bonn of seeking to 'fool friendly nations, fool the people of Germany and that it is suffering under the delusion it can get away with it.'"

2. A London dispatch to the New York Times states that "German ship repairing concerns were deliberately quoting below cost to regain foreign business." These accusations were made by George S. Cromar, chairman of the British Drydock Owners and Repairers Central Council. He stated that the Germans were able to undercut British and other continental prices because of their lower wage levels, lower overtime rates and fewer labor laws and regulations. But Mr. Cromar added, "These factors alone do not explain the mystery of some of the recently quoted German prices, which are half as low as the British prices." "The situation," he added, "raises the question whether the Germans had undisclosed exchange privileges or subventions."

3. Reporting to the New York Herald Tribune from Frankfurt, Don Cook writes:

"In its first major exercise of its restrictive powers over the West German government, the Allied High Commission has ordered suspension of German plans to end gasoline rationing Feb. 1. . . .

"In a general stiffening of attitude in many directions, the Commission is also understood to be taking the Bonn government sharply to task for two other contraventions of Allied economic directives—failure of the Germans to carry out Allied instructions to end food subsidies and publishing of tariff schedules without prior clearance from the High Commission.

"The first the High Commission knew of the end of gasoline rationing was when they picked up their newspapers. The West German government had been given full authority to fix rationing policy but only in so far as rationing does not affect the balance-of-payments position. All food rationing has ended except in the case of sugar, for example.

"The need for gasoline rationing is so evident it is difficult to see why the Germans ever contemplated abolishing it or how the commission could have taken any action other than it did. Germany is importing $25,000,000 worth of petroleum from the hard-currency areas every year. Until the balance-of-payments position is solved and she is no longer dependent on dollar aid it is impossible to justify a free market with free imports and free pricing for petroleum."

"The German government was directed to end the grain subsidy by Dec. 31—particularly for corn, which is imported at a cost of $75 per ton under the European Recovery Program and sold internally at $45 a ton.

"The Germans have so far ignored the order to end the subsidy and the result has been a heavy switch in farm production from grain crops to root crops. This gives the farmers a two-way profit since it is cheaper to buy the subsidized corn for feeding animals than it would be to raise it themselves. . . ."

4. In another dispatch to The New York Times, Jack Raymond exposes Bonn's tricks on the recovery plan:

"In blistering language, the Economic Cooperation Administration Mission for Germany denounced West German economic plans for a second time, describing the leaders of the Bonn regime as lacking the experience, foresight and courage to achieve recovery.

"A critique signed by Robert M. Hanes, chief of the ECA Mission, said the Federal Republic set its sights too low and then failed to outline measures adequate to reach even its modest targets. The Government attitude toward unemployment, the most critical element in the economy, was described as 'defeatist.'. . .

"The new analysis by the ECA Mission follows by a short interval a highly critical report on German economic planning for 1949-50. It is blunter than the first document and concerns itself with 1950-51 plans of the West German Government.

"Commenting that the upswing in German production had slowed down 'prematurely' in the spring of 1949, Mr. Hanes declared this was because of the 'shortage of currency and capital, the relatively small devaluation of the Deutsche mark, lack of adaptability and competitive vigor in the business and labor community and lack of experience, foresight and courage at the top level of government.'. . .

"The West German leaders were accused of setting inadequate export goals to balance the imports required for achieving 'reasonably full employment,' yet even these inadequate goals 'can hardly be reached' by the methods outlined in the German program.

"'The industrial production targets,' said Mr. Hanes, 'represent stagnation rather than recovery.'. . ."

5. Drew Middleton reports to The New York Times from Bonn on the question of halting dismantling "on the three industrial plants that were left on the dismantling list under the Bonn protocol."

". . . One of these is the Hermann Goering steel works at Watenstedt-Saltzgitter and the two others are Fischer-Tropsch synthetic fuel plants.

"Since the Bonn protocol was supposed to be 'final,' the German request appears audacious. Yet, as one Allied diplomat said today, 'having obtained so much why should they stop now?' However, the Allied attitude is stiffening. Unless there is a sudden change of heart, Chancellor Adenauer will be told that dismantling will continue.

"The Western case is that all three plants are uneconomical and that the Fischer-Tropsch plants represent pre-war German efforts to build up a synthetic fuel reserve for war. . . ."

6. Again from a dispatch by Don Cook from Frankfurt to The New York Herald Tribune:

"A protective association of I.G. Farben stockholders called a press conference to launch a campaign to end Allied control of the huge industrial combine and turn the Farben decartelization problem over to the German government.

"With thorough preparation of a program and handouts for the press in both German and English, telling how simple and easy the solution of the Farben problem can be made, the stockholders' group timed its proposal well. . .

"The German government, meanwhile, is drafting its own decartelization legislation, with the aim of coordinating a program with the Allied High Commission. It was to the German government that the stockholders appealed."

7. From still another Jack Raymond dispatch from Frankfurt to The New York Times:

"Western Allied officials charged the Bonn Government with procrastinating in attempts to solve the refugee problem. German officials were accused of hoping that the surplus population in West Germany would bolster the argument for German 'living space' and return of the Oder-Neisse territories and the Sudentenland. . . ."

8. Drew Middleton, in a dispatch to the New York Times from Frankfurt, reported:

"The embargo on shipment of steel to Eastern Germany, proclaimed by the Bonn Government, is not operating effectively and about 1,000 tons of steel a day are entering the Soviet zone. . . .

"The major error of the tragicomedy of errors was the failure of the Bonn Government to suspend previously issued export licenses for steel to Eastern Germany when it had decided to impose the embargo.

"There were 'literally hundreds' of these licenses outstanding, according to a United States official, and their holders continued to ship steel as though nothing had happened.

"In the view of American observers, the Western powers with the best intentions relied on the Bonn Government to shut off a valuable German trade relationship with Eastern Germany. The government did so, but forgot the existence of the outstanding export licenses, an error that allowed the powerful steel interests in northwest Germany to continue the business. . . ."

All these facts point toward a concerted drive on the part of the Germans to rot the fruits of Allied victory.

They show that the long record of German betrayal compounded by ruthless duplicity did not end with the breakdown of the Nazi Reich. The Germans grow more arrogant because they seem to believe that it is an American obligation to give them all they need while they themselves can await and escape their obligations.

"...DAMAGING TO OUR NATIONAL INTERESTS..."

On February 19, 1950 The New York Times printed a letter-to-the-editor by Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for Prevention of War. In this letter, Mr. Libby went all out in defense of Nazi war criminals, and in particular of those guilty of the crime of Malmedy, where American prisoners of war were massacred by a gang of S.S. men.

Wrote Mr. Libby: "Will it strengthen the democrats in Germany to have the United States execute a man such as Sepp Dietrich, a defendant in the Malmedy case, who has already been punished beyond anyone's deserts? He has been kept alive under a death sentence for more than three years. Presume him guilty as Satan, there is still a limit to what we can do without brutalizing ourselves. Germans of all political complexions have heard of the findings of the U.S. Senate Armed Forces Services subcommittee, which investigated the Malmedy trials."

Thus spoke Mr. Libby. But he omitted to mention a very important part of the committee report, namely the one dealing with his own organization, the National Council for Prevention of War. Here is what the Report of the Armed Forces Services subcommittee had to say about Libby's organization:

". . . the subcommittee is convinced that its (the National Council for Prevention of War) activities in this matter, which go far beyond the Malmedy case, have been most damaging to the national interests of our country, and to the cause of peace. The subcommittee feels strongly that the proper investigations should be made to determine the real motivation in back of the activities of this organization and the influence it has had on many individuals within the United States who have accepted as fact the allegations publicized by it. . . ."

The question arises: Why is such an investigation not being made? And what is the "real motivation in back of the activities of this organization" which tries to arouse pity for convicted mass murderers?

FLASH!

Ilse Koch, the illfamed "bitch of Buchenwald" who was recently released from an American prison, will soon be sent to—an insane asylum for observation! The transfer was urged last January 3, by Professor Dr. Leibbrand of Erlangen, Germany. It is interesting to note that Ilse Koch's own lawyer, Dr. Alfred Seidl is said to be opposed to the transfer of his client to an insane asylum for observation. He is convinced that Ilse Koch will be acquitted anyhow, because, as he states, the material of the prosecution would not be sufficient for a verdict of guilt. Ilse Koch is supposed to come up for trial very soon and it will be interesting to see how the theme of her "insanity" might eventually be played up. . . .

Presenting the Neo-Nazi Parties of Today . . .

Newspaper reports from Germany mention almost daily some new Neo-Nazi Party coming into the foreground. A great number of such Neo-Nazi Parties are presently mushrooming all over Western Germany. The following tabulation of these parties with detailed facts and data was compiled by the Stuttgarter Nachrichten, one of the very few really democratic newspapers in present-day Germany. We deem it important for the record to publish this tabulation which gives an interesting picture of the men and the forces behind each of these parties. →

Pro-German Apologists In the U. S. Smear President Truman as "War Criminal"

We formerly featured in Prevent World War III a regular exposé of the German language press in the United States. Recently we omitted this regular feature because of the constant repetitions along well known pro-German and Nazi-apologist lines which the American German language newspapers present endlessly.

However, the other day our attention was directed to a particularly vicious piece in one of the leading German-language newspapers and we decided again to look into the present state of mind of the German-language press.

The piece which aroused our particular disgust appeared in the Deutsche Wochen Schrift of St. Louis, Mo. It was titled "No Tears" and dealt with the New York afternoon newspaper The Sun. Recently, the 117 year old Sun ceased publication; this fact was objectively reported by the whole American press and in a spirit of fair play, newspapers and weekly magazines gave editorial farewells to one of their most distinguished colleagues. It will be of interest to our readers to learn what the Deutsche Wochen Schrift had to say about the death of the Sun. The very first paragraph of its obituary reads as follows:

"The New York Sun and its pestilential-smelling soul recently passed away. The Deutsche Wochen Schrift does not shed any tears at its unexpected death. The Sun for a long time now was no longer a paper of loyal American traditions in the sense of an independent free Republic, such as the founding fathers Franklin, Washington and Jefferson had planned and had fought for."

The Deutsche Wochen Schrift is angry because the attitude of The Sun allegedly was "even before the first World War to defame and to condemn everything that was German."

The crime of The Sun in the opinion of the German editorial writer was that "it helped to push our Republic into the war (with Germany.)" Finding in his files some anti-German editorial which The Sun allegedly published back in October, 1918, the editorial writer goes on:

"In the last World War, too, The Sun was a hatemonger and prostituted its columns with many infamous lies and exaggerations. The fact that it finally ceased publication will not be regretted by our loyal American citizens; least by those of German origin and blood. Those sentimentally inclined will shed some tears of joy. As an anglophile propaganda sheet, The Sun stood in the first rank. We hope that many others of the same ilk will follow it soon. The Republic can only welcome such losses with all its heart!!"

Here you see the fanatical German-American chauvinist in his true color! A fine conservative newspaper which certainly cannot be accused of the traditional smear of "Morgenthauism," is spat at in the most derogatory way—because it had dared to criticize the Germans!!

In the newspaper Nord Amerika of Philadelphia, Pa., we found a contribution by Professor A. J. App, significantly titled "The nonsense about enforced German disarmament." App, enthusiastically endorsing a recent editorial in Life Magazine in favor of German rearmament, comes out with the following morsel:

"Enforced disarmament is frustration: It has no moral value for the nation suffering it, and it is a crime and tyranny on the part of the nation imposing it. It reduces the disarmed nation to an aggregation of slaves whose only hope of freedom is to follow a rebellious leader or to sell their services to the highest bidder."

In App's opinion "Americans have absolutely no right to enforce disarmament on Italy, or on Japan, or on Germany, or on anybody except themselves."

What Herr App thinks of our national defense and how he characterizes our policy makers in Washington is stated in the following paragraph:

"For American politicians, while boasting of building the largest army, navy, air force in the whole world, moralizingly to swing a club over any other nation and order it forever to be disarmed and defenseless, portrays literally and truly the mentality of gangsterism. Every gang of gangsters holds and practices exactly that kind of disarmament." And App adds that "enforcing disarmament on another is paganism and tyranny."

Speaking of App, it is interesting to read his "Factual Outline" on his recent trip to Germany. In this mimeographed leaflet which he is sending to friends and sympathizers along with his hate pamphlets, App states among other things, that Germans consider "Allied dismantlings, territorial robberies and expulsionism as crimes on a vaster scale than Hitler's. . . ."

Reporting on the impressions received during his German trip, App when speaking of bombed towns never omits to mention and stress the point that they were "American-made."

Herr App's most recent smear and hate pamphlet is called "Action on a War Crime." It is published by an outfit called Boniface Press in Philadelphia. The whole pamphlet is a fantastic smear against President Truman, who is being held personally responsible for the fate of the Sudeten-Germans expelled from Czechoslovakia! Here are two significant sub-titles from App's pamphlet:

"How many people did President Truman order 'forcibly deported?'"

"What should the American people do about their President's Potsdam war crime?"

The tone of this "smear-Truman pamphlet" is by far the most vehement we have seen for a long time. By implication, the President of the United States is called a war criminal. Under the sub-heading "What should the American people do about their President's Potsdam war crime," App quotes his fellow German apologist, Father Reichenberger as saying: "We will not demand that those responsible for the expulsion crime be judged according to their own Nuremberg laws. Such eye-for-an-eye morality we leave to the Morgenthauists and their stooges." And then App adds with tongue in cheek:

"We presume that the American people do not want to hang their own war criminals as they hanged alleged German and Japanese war criminals." Note the subtle implication of the heading speaking of the "President's war crime" and the paragraphs that follow; note also the word "alleged" in connection with German and Japanese war criminals.

Perusing the German language press, one is not surprised to discover that Freda Utley and her book The High Cost of Vengeance have become the Bible of all pro-Germans and Nazi apologists. The book is quoted and endorsed enthusiastically all through the German-language press, while Miss Utley delivers lectures in various German communities.

Nord-Amerika of Philadelphia quotes from one such lecture of Freda Utley, recently held in Philadelphia. While the reawakening of Nazism and anti-Semitism in Germany is now a confirmed fact,—as evidenced by John J. McCloy's recent official statement,—Miss Utley still sings her song of the "conspiracy of silence in the American press" with regard to the "brutal Allied occupation policies in Germany."

Drew Middleton, the able New York Times correspondent who was one of the first, in a series of brilliant articles, to expose the rise of Neo-Nazism in Germany, has become the target of a systematic smear campaign in the German-language press. The California Staats Zeitung complains about what it calls the "new wave of hate against Germany" and blames it upon "a certain Drew Middleton who is presently in Germany and who sends to his paper, the New York Times, reports which seem disgusting even to native Americans."(!) Referring to Middleton's report on ex-Nazi teachers regaining their former positions, the German editorial writer, sitting far away on the West Coast, states, "naturally there is not a true word in it, that these reinstated teachers are Nazis."

And he adds: "Those who know the Germans and Germany from their own experience only shake their heads when such nonsense is published in that New York newspaper."

The Deutsche Wochen Schrift of St. Louis, like other German-language newspapers, the other day used more than three columns on its front page to feature a story about the Nazi war criminals interned in the Landsberg prison. Significantly titled "Here speaks the other side," the story is reprinted from the Munich newspaper, Sueddeutsche Zeitung. The whole thing is a clever sympathy-arousing report on the criminals. Take, for instance, this paragraph on Nazi butcher Oswald Pohl. We reprint it here literally translated in order to show how one of the worst mass murderers of modern time is being whitewashed:

"Oswald Pohl (it states) since March, 1942, chief of the SS Economical Administration, Main Office, and condemned to death two years ago, enters the room in a scarlet-red windbreaker. . . . He has just been called away from the football game, of which he assures me he is still a first class player. The robust man in his late fifties—Northern—German, gray hair, light temples, dark-eyed, intelligent, vital, energetic—estimates his real chance for an amnesty, which he pursues cautiously. . . . No individual offenses of his were proved or even related. 'I had nothing to do with the delivery and discharge (of concentration camp inmates); I had no executive and penalty power. We were only the exhibition puppets upon whom the whole concentration camp system was to be exposed. Not personal guilt but knowledge and position were punished'. . . ."

Thus the campaign for amnesty for one of the worst mass murderers among the Nazi war criminals reaches its peak. They call it "The other side of the story," but are guilty of wilfully arousing pity for Pohl, who, to quote John Hohenberg in the New York Post "was the boss of this concentration camp—the master of the furnace and gas chamber, of the blood hunt, electrified fences, of the Nazi doctors, who conducted death-dealing medical experiments on their prisoners."

To conclude we would like to quote from an editorial by "Politicus" in the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger Zeitung of Chicago, official organ of the German-American Citizens' League of Illinois. In a recent issue "Politicus" dared to write the following:

"We fought Germany and destroyed it, although Hitler was a most determined enemy of Communism and, what has not been stated in our press, had concentration camps mostly for Communists, who, just as they are doing here tried to undermine his and the German peoples way of life."

How many misleading statements and lies this paragraph contains! How determined an enemy of Communism Hitler really was, is best shown by the famous pact he made with Stalin in 1939 and which helped to start World War II. And as far as the Nazi concentration camps are concerned where, according to 'Politicus" "mostly Communists" were kept, everybody knows that only an infinitely small part of the KZ inmates were Communists. When Hitler made his pact with Stalin, even this small percentage of Communists was released or given jobs bossing the other inmates. But for "Politicus" and for the Deutsch Amerikanische Buerger Zeitung this doesn't matter at all. Let us recall that this same paper recently published that significant "Open Letter to Stalin" which we exposed in No. 33 of Prevent World War III.

The pattern of "Politicus" ideology is perhaps best shown in the paragraph of the same editorial in which he regrets that "we refuse to make a friend out of a nation which has proven in two terrific wars, that it consists of people with a determination, with an inner strength, which no other nation on earth so far has shown to possess."

What is this inner strength "Politicus" is talking about? The death camps? The concentration camps? Aggressive warfare? Genocide? . . .

Deutschland ueber alles—of course!

> ". . . And as Russia edged westward into Europe and the West girds to prevent further infringements, the century's traditional point of discordant friction, Germany, looms gradually again as a potential danger . . ."

Neo-Nazism Grows—Right Under the Eyes of U. S. Occupation Authorities

There is an old saying: "If you give them an inch they'll want a mile." Seldom has a proverb so properly suited the present situation in Germany. Observers well acquainted with the German mentality have warned that the Germans will always misinterpret any favor they get and ask for more and more. Not only is this happening today, but the re-emergence of German requests, demands, refusals become more and more outspoken and arrogant.

In recent weeks, this political trend has taken a turn for the worse, and while it would be easy to describe this situation as "The old spirit is back again"—the truth of the matter is that the behavior of a great number of party politicians, members of the Bonn Parliament, political wirepullers, etc. can only be called insolent.

Unfortunately, the American press, with very few exceptions, does not give this matter the attention it deserves. Few papers even care to publish the reports about neo-Nazi activities, and those which do mostly bury the items. We deem it necessary, therefore, to present a factual report on a number of significant incidents which happened in recent weeks in Germany.

There is, for instance, the Case Hedler. As a deputy of the Deutsche Partei (which has seventeen seats in the Bonn Parliament) Wolfgang Hedler at a political rally in Einfeld stated that it was the "anti-Nazi underground that lost the war for Germany" and that "international armaments caused the war and not the German people." Furthermore, he said that opinions differ on whether sending the Jews to the gas chambers might have been the right course, but he added that "other means could have been used to get rid of them. . . ."

According to the stenographic record made by a German press representative, Hedler stated: "The Deutsche Partei wants to be on the record that Germany has the least guilt on the start of the second world war. Guilty for our misery are the resistance fighters because it should be kept in mind that Germany did not lose because of total exhaustion but through treason and through sabotage of the resistance movement. . . . But there are still Germans who talk of our guilt in this war. . . ."

It is true that this particular speech of Hedler caused an uproar in certain quarters. His own party, however, defended Hedler and his statement, and endorsed it wholeheartedly. Hedler's immunity as a deputy was withdrawn and the Bonn Parliament had no course but to express its condemnation of his bluntness. But, it is interesting to note that along with the extreme rightwing parties the Communists, too, voted against suspension of Hedler's immunity!

A reporter of the newspaper Echo of Hamburg recently interviewed Hedler. Here are some verbatim excerpts from this interviw:

Asked the reporter: "You have reproached the German resistance fighters for having caused the debacle of '45. (Thus you concede) that there was really a debacle?"

Answered Hedler: "Looked upon from a lofty standpoint the military capitulation of Germany is only an episode. Certainly the first outfit of the Nazis was qualitatively not the best."

Question: "Would you therefore cautiously say that the good of National Socialism should be kept, perhaps even reconstructed?"

Hedler: "Yes!"

Question: "Your favorite scapegoats are the men of July 20th and the Jews?"

Answer: "I am against everyone who acts against the historic mission of his people and I am also against those who do not belong to our people but nevertheless want to order it what to do."

Question: "Did you say this at the rally in Einfeld?"

Answer: "Yes, exactly and even a little stronger."

When Hedler's parliamentary immunity was withdrawn and he was compelled to appear before a court, some naive observers believed this proved that the Neo-Nazi rabblerousers could not get away with it.

What has happened? Wolfgang Hedler was acquitted by a German court in the town of Neumuester in Schleswig-Holstein! According to an official of the State Government, two of the three judges who acquitted Hedler were former members of the Nazi Party. Beyond a doubt, Hedler's acquittal is the first victory of the reawakening Neo-Nazi forces in Western Germany, and it reminds one of similar acquittals of people of the same ilk in the period following the first World War. For once, we agree with Kurt Schumacher, who commented that Hedler's acquittal is something from which the world "will draw its conclusions regarding the political mentality of the German people."

There might still perhaps be people who think that Hedler's statements are only pronouncements of an isolated rabblerouser. Our domestic German apologists will undoubtedly take this line. It is therefore interesting to call attention to a letter-to-the-editor of the Frankfurter Rundschau which recently appeared in connection with the Hedler scandal. The writer of the letter, one Lothar Stilp, a former railway inspector, in condemning Hedler, stated that it should not be forgotten that Hedler "has only said what millions of Nazis still think today." The letter writer expressed his belief that Hedler is not at all an isolated case but one of many. As a matter of fact, the neo-Nazis in Germany greet each other now "Heil Hedler."

In a previous issue of Prevent World War III (No. 32) we disclosed the case of ex-Nazi Major General Otto Ernst Remer. We reported the outrageously pro-Nazi statements he made; now another item can be added.

Speaking recently at a political rally in Luechow, Remer called the accusations against Hitler-Germany "loose talk" and shouted that "the fairy tale of the German concentration camps will disappear one day."

Leonhard Schlueter, a member of the German Rechts

Partei, speaking at a political meeting in Gifhorn, Lower Saxony, said that Nazism was the "healthiest movement in Germany in the past few centuries." He expressed his conviction that "the day of a national revolt—not movement—is not far away."

Still another German political leader, Karl Feitenhansel, leader of the Vaterlaendische Union, at a secret meeting of his organization in Munich in the presence of 70 former SS officers, Gestapo agents and members of the SD (Nazi Security Services) declared: "The German people do not need to be ashamed. The German soldiers have behaved more decently than the allied soldiers do."

It is true that the outrageous statements made by the Hedlers, Schueters, Feitenhansels, Remers, etc., are being made by neo-Nazi party leaders. But what should one think when Chancellor Adenauer's own Justice Minister, Dr. Thomas Dehler, the Chairman of the Bavarian Free Democratic Party, publicly makes similar poisonous remarks?

Speaking recently at a meeting in Hamburg, Dehler declared: "We have reason to refute the fairy tale that Germany had decisive guilt for the first world war." As far as the first world war is concerned in his opinion Germany's guilt is not greater than that of France. And speaking of Nazism Dehler stated: "Time has come to speak out that Germany's is not the exclusive guilt on the phenonema of Hitler." Hitler was, said Dehler, "a consequence of the Versailles Treaty" and a result of the despondency of France which didn't want Germany to regain its old place; which created a cordon of security around Germany and which barred the return of the Germans in Austria and Bohemia back to Germany! In short, not the Germans were to blame for Hitler, but the French! And the belief that Germany was an aggressor nation was pure myth.

When the French occupational authorities displayed anger at these statements, Dehler declared he had been misquoted, which is the usual way of disclaiming responsibility where the issue gets too hot.

On all sides, new nationalistic and chauvinistic groups, outfits, organizations and parties are mushrooming all over Germany. One such party was recently founded in Hameln and called the Deutsche-Nationale Volks Partei. The new outfit is supposed to be the successor of the pre-Hitler right wing party which had the same name. As a matter of fact, Alfred Hugenberg, the old founder and chairman of the Deutsch-Nationale Volks Partei, was offered the Chairmanship of the new organization but he refused, as did Herr Schacht. Newcomer by the name of Hans-Joachim Gottsleben took over its leadership. He is a young writer and in founding the party he declared that he has the moral support of Herr Hugenberg and Herr Schacht. His new party does not attach great importance to the "masses," but whoever comes "from the people" is accepted cordially. As far as the other leaders of the party are concerned, they are "finer people who therefore want to remain anonymous."

Herr Gottsleben will not present a new party program but will instead adopt the old program of the Deutsch-Nationale Volks Partei. In a pamphlet addressed to "All nationally conscious," Herr Gottsleben, among other things, states a few significant ideas, which we deem important to call to the attention of our readers.

"If the now defenseless (disarmed) Germans should be forced to bear weapons they would rather desert, than fight against their own brothers. But if it should happen they will soon enough place themselves on the side of the more powerful, who clearly will win out and from whom the Fatherland can expect the best. We will go with the stronger, be it the Russians or the Americans, depending on who develops to be the strongest."

Another new party flaunting the black, white and red flag of the Kaiserreich was formed through the merger of the National Democratic Party of Hesse in the American Zone and the German Reichs Partei of Lower Saxony in the British Zone. The new party is headed by Franz Richter and by Dr. Heinrich Leuchtgens, an aged banker who was leader of the National Democratic Party. Both Richter and Leuchtgens are members of the Bonn Parliament. A few points of the program Franz Richter presented for the new party are worthy of note. Said Richter: "No price is too high to pay for German freedom"—which some listeners interpreted as including cooperation with Communism. Another significant point along the line of reawakening German arrogance was the demand that courts should be established "where Germans could take part in trying allied war criminals for crimes against the German people."

Still another, perhaps even more dangerous outfit, is the recently organized Society for the Reunification of Germany. Its chairman is Andreas Hermes, former Cabinet Minister for Agriculture under the Weimar Republic. While Hermes is in the foreground, the real wirepullers are a number of German diplomats like Nadolny, von Prittwitz, von Richthofen, as well as industrialists and other Russophile conservatives. The goal of the new organization is, according to its first communique, "to work for the reunification of Germany through self-determination."

The abovementioned are only a few of the new parties which have come to light since the end of the licensing of political organizations in the American Zone. Space prevents our naming all these innumerable little new foundings which remind one only too well of similar mushrooming outfits after World War I. But one cannot conclude this exposé without mentioning the so-called Brotherhood of Former German officers, which has established centers in Hamburg, Hanover, Duesseldorf and Munich. The new outfit is generally called a shadow organization of former German officers, and it is significant that its chairman, former Lt. General Kurt von Manteuffel, has more recently become Dr. Adenauer's chief confident on military questions.

A straight line leads from the outspoken Nazi statements of Hedler, Remer, Schlueter, Feitenhansel, Richter, Gottsleben to the chauvinistic outbursts of Dehler and finally to Manteuffel's new shadow organization. All these trends point toward the danger of neo-Nazism, growing right under the eyes of our own occupational authorities.

TELLING THE TRUTH!

During a recent poll by the American occupation authorities in Germany, a number of former high-ranking officers of the German army were asked what their role would be in the event of a future war. One general who played an important role in the recent war refused to answer.

When the American questioner insisted, the general asked, "Do you order me to answer?" The American said yes.

Thereupon the general answered the question: "In case of a war between the West and the East on whose side will you be?" as follows:

"On the side of Germany."

A NEW McCLOY?

No longer is everybody wondering what Chancellor Konrad Adenauer will do next: The question now is what the High Commission will do.

This Mr. McCloy has achieved by the simple act of telling the German people clearly, concisely and unmistakably that they are still committing a lot of their old traditional political mistakes, and that before the world will trust the new Germany she must humble herself and learn the lesson that "humility leads to strength and not to weakness . . . that the highest form of self-respect is to admit mistakes and to make amends for them. . . ."

What has produced the change in Mr. McCloy's attitude?

"A man can't go on being patient with the Germans forever," one of his high advisers remarked in discussing the matter. In the past six months Mr. McCloy gave in tremendously to Chancellor Adenauer and the West German government—gave in at what many felt was an alarming rate in the hope that demands would cease, but only to be confronted with other demands from other quarters. . . .

A chief factor in Mr. McCloy's new approach was the mood of American opinion he found on his last trip home—concern, he felt, at the growth of the old German autocratic temperament instead of the humility and Pan-European spirit of which he spoke in Stuttgart.

The High Commissioner had set a new pace for his mission in Germany and the favorite topic of conversation now is the question: "Is this the new McCloy?" Germans being the people they are and the politicians they are, he should not have to wait long to prove whether his speech is backed with policy.

Champions of Free Enterprise?

PART III

THE SAAR PROBLEM AGAIN

Perhaps the emergence of the Saar dispute between Germany and France will serve as a reminder to the West that nothing is more real than the facts of history. Coming as it does at a time when the democracies have been thoroughly sold on the necessity of integrating the West into a closer economic association, the Saar dispute brings us back to that fateful year—1935. It was a year of Hitler's first triumphs in the international game of politics.

Looking at 1935 in retrospect, it is clear that the return of the Saar to Germany was just one aspect of the pattern—not of justice—but of power for the Third Reich. The removal of one of the great grievances of Germany, calculated to perpetrate an act of justice did not normalize Europe; this act merely served as a forerunner for things to come. Today it is clear that the Western world misunderstood the true meaning of the Saar plebescite. It is fair, therefore, to ask whether the recent concessions made to Germany in the name of "integration" will not prove as deceptive as those made in the 30's.

Our policy of integration seems to be based on two points:

(1) We are trying to help create an integrated community of free nations strong enough to resist communist aggression and capable of serving as allies against the growing Soviet power.

(2) We are trying to prevent the Germans from allying themselves with Russia as they did after World War I. In order to accomplish this aim, we are endeavoring to integrate Germany into Western Europe.

Because of these two aims, we have completely reversed our Potsdam policy; we have given Europe the Marshall Plan; we have created the Western German Republic; we have supported the creation of the Western European Union; we have sent our military observers to Fontainebleau; we have joined the North Atlantic Pact; and we have passed the Military Arms Program.

MR. HOFFMAN'S INTEGRATION OF EUROPE

Mr. Paul Hoffman has been doing yeoman work to preach integration. Although the bill of particulars is still missing, Mr. Hoffman continues to preach that "a single trade area" must be established in Europe which will provide the Germans an outlet for their energies. Mr. Hoffman advocates the abolition of governmentally imposed barriers to international trade in Europe, import quotas designed to regulate the individual trade of pairs of countries, government monopolies in various commodities, dual prices like those imposed by Britain and Germany for coal sold at home and for export, multiple rates of exchange, and the abolition of cartel practices. The West has been told that unless Germany is integrated economically with France, Britain and Benelux, Germany would develop along nationalistic lines. It follows, therefore, that Germany must not be restricted in her "peaceful" pursuits.

What have been the results of this policy of integration? Not very encouraging. First of all, Germany has succeeded in liquidating the dismantling program, leaving her a far greater industrial capacity than she needs for her peacetime economy. In January 1950, Mr. McCloy was able to announce proudly to the world that Germany had reached 95% of the 1938 production—the year of intensive preparation for war. Germany has regained her merchant marine; she was admitted to the International Patent Office and the Brussels Customs Commission. We are now about to reverse the Occupation Statute, giving the Bonn Government, in addition to commercial and consular representation abroad, the right to designate its high functionaries. And looking at them who can say that they are the true representatives of German democracy and free enterprise?

And what did we get in return for all these concessions? All we got so far is that Germany joined the International Ruhr Authority, set up December 28, 1948, for the purpose of controlling the German war potential. We will let the German Minister of Justice describe the power of the International Ruhr Authority in his own words. On January 24, 1950, the Christian Science Monitor reported Dr. Thomas Dehler's (Minister of Justice in the Adenauer cabinet) characterization of the International Ruhr Statute as "hollowed out and out-stripped." This was the great victory reported in November, 1949, when Germany succeeded in scuttling the reparations program.

Last but not least, we are being told that Germany is ready to be admitted into the Council of Europe and, in due time, fight for the integrity of the French and Belgian frontiers.

GERMANY'S CONTRIBUTION

This is the balance sheet of our policy toward Germany. J. Emlyn Williams of the Christian Science Monitor January 10, 1950, summed it up thus: "since the change-over from military to civilian government in Germany last September 21, the duties and spheres of influence of the three western powers are much restricted. . . . It is probable that within a few months the Germans will have even greater power handed to them."

And as regards the activities of the Office of the U. S. High Commissioner, Mr. Williams had this to say:

"The American element in the Commission is regarded by sections of the German community as primarily supporting big industry because of future investment loans to this country."

Let us now appraise Germany's contribution to the integration of Europe. The story goes back to September-October 1949, when Germany unleashed her most intensive propaganda, both at home and abroad, to stop the dismantling program. As a result of this agitation, early in November, 1949, Mr. Acheson went to Paris to discuss the German problem with Messrs. Bevin and Schuman. The first result of this meeting was the decision to halt the dismantling of surplus German plants.

Subsequently, Mr. Acheson went to Bonn to talk with Dr. Adenauer. This gesture was calculated to show the Germans our goodwill. Exactly what happened at the meeting, we do not know. We do know, however, that Adenauer made the most eloquent plea in favor of Germany's biggest steel cartel, the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. At his side was Dr. Pferdmenges, who is closely associated with the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. How well Mr. Adenauer succeeded with Acheson can be seen from the fact that originally he had asked for the cessation of dismantling of three Vereinigte Stahlwerke plants. At the conclusion of Mr. Acheson's visit, Dr. Adenauer succeeded in removing six plants from the dismantling list—all belonging to the Vereinigte Stahlwerke.

NEW LOAN FOR THE GERMAN STEEL TRUST

Strengthened by this unexpected success, Adenauer addressed a secret memo to the three foreign ministers in which he asked for a loan of 300 million marks in order to improve the facilities of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke—225 million marks to come directly from the United States and 75 million marks from Belgium, France, and Luxemburg, but indirectly also from the United States. This sum was to be added to 250,000,000 marks already invested by the Vereinigte Stahlwerke since the monetary reform some 18 months ago. Presumably it came largely from the German counterpart of the Marshall Plan.

In return for these favors, Dr. Adenauer held out the prospect of linking the Rhine industries—that is, those of Germany, France, Belgium—in an integrated whole. Dr. Adenauer took advantage of the situation to proclaim himself as one of the most ardent defenders of European unity and integration—via the old and trusted road of international cartels. In plain English, what Adenauer proposed was the formation of a trust in which Krupp, Thyssen, Klockner, and Mannesmann would cooperate with the Comité des Forges.

Thereupon, Herman J. Abs of the Deutsche Bank, once Hitler's most successful banker, was dispatched to the United States to negotiate the 300 million mark loan. He landed in New York on November 12, 1949, and immediately began to make the rounds of Wall Street. While in New York, Mr. Abs loudly proclaimed his repugnance of the Nazi regime and naturally did not fail to express his sympathy for the Nazi victims—especially non-aryans. We are told he made a very favorable impression upon his listeners.

Something, however, went wrong with Mr. Abs' plans, for his presence was soon detected by Senator Guy Gillette. The State Department was thereupon asked a series of questions regarding the activities of Dr. Abs in the United States. As the State Department's answer to Senator Gillette was not satisfactory, Abs' presence in the United States was made public on January 6th. One day later, Mr. Abs abruptly left our shores.

However, during Vice Chancellor Franz Bluecher's recent visit to the United States, he has probably taken up the problem of loans for the German steel industry.

A DEAL WITH BRITAIN?

Meanwhile, Dr. Adenauer was not idle. While Abs was in this country spreading goodwill among us and praising Paul Hoffman's integration plans, Adenauer was busy wooing the British. It seems the British, especially the Iron and Steel Federation, did not particularly like Adenauer's idea of reconstructing the international steel cartel on the model of 1926. When the British Iron and Steel Federation took a look at Adenauer's proposals, they became alarmed. Here again, Adenauer was ready and willing to satisfy the British. He selected for the job Baron von Lersner, an experienced diplomat, to discuss the whole German-British problem with Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick of the German Division of the British Foreign Office. The latter was invited in December, 1949, to come to Dusseldorf to meet with a group of 22 bankers and industrialists. Among these were Dr. Dinkelbach of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke and head trustee under Law 75. Also present was the liberal member of the Bonn Parliament, Middlehauve, of the Franco-German Committee. These 22 bankers and industrialists were also very anxious to sell their version of integration of Western Europe.

But when it finally came to setting their terms, the Germans proposed that the British agree to the lifting of the German steel production from 11,100,000 tons—the ceiling set by the Allied authorities—to 16,000,000 tons per year. In return for this concession, the Germans were ready to make a deal with the British heavy industry and to revive the old fashioned bilateralism of Europe.

Around Christmas time, Dr. Adenauer dispatched Dr. Walter Schwede of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke to discuss the problem of bringing the British into the international steel cartel. Ostensibly, he went to London to discuss the sale of German steel. His real purpose, however, was to make a deal with the British whereby the European steel market would be divided among the British and the Germans, and to convince the British that the decartelization of Germany should be abandoned. (Parenthetically, this German emissary is the same Vereinigte Stahlwerke representative who sent, over a year ago, the famous brochure to some selected U. S. Senators in which he threatened Americans with dire consequences if the dismantling program were not stopped.)

And all this was going on while Hoffman was lecturing to the OEEC in Paris that Europe must integrate into a single trade area, where all nations would find an outlet for their energies and where there would be no opportunity to foster a self-contained economy such as practiced by Germany under Hitler.

Thus the German proposal of a private deal with the British was Germany's contribution to Mr. Hoffman's idea of integration of Western Europe. In other words, the Germans tried to doublecross Mr. Hoffman's cherished idea of multilateralism.

While all these negotiations were going on, the Germans had already succeeded in wresting additional concessions from the British. In December, 1949, it was also reported that the British agreed to rebuild the Thyssen Trust and the Bochumer-Verein. On December 12, 1949, the Herald Tribune reported that, following the appeal of Adenauer, the Allied High Commission decided to halt the shipments of huge machine tools from the Krupp Steel Works, despite vigorous protests of the Inter-allied Reparations Agency.

In this connection, it must be recalled that two years ago, young Krupp was given a 12-year sentence and his properties confiscated. Apparently, not only has the property not been confiscated, but it seems the Krupp combine has acquired a new lease on life.

STEEL CARTEL FOREVER

On November 20, 1949, the New York Times reported from Geneva that the German-French steel interests had begun serious discussions with the knowledge and approval of the French High Commissioner, André Francois-Poncet, for the purpose of reestablishing the international steel cartel. How the French fared in the past is the clue to what they may expect in the future, if the Germans have their way again.

While there were smaller international cartels in which Germany participated, they were of no great consequence. There was the International Railmakers Association which was founded in 1883 and included England, Belgium, Luxemburg, and Germany. It lasted until 1886 and was revived in 1904 when in addition to the original member countries, France and the U. S. A. joined. The revived cartel lasted until 1914. In all cases, these international agreements arose out of unpleasant experiences of cut-throat competition. As could be expected, Germany, as one of the new industrial countries backed by the imperial government, was one of the leaders in this economic competition. World War I broke up the early cartels, but soon after the first war Germany assumed the leadership, and in 1926 the first international steel cartel was founded.

The chief protagonists of this cartel were the Germans. The iron and steel capacity inside the new and smaller Germany had been increased in the twenties almost to the size of that of the pre-war Reich. France and Luxemburg, on the other hand, had a great deal of capacity, a sizable portion of which they had been accustomed to marketing in Germany. The position was particularly dangerous from the German point of view because the mark was then established, whereas inflation in France, Belgium and Luxemburg was at its worst which meant that the latter could dump their excess output in Germany. Against this, the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles compelling Germany to give duty-free entry to iron and steel from Belgium, France and Luxemburg, had ceased to operate in January, 1925.

The Germans began making overtures to enter into a cartel deal. The agreement entered into on September 19, 1926, at Brussels, Belgium, provided the means to check production. Percentage quotas based on crude steel output in the first quarter of 1926 were allocated to each of the five participants —Germany, Saar, France, Belgium, and Luxemburg.

The cartel agreement covered production for both domestic and export markets and provided a system of deposits and fines to compel adherence. To cover administration costs, there was a basic charge of $1.00 for every ton of crude steel produced. If a country exceeded its quota, it paid a penalty of $4.00 a ton. If a country failed to reach its quota, it received a compensation of $2.00 per ton.

In addition to the main agreement, there were special agreements to cope with the problems of finding a market for Lorraine and Luxemburg output. The various German syndicates undertook to purchase certain percentages of German consumption from France and Luxemburg. The agreement between the French and German governments permitted the Saar works to sell about one and a half billion tons per year of their output duty-free to Germany. In addition, a private agreement provided a market of 500,000 tons per year for Saar iron and steel in France.

THE FRENCH ARE OUTSMARTED

This in brief was the nature of the first major international steel cartel entered into in 1926. The French were elated about it. They thought they had made an excellent bargain, since—pennywise and pound foolish—they thought that a $4.00 penalty for over-production was a very good bargain. However, they did not make the proper calculations, and they knew little about Germany. For the facts are that at that time Germany had a steel capacity much in excess of demands. On the other hand, the Germans deliberately asked for a smaller quota than they were entitled to have. This was the bait they extended to the French.

The results were not long in coming. Six months after the establishment of the International Steel Cartel, the Germans paid $6,044,000 out of a total of $7,317,000 in overproduction fines, and the final upshot was that Germany went ahead expanding her industries, acquiring new markets, establishing a demand for their products, and shortly thereafter established herself as the largest producer of steel in Europe.

Nor was the cartel limited to the four contracting parties. Strengthened by its newly acquired position, the Germans were able to corral Austria, Czechoslovakia and Hungary in 1927. Britain was reluctant at first to join the cartel. In 1927, however, Britain began to realize that she was losing her position in the world's steel market. A cartel committee was set up to study the question of international sales syndicates. But it accomplished very little.

Following the collapse in Wall Street in October, 1929, commodity prices fell sharply and the International Steel Cartel made futile attempts to introduce some form of price control. In 1930 export control of individual semi-finished and finished steel products took the place of crude steel production control. It took Britain four years to elaborate the proper scheme for joining the cartel. One of the most difficult conditions to work out was to secure adequate centralized control of the industry in each of the member countries. This necessitated a reorganization within the British steel industry. With the active help of the British Government, this was accomplished in 1934, when the British Iron and Steel Federation was formed out of the old National Federation of Iron and Steel Manufacturers. Its functions corresponded to those of the German Rohstahlgemeinschaft. In 1935, the British joined the International Steel Cartel. Although the British gained some concessions from the cartel, they never recovered the losses sustained after World War I.

Meanwhile, as Germany's capacity increased, she began protesting against the smallness of her quota which was originally set at 40%. These protests were heeded and her quota was increased and the system of fines was restricted to export markets only.

The depression of the early 30's had a detrimental effect on the agreement. In 1932, however, the International Steel Cartel was strengthened by the addition of the control of sales, prices and export quotas. In 1933, further revisions were made and the agreements restricted to export markets, with quotas applying to ingot as well as products.

Although various U. S. producers were members of international sales agencies for steel products, the U. S. steel industry remained aloof from the cartel. However, by 1938, the Steel Export Association of America agreed to collaborate with the International Steel Cartel. Thus the Germans succeeded in the space of fourteen years in cartelizing the world steel producers.

GERMAN DOMINATION OF EUROPE

The salient feature of the International Steel Cartel was the fact that all quotas, compensation, and penalties, were determined on the basis of each nation as a unit. There were of necessity, exceptions—for instance, in the case of the U. S. where an attempt to force non-members to conform to the engagements of the Steel Export Association would be a violation of the anti-trust laws.

With the outbreak of World War II, the ISC and the commodity cartels were put in abeyance without formal dissolution. During its existence, the ISC controlled more than 2/5 of world production and 5/6 of all the international steel trade. Moreover, it was in a position to fix prices and, to a large extent, world production.

Such is the history of Germany's contribution to the free enterprise system in the past. Did it do Europe any good? Not much need be said here—the aftermath of World War II is still visible to all. The German international cartel system softened up Europe and contributed greatly to Germany's success in World War II. It accomplished this in two ways:

1. It gave Germany the means of establishing her industrial domination of her neighbors and prospective victims and

2. It enabled the Germans to obtain the secrets of her neighbors' industries and to infiltrate not only Europe but Latin America, so that the cartels became a part of an imperial scheme of world domination.

The International Steel Cartel brought together many of the international industrialists in Europe, but the Germans dominated, and they increased their capacity at the expense of their neighbors. And when that capacity increased sufficiently, they threatened to dissolve the cartel unless the restriction on their production was lifted. This was the pattern which the German cartels always followed—to increase their own production at any cost, and then, with the threat of their increased capacity, to negotiate commercial agreements which recognized the dominant position they had attained.

PERPETUAL BLINDNESS . . .

Since some French steel interests and politicians seem so eager to accept Adenauer's proposal to reestablish the International Steel Cartel, let us see what happened to them in the past. In 1926, when the first steel cartel was organized, German production of pig iron was only 2½% greater than that of France. In 1938, production of pig iron and steel by one German company alone—the Vereinigte Stahlwerke—exceeded the combined production of all the French mills. As the German Steel Trust reported for the year 1938, "Germany succeeded in putting out more than 23 million tons of steel, its highest production since its inception. It was able to increase its share of the world production of steel from 15% in the previous year to 22%, and thus attain second place immediately behind the U. S. A., the production of which country fell during the same period by almost a half."

As a result of Germany's activities in the International Steel Cartel, the German steel industry grew steadily and acquired controlling interests in the steel firms in the rest of Europe during the period when the Germans were arguing that their country was on the verge of bankruptcy. It did so not only in a way which violated the peace treaties, but was calculated to prepare Germany for war and to prevent or at least restrict production in other European countries. It was a combination of the steel and coal trusts which decided that the way to cripple the French steel industry was to request the German industrialists (who received indemnity from the German Government) to build new and more modern mills in the Ruhr and then to use the German control of coke and the pricing of coke as a club over the French mills. Nor were Germany's intentions kept secret. A Krupp official stated it quite bluntly when he said: "the first war convinced us that it is not iron and ore which count most in the iron and steel industry but the coke supply." This was true in the 30's as it is true today.

Statistics are available to prove the point. In 1948 the French steel production exceeded that of the Germans by 1,700,000 tons. In 1949, however, the German production was almost equal to that of France. There is no doubt that Germany will produce 11,100,000 tons in 1950—the limit allowed under the tripartite agreement.

Should the Germans succeed in reestablishing the International Steel Cartel, the results would not be difficult to guess. Germany, of course, would take all possible advantage of the opportunities presented to her. Moreover, since the Germans themselves are quite frank about their intentions, it is quite clear that the West is deliberately deluding itself about Germany's contribution to the integration of Europe.

It is fair to say that the West did not fight off two aggressions in order to perpetuate the German-dominated cartel system. For to do so would be worse than a crime—it would be downright stupid.

RETURN ENGAGEMENT?

(Cartoon by Fitzpatrick—Courtesy St. Louis Post-Dispatch)

". . . The German officers, though their armies have been disbanded and most of their heavy equipment removed, continue to have the main elements of a general staff, appointed, it is supposed, before the surrender in 1945, and they are known in any event to be operating an intelligence service. There is no impenetrable iron curtain separating the German officers who live in the West from those who live in the East, and there can be little doubt that more or less clandestine communication and intercourse goes on continually among the officers on both sides of the line, as well as among politicians and business men. The estimate of these officers as to what is coming—namely decisions affecting the whole of Germany—must be taken seriously.

"So, too, must the French estimate. For among the three Western delegations the French delegation now in Germany is by all odds the most competent, the best informed and the most expertly trained, in German affairs. The action of the French government in respect to the Saar shows that like the Bonn government it believes that the time is rapidly approaching when the German peace treaty will be dealt with. Mr. Schuman and Dr. Adenauer agree about the Saar. But they understand each other very well because they both know that the period of the great decisions about Germany is near. Both are getting ready for it."

Distorting German History

Current Publications in Former Reich Whitewash the War and Hitlerism

by

DR. ROBERT M. W. KEMPNER

The author served from 1945 to 1949 as United States Deputy Chief Prosecutor in Nuernberg and guest professor at German universities.

Today Western Germany, our solicitously nurtured test-tube democracy, is being swamped with nationalistic and militaristic literature singing the praises of the grand old times of the Third Reich. With more or less outspoken nostalgia, many political writers in Germany are telling their people that Germany would have been fine if Der Fuehrer had not gotten a little out of hand. Adolf Hitler should have listened a little more to the diplomats, to the generals, to the admirals, and Germany would have been the victor in World War II.

Let us take a look at some typical newspapers, periodicals and books now in heavy demand in Germany, and see how they are treating the recent political past.

From Duesseldorf, Rhineland city near the seat of the Bonn Federal Republic, the spicy weekly "Herzdame" (Queen of Hearts) is distributed over all Western Germany. In the issue of Sept. 10, 1949, we find on the cover page Adolf Hitler's picture three times, three pictures of his Reich Marshal Hermann Goering with wife, Emmy, and infant daughter Edda, and one picture of the Fuehrer's sweetheart Eva Braun; on other pages, a picture of Hitler with the wife of his architect, a picture of Eva Braun with Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop, a picture of Hitler and his deputy, Rudolph Hess.

Munich contributes the periodical "Revue" (Review) with a picture of Der Fuehrer smiling somewhat shyly at the side of his niece, Angelica Reubel, a girl whom the records indicate, he later, in a less gracious mood, had killed by poisoning. Here in the picture niece Angelica smiles radiantly out at the post-war public, attired in a charming dirndl dress, and Adolf's friendly arm is about her shoulder. Last September, the "Revue" began serial publication of "The Great Lover, Adolf Hitler," a story in which movie director Leni Riefenstahl is one of the leading ladies. Here again Der Fuehrer is humanized, this time his loves are sung by the connoisseur and Hofbrau cavalier, Hermann Esser, once State Secretary for Tourism in Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry. After his release from detention as a suspected war criminal, Hermann Esser went in hiding and made use of the time that the German police were seeking him to compose his great lover stories. Sentenced in absentia to five years of hard labor by the Bavarian Denazification Court, he finally was taken into custody when he went to pick up his publisher's payment.

While the nationalistic sentiments of the women of Germany are roused by moving stories of Hitler and Goering, the appeal to the men is based on doughty episodes from the "best time of their lives," the military time. This campaign is a bold, whitewashing attempt on behalf of the military men who, willingly following their beloved Fuehrer's bidding, led the German people to disaster. Today their line is: Hitler alone is responsible for the defeat; if we had been heeded, we would have waged a better war, and we would have led the nation to victory!

The militaristic brochures are offered for sale to the public under the most blatant advertising, and they fill an enthusiastic demand. "Hitler als Feldherr" (Hitler as Strategist), with the picture of Der Fuehrer on the cover, put out by the chief of his general staff, Franz Halder, is an apologia for the German generals, who could have done things better. The contents are in crass contradiction to Halder's own diaries from the Nazi time.

The German navy gets its share in recent German articles on the "Heroic Battle" of the cruiser Bismarck, and the miraculous breakthrough of the Bremen. The Munich paper "Revue" competes in this theme with the Stuttgart weekly "Christ und Welt" (Christ and World), which otherwise did an excellent job in sponsoring the integration of refugees from Eastern Germany.

More dangerous for most Germans than these publications are articles and books of latter-day Hitler enemies. They call themselves "experts" and employ the subtle venom of quoting each other as proof for their theories.

A typical instance of the ricochet self-promotion going on in this mutual society for muffling the Third Reich record is the publication of Hitler's chief interpreter, Paul Otto Schmidt, in the "Sueddeutsche Zeitung" (South German Newspaper), Munich, on the occasion of the ten-year anniversary of the outbreak of war in September, 1949. Instead of placing before the public from the files of the German Foreign Office, the Fuehrer-loyal diplomatic preparation of the Second World War, this series of articles, which is already available in book form, makes the reader believe that the negotiations with the British and the Poles were sincerely intended and that the outbreak of war came as a surprise to the same men who had organized its initiation! Paul Otto Schmidt, eyewitness of the diplomatic preparations for the murder of the French General Maurice Mesny and similar acts, has, of course, the perfect right to suppress the darkest chapters of his experiences. However, for German publishers to present Paul Otto Schmidt's stories as the recounting of an objective historian to their trusting readers, will lead to dangerous consequences for Germany's future.

A very harmful book in the political field has unfortunately been published by the reputable Nymphenburger Publishing House. The book "Was Wirklich Geschah" (What Really Happened) claims to be an objective representation of the German policy. However, it became a publicizing effort on the exclusive guilt of Hitler and possibly of a handful of his fanatic henchmen, and a bold whitewashing of other top officials, no matter how notoriously implicated. It is typical of this method of history-writing that the horrifying diplomatic documents pertaining to the massacre of the prisoners of war and of the Jews are missing.

Two high Hitler officials who were acquitted of major war crimes charges in Nuernberg for lack of sufficient evidence have taken up their pens to give their expert versions of the past years: Hjalmar Schacht and Hans Fritsche. The field of recent German policy is covered by a book of Hitler's one-time financial wizard, the much over-rated Hjalmar Schacht. With no lack of a bold front he titles his book "Abrechnung mit Hitler" (Settling Accounts with Hitler). Encouraged by his success, Herr Schacht recently published a sequel volume on his dubious financial theories.

Hans Fritsche, the notorious radio boss of Nazi Progaganda Chief Paul Joseph Goebbels, devoted his book "Hier Sprecht Hans Fritsche" (Here Speaks Hans Fritsche) to his experiences in Hitler and post-Hitler days. The book, published in Switzerland, enjoys a wide circulation in Germany and a German publisher is preparing a new edition.

Indeed, a survey of the books and articles on the Nazi regime currently offered shows only a few authors forthright enough to present their experiences in the Third Reich without too much caution about the roles they played. One is Werner Stephan, a former councillor of the Propaganda Ministry, in his book "Joseph Goebbels, Demon of a Dictatorship," in which a sincere account is given of Goebbels' personal life and his propaganda machine. Another open-minded author is Rudolf Diels, the first chief of the dread Gestapo, preceding Heinrich Himmler in that office. In his book "Lucifer ante Portas," he tells the story of that agency in the first beginnings, when the groundwork was laid for the abolition of all civil liberties. A third publication giving an accurate historical account is the book of the general staff officer, Gerhardt Poldt, "Die Letzten Tage der Reichskanzlei" (The Last Days of the Reich Chancellery).

In this connection, some books of real resistance fighters should be mentioned, such as general staff officer Fabian von Schlabrendorff's "Offiziere gegen Hitler" (Officers Against Hitler); Ambassador Ulrich von Hassel's posthumously published diaries, and the excellent German edition of Allan Dulles' "Germany's Underground." The book of the anti-Nazi Bernd Gisevius, "Bis Zum Bittern Ende" (To the Bitter End) was published in Germany about two years ago. Today, it would be hard for a German publisher to take the risk of such a publication.

To the utter disgust of the falsifiers of recent history, a series of well-based articles on Nazi foreign policy was published by Wanda von Bayer in the magazine "Frankfurter Hefte." An objective document collection on Nazi-Soviet collaboration was published by Dr. Alfred Seidl in Munich.

What are we to conclude from the poll of present-day German publications on recent history? Is the situation hopeless? In Germany itself we hear such discouraged voices as that of Friedrich Sieburg in an editorial in the November issue of the magazine "Die Gegenwart" (The Present Day): "We are entirely unconvinced that the ever mounting sensational publications concerned with Hitler and consorts can be dismissed as mere stupidity. . . . The incontrovertible fact is that the public is lining up at the newsstands and asking what there is on Hitler. Of course, they are not asking with that for any of these historic records brought to light in the Nuernberg Trials which are not available even for any one who might show an interest." Sieburg's comment is very interesting since he speaks not only as a German but as one who went through the Nazi mill and is none the less able today to look the ghosts of the Third Reich in the face.

(Il Paese, Rome, Italy)

I myself, during the years from 1945 to 1949, have had the opportunity to discuss this problem with representative publishers in Germany, Switzerland and Austria, and I have come to the conclusion that there are indeed many publishers who would sincerely prefer to tell the history of recent years objectively. But they lack the financial backing to undertake such risks. The market for objective books and articles on the Third Reich would have to be developed from scratch, and with long-range financial backing.

It is high time to publish and place before the German public the wealth of interesting, factual material that has come to light in German archives, in the Nuernberg investigations, and in the clarifying statements of true German patriots. This is the only way to combat the systematic poisoning of the German mind going on under our very eyes in the infant German Republic.

The Number One Problem — Steel

To understand the far-reaching economic and political repercussions which could result from policies that place overemphasis on the development of Germany's industrial power, it is necessary that we resort to some cold statistics. Admittedly, statistics can be boring and even frightening, but at times there is no other alternative but to take the gamble and hope that the reader will stay with us throughout.

The steel division of the ECE (Economic Commission for Europe), a United Nations agency, recently made public its report on the steel situation in Europe. The report indicated that European demands for steel in 1953 would be roughly 58 million tons. It was also estimated that for the same year Europe might be expected to export about 4,100,000 tons of crude steel. On the other hand, the steel programs of various European countries surveyed by the steel division, amount to a total production of 70 million tons. Thus, according to the steel division, 8 million tons of steel may not be able to find a market in 1953.

The Economic Commission for Europe, as reported by the New York Times, January 1, 1950, found that in the year 1949 there were 6 million tons of steel capacity idle in Europe, excluding Germany. When these two facts regarding the situation in steel production in Europe are considered alongside the report that American steel capacity has reached the enormous level of 99 million tons per year, then the world is faced with a problem of the first magnitude.

The Germans are fully aware of these facts and yet their steel barons agitate day and night for the overthrowing of all limitations on steel production in Germany on the allegation that the export of German steel and steel products are necessary to fill in the gap between Germany's exports and imports. The Germans shy away from the crucial question of how they intend to sell more abroad, in the face of contracting markets throughout the world. They have good reason to avoid answering the question because there is no magic formula that could wish away these facts. But let it not be said that the Germans are bereft of ingenious plans. The London Economist, in trying to answer the German urge for all-out steel production, declared that the Ruhr industrialists envisaged the present organization of the Marshall Plan nations evolving "into a new international cartel." Once the cartel is set up, then "the Ruhr, a cheap producer, economically well-situated can look forward to the collapse of plans for establishing steel industries for such countries as Italy and Norway." In other words, the Germans in their bid for economic resurgence hope to organize a new and more gigantic steel cartel that would dominate Europe.

The prospect of German steel dominating Europe frightens Germany's neighbors. Furthermore, some leaders in the American steel industry are aware of the implication of a revival of the German power house. As a matter of fact, Eugene G. Grace, the Chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation told its stockholders recently that Bethlehem steel exports during the fourth quarter of 1949 dropped 4.1% of the company's total shipments. "That is how quickly our exports have nose-dived," he said. Touching on the program for enlarging Germany's steel capacity, which incidently has not been mentioned officially by American authorities, Mr. Grace declared that this would result in Germany having 8 million tons of steel available for foreign markets over and above her domestic needs. This too, Mr. Grace implied, could have a serious effect on the steel industry in the United States.

Some may say that there need be no fear of German competition, but the Germans do not compete according to normal business practices. On the contrary, the Germans have a history of resorting to every kind of shady practice backed up by the German State, to undercut competitors. Even today the Germans are preparing to employ huge subsidies for their steel industry. There are already signs that there will be a reorganization of the industries of the Ruhr whereby the coal mines would be owned by the steel trusts which, as in the past, would run them at a loss in order to dispose of the finished steel products at cut-rate prices. We know that the steel industry in Germany today receives a subsidy in the form of cheap coal, while the same coal sells higher for export.

The Associated Press reported that the German federal railways would introduce special freight rates for iron and steel exports via German seaports. The reduction of freight rates provided for is by ⅓ lower than that before the war. Other plans are afoot whereby German exports would be accelerated by a 10% foreign exchange bonus. Together with these contemplated subsidies and the notorious cheap labor in Germany, we can discern the outline of the new German assault in the economic sphere.

We are told, however, that Germany would not be allowed to set up any cartel devices which would help carry out this grandiose plan. On the supposition that that is true, what about United States policy as regards the ultimate capacity of the German steel industry? If, on the one hand we solemnly pledge that Germany shall not be permitted to use her power in steel to undermine the economies of her neighbors, and on the other hand, wink at German agitation for the lifting of present limitations, we shall be creating a new Frankenstein monster.

It should be recalled that a good part of German heavy industry in the past was out of balance. It did not correspond to the genuine domestic needs of the German people and it was confronted at that time by shrinking world markets. Particularly after World War I, the real nature of the German economy became clear when the Germans initiated the cartel system in Europe. The establishment of these huge cartels was an implicit recognition of the fact that under normal competitive business conditions, Germany's productive capacity could not function at full blast.

The tremendous industrial war potential which Germany possessed prior to the war, including steel, is for the most part intact. As in 1930 these top heavy German industries are facing contracting markets abroad. It is clear that dangerous consequences flow from the present policy in Germany which permits an excessive industrial potential. After World War I the Germans "solved" this dilemma by the building up of the German war machine and preparing for aggressive war. Is it not clear that this double game of so-called decartelization, and at the same time recklessly building up the German steel industry, will produce the same urge on the part of the Germans to seek other outlets for the employment of this huge industrial war potential?

Yet Mr. John J. McCloy, American High Commissioner has intimated that serious considerations have been given to the resumption of American investments in German industry. We do not know whether this is part of the point four program which is supposed to develop backward countries, but we do know that there is tremendous pressure to permit new multimillion dollar investments in the German steel industry. For the German steel barons, such investments would serve as the opening wedge for unlimited steel capacity.

But there is another angle which was neatly expressed by the astute German politician, Gustav Stresemann. In his memoirs, Stresemann talks about the Dawes Plan of 1924 which was the precursor of enormous American investments in German industry. He said, "The Dawes loan will cause 300 thousand Americans to make propaganda for Germany because they will be interested in her prosperity." Herr Stresemann knew whereof he spoke. Chancellor Adenauer too knows the score.

Professor Ludwig Erhard, Minister of Economics for the Bonn Government, who has taken a hand in the propaganda drive of the German steel trust, admitted that whether the present limitation will be sufficient for Germany "was not an economic but a political question." In other words, from an economic point of view, the German demand has no sound economic basis. It is rather linked up with other considerations such as profitable investments and perhaps military strategy.

The military consideration was very succinctly expressed by Mr. Jackson Martindell, President of the American Institute for Management. After a recent on-the-spot survey of the European situation, he had this to say with regard to Germany:

"In part, this is a duplication of what happened to France after World War I. As part of her indemnities, France obtained from Germany old and obsolete rolling stock and other equipment which she put into use in France, leaving Germany stripped bare of many essentials. Germany then borrowed money from England and the United States and rebuilt with the most highly modern equipment, resulting in Germany—the defeated nation—being technologically far ahead of France, the neighboring victor."

Mr. Martindell said that the same thing seemed to be occurring again. He related the story of a British salesman who asked him "Why are you Americans letting Germany have all this wonderful machinery if your purpose is not to ruin both of us?" In commenting on this point Mr. Martindell said:

"This is no mere passing phase. The tendency is strong for the reestablishment of German industry, at least in the West. What has not been dismantled and shipped out of the country has been damaged by war and is now being replaced. Germany, defeated in two major wars, is likely to come out of the second one far superior in technology to any country in Europe or Asia. If the Western powers then decide to arm Western Germany so that she might be a buffer against Russia, we will have created an industrial war potential overshadowing our combined allied might."

Is it not clear from all this that one cannot permit the Germans to build up her steel capacity under present contracting market conditions without creating a situation which will induce the Germans to resort to rearmanent again? Policy makers refuse to tackle this dilemma.

While our primary concern is the danger of the revival of Germany's industrial power which could be the basis for any future Wehrmacht, the scrapping of present limits on her steel capacity would create havoc among the economies of Germany's neighbors. It would increase unemployment and create political unrest which would play into the hands of extremist elements. Nor would American industry or labor be immune. Here too there would be a falling off of steel production and employment which would have a chain reaction throughout the American economy.

Just as at Bonn, where ultraconservatives are rising to power despite the association of many of them with the leaders of Hitler's Reich, so in the schools the influences left over from the old Germany are strong ..."

IN THE AUSTRIAN NATIONAL elections late last year one of the surprises was the success at the polls of the so-called Independents, who grabbed themselves off nine seats in the new parliament. This is an ultra-nationalist outfit and, in reading the party manifestoes, bifocals are not required to see the tender regard with which these unregenerate gentlemen continue to embrace the memory of a onetime Austrian house painter, lately deceased. They ape many of the Nazi party's ritualistic and mystic mannerisms, even to saluting with a stiff upraised right arm.

Last week a platoon of these Independents paraded preparatory to holding one of their meetings here, and an observant American correspondent, viewing these infantile but potentially dangerous antics, noticed one dissimilarity in their salute from that of their Nazi predecessors. When Hitler's minions saluted, the fingers of the right hand were extended. The Austrian Independents, however, close their fists with the exception of the pinky, which coyly peeps out, much in the manner of your excessively refined Aunt Theodora having herself a cup of Pekoe with the other elderly ladies of the church bazaar. The correspondent finally cornered the leader of the Independents, and asked whether there was any significance to be read into this pinky business which seemed to him, he said, curiously effeminate for these inheritors of Der Fuehrer's mantle.

"It's very simple," the leader replied. "We have a Five Year Program, like everybody else. This year we show only the little finger when saluting. Next year our men will expose two fingers. By 1954, when my men will show all their fingers, Hitler will know that he has been vindicated. But we are starting modestly, and this year show only the kleine finger (little finger)."

Must American labor and management be sacrificed in the interest of 300 thousand new potential investors? These are the considerations which deserve the careful study of American management and labor. In our opinion, a program which would limit Germany's industrial potential to genuine peacetime requirements as recommended by the United States Foreign Economic Administration, would not only avert this economic danger, but would at the same time strengthen American security and world peace.

JACK RAYMOND reports to the New York Times:

"Robert M. Hanes, chief of the Economic Cooperation Administration mission in Western Germany, has written a sharp letter to Chancellor Adenauer reminding him of the importance of increasing agricultural production at a time when the U. S. is still supplying huge amounts of food for Western Germany and the German diet is growing faster than expected.

"An ECA report on the West German aid program pointed out that the Germans had reached their 1951 food consumption targets a year in advance because of a good harvest and heavy food imports. . . . In his letter Mr. Hanes called attention to the fact that 70% of the total of the U. S. aid to Germany had gone for food. Yet up to the present, he said, less than 10% of German counterpart funds had been assigned to the development of agricultural resources. This appeared to be an incongruity that ought to be rectified, Mr. Hanes declared. Several persons in the U. S. High Commissioner's office, it was learned, felt the letter was too strong' . . ."

FROM AN ARTICLE by C. L. Sulzberger in the New York Times, titled, "Germans Use the 'Cold War' to Speed Return to Power":

"By hard work and shrewd national instincts the German people have . . . placed themselves in a position from which they may some day again be able to dominate Europe. Political divisions between the East and the West and among Western Allies themselves have provided Germany as a nation with the mechanism for accelerating its physical recovery at a rate unforseen when victorious statesmen met to survey the ruins from Potsdam. . . .

"In an effort to gain permanent control over the Eastern occupation zone, Moscow has been lavish with favors to its supporters. This procedure has stimulated the West to boost the industrial potential in its zone—above all in steel—far above any levels foreseen even two years ago. Prodding this tendency has been a veiled blackmail hint by Western Germans to the effect that 'we will never turn eastward to the Soviet Union for help as long as you treat us fairly.'..."

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN reports:

"(Recently) the Poltiical Directorate of the Allied Council in Vienna decided unanimously that 'Great Rapture,' a book written by a former S.S. agent, Erich Kernmayer, contained military and Nazi propaganda and warranted full action by the Council. . . .

"Now the Austrian paper 'Alpenruf,' which has already received one warning from the Allied Council, started to serialize the book 'in order to make it available to returned soldiers.'"

Here are some typical passages from Kernmayer's book:

"Once, however, there was a cheerful hour in all the terrible news that befell us time and again. Once again we were sitting together round the bunk of an old colonel from Hamburg and argued until we were red in the face.

"'We ought to have got England,' a young Luftwaffe officer, decorated with the Knight's Cross, exclaimed. 'We ought to have rubbed out that damned aircraft-carrier at all costs. It was a deadly military mistake that we didn't dare jump the Channel after Dunkirk. Where could the United States air fleet have started from? Would the United States have entered the war at all? England was the great decision long before Stalingrad.'

"'Dear comrades,' the old colonel said, with a deadly serious voice, 'let us therefore raise our coffee cups to the victorious Labour party.' Speechless, we looked at him. . . . The old gentleman laughed until the tears came. 'You think I am somewhat wrong in the head. Not at all, but you would say yourselves that no one could have avenged us so thoroughly on England as the Labour party has done. Everything England wanted to defend has gone. Her mighty Empire has gone to the devil. We would never have thought of such war aims in our dreams — India, Palestine, Egypt, and, you watch, shortly the Near East. And who has England got to thank for it? Whom do we thank for such a splendid satisfaction with our shattered and annihilated Germany? I admit my glee is a little childish, for it does not help us, but let me have this little satisfaction. Therefore, up the cups, hooray for the good Labour party.'"

FROM A COLUMN in The New York Times by Hanson W. Baldwin:

". . . We have not followed either the Carthaginian policy or the slave satellite policy in Germany. Instead, naively, we have tried, with all sorts of ineptitude and against powerful forces all tending in the opposite direction, to 'democratize' in a few years a nation with centuries of military and ultra-nationalistic tradition.

"Today that tradition is far from dead. The spirit of Hitler and of the German General Staff still stalk Germany. And nationalistic groups — probably secretly linked underground—are nourishing the ancient tradition of 'Deutschland Ueber Alles.'"

AP REPORTS from Duesseldorf:

A German plan to end Allied control of the vast coal, iron and steel combine of the Ruhr, protect private interests and reorganize West German heavy industry on a purely German basis was circulated in Duesseldorf.

The plan was issued by the Protective Association of Security Stockholders, claiming to represent former shareholders and creditors of West German industrial concerns. It criticized the Allied coal and steel groups for unwarranted delay in reorganization . . .

To replace the Allied coal and steel control groups which have been working on decartelization since last September, it is proposed that only the West German Government, aided by the German Coal Board and the steel trustee associations, be concerned with the redistribution of economic power.

I read with disgust John Hohenberg's accounts about those convicted Nazi war criminals. These men are now petitioning the authorities for clemency in their sentences. Back in April of 1948, all of them were condemned to death by a legal body given empowerment by the Allies. John McCloy, High Commissioner in Germany, is the last obstacle before this sentence is carried out. Mr. McCloy seems to be taking his good sweet time about putting those Nazi rats into a hangman's noose. What the blazes is he waiting for? Is it part of our State Department policy to consider stalling expedient for our dealings with the Germans? I know a few G.I.'s who'll break an old Army rule and volunteer for the job of hanging these 16 men. Here's hoping those Nazis are buried . . . preferably in garbage where they belong.

ANTI-NAZIS PERSECUTED

A new persecuted class had been created in Germany: the "collaborators." Many people are in this category: former refugees who returned and are surrounded by a wall of distrust and often even hated if their activities are in the public sphere, former inmates of concentration camps, former personnel of the occupation authorities, including even drivers of military government vehicles, and especially former employees of de-nazification courts. Former Nazis get a job much more easily than people who are in these categories. Boycott is an effective weapon in the time of unemployment. When in the American Zone a law was enacted to protect former denazification tribunal employees, there were seven thousand applications for help. Though railways and postal services were instructed to accept these former employees, they have taken less than 100! The boycott movement became so strong that organizations for the protection of these people had to be formed.

The chairman of a tribunal got this letter: "By your behaviour you have still given supplementary evidence that your detention in a concentration camp was justified. By your surviving it has been proved that the Nazis showed much too much mercy. Many millions of Germans will loathe you." The Ministry of Denazification in North Wurttemberg-Baden stated that mayors, town councillors, district councillors, etc. explained categorically they were unable to employ former staff members of the tribunals. This boycott is the revenge. The town council of Kempton, Allgau, found an excuse in the attitude of the population: "On reasons of general antipathy it is not possible to give jobs to those people."

This story of the Nazi destruction of the Warsaw ghetto and its inmates is a masterpiece of the novelist's art in which a gifted journalist has employed one of the world's epics of heroism to create an unforgettable work of the imagination. Taking the tragic event itself as the keystone of his arching structure, John Hersey has invented a whole gallery of characters, each full bodied and completely realized, and fashioned a superbly woven network of intricate detail. Despite the handicap of a technical device by which the novel itself is made up of simulated diaries and notes, the story has a cumulative power which mounts rapidly to gripping proportions. We breathlessly follow the fate of these unfortunate Jews through all their terror and horror and agony and nobility until a handful of survivors ultimately escapes destruction through the sewers of Warsaw.

Why?

WHY has the 7-year sentence of Nazi war criminal Baron Ernst von Weizsaecker been reduced to five years?

WHY did General Clay, when he was still in Germany, issue instructions to have the German file on Dr. Josef Mueller delivered to Baron von Prittwitz and Herr von Schlaberndorf?

WHY was the dossier which incriminated Dr. Josef Mueller not kept in the American files of dubious German politicians? (Josef Mueller recently joined the ranks of the protagonists of a Russo-German Alliance and of the Soviet-sponsored National Front movement in Western Germany.)

WHY has the Western German government taken preliminary action to reduce sharply the amounts which the Western allies have decreed shall be given in restitution to the victims and sufferers of Nazism?

WHY has High Commissioner John J. McCloy in the past months continuously made optimistic comments on political attitudes of the Germans regarding nationalism and neo-Nazism before he finally refuted himself in his recent outspoken speech?

WHY, although 3,500,000 Germans admitted to having been Nazis on the official military government questionnaire, were only 1800 (one-half of 1 per cent) officially excluded from holding public office?

WHY has the former camp physician of the Nazi concentration camp Fuhlsbuettel, near Hamburg, a certain Schnappauf, who had been sentenced to twelve years, been released after serving only two and one-half years in prison?

WHY did Chancellor Adenauer recently state that the neo-Nazi rabble-rousers do not constitute a real threat in Western Germany, although the acquittal of Wolfgang Hedler by a court presided over by former Nazi party members gives Adenauer's statement the lie?

WHY is Otto Skorzeny, generally considered one of the most dangerous Nazi gangsters, who headed the Nazi plan to infiltrate American lines during the Battle of the Bulge, able to remain at liberty after his escape from a German prison camp last year?

WHY do Allied authorities not take the necessary steps to re-arrest Skorzeny who is obviously traveling freely through Western Europe, and recently resided in Paris?

WHY was Hitler's master spy and conspirator in the middle and near East, Dr. Grobba, able to vanish into obscurity?

WHY have American correspondents failed to report a speech by Soviet Captain Legin, made before SED party leaders and the chief of the people's police in Berlin, in which the Russian officer made this significant statement: "Because you have the great honor to be a part of the freedom-loving Sovietland, and of its Allies, you have always to be thoughtful to appreciate the confidence of Stalin and that of the workers of the Democratic Republic"?

WHY did the papers fail to report that in answer to the Soviet captain's speech, SED leader Paul Stellmacher stated: "We (Germans) will, if need be, even with arms in our hands, contribute to win the victory over American imperialism and its fascist helpers in Western Germany"?

"... Many Germans nowadays are busy explaining the war in terms of their own exculpation; they are blaming everybody but themselves for the war and its aftermath; they are shadow-boxing with collective guilt. ... It is discouraging that, knowing this, the German parties, all the way from the non-Communist Left to the extreme Right, are so stridently nationalist ..."

"It would have been in order weeks ago for the Allied authorities in Germany to sail in with the kind of sharp criticism and admonitions regarding the shortcomings—particularly regarding resurgent Nazism and militarism—of the five months old Western German government, forcefully enunciated by U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy.

"Mr. McCloy has at last said some things that badly needed saying ...

"Emphasis placed by Commissioner McCloy on Allied determination to keep Germany faced toward the West, not the East, and away from Nazism and militarism is in order. But that emphasis must not be desultory. It should be applied from now on. We should not wait until new provocative trends in the wrong direction threaten to get out of hand, as they have lately."

(From an editorial in The Philadelphia Inquirer)

"... the possession of armed forces in the past has never guaranteed the Germans against being 'drawn into the whirlpool.' On the contrary, it was those very forces, plus the fear, real or imagined, of 'encirclement' that twice in a generation precipitated the whirlpool ..."

(From an editorial in the New York Herald Tribune)

WHY has the German magazine Weltbild (British Zone), which charged the British with war atrocities and referred scornfully to Winston Churchill as being guilty of the same offenses as Field Marshal von Manstein, not been reprimanded or suspended?

WHY is Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for Prevention of War in Washington, coming to the defense of convicted German war criminals and mass murderers such as S. S. leader Sepp Dietrich, who was one of those responsible for the mass killings of American prisoners of war at Malmedy?

WHY has the American High Commission in Germany failed to investigate the incredible denazification scandal in Stuttgart, where high German officials helped infamous Nazis bribe their way free of denazification courts?

WHY were former Nazi party members permitted to become judges at the Wolfgang Hedler trial, and why was nothing done to replace these Nazis in time before they could render a judgment of acquittal in the case of this Hitlerite?

FROM BROWN TO RED

They've turned back the clock in Western Germany—turned it back to the days of the Weimar Republic and 1928. And the big question in everyone's mind is: Will history repeat itself?

"Your democracy may be fine for America," I was told again and again. "But Germany needs a different kind. Germany needs leadership with a strong hand."

A prominent trade-union leader, anti-Communist and anti-Nazi Georg Reuter, explained, "Before Hitler came to power, you Americans mistook the Weimar Republic for a real democracy. It was only a potential one. Now after the war you are repeating the same mistake; you have helped re-establish Bonn in the image of Weimar." With a rueful shrug, he added, "Sometimes it seems as though you want to prove that history does repeat itself . . ."

Though the clock does appear to have been turned back in the Western zone, as this educator said, there is a wide difference between the present-day situation there and the state of affairs in the Russian-occupied zone. The comparison with 1928 stops abruptly at the Iron Curtain on the Elbe. As far as Eastern Germany is concerned, the 1928 period is long since past, and the tragedy that began with the rise of dictatorship in 1933 is already in its first act.

There, totalitarians no longer have to campaign; they are holding the reins of power after superficially changing their color from brown to red. The uniform, the heavy boot, the machine gun have become the state. Eastern democrats and anti-totalitarians are again locked in concentration camps.

One hope for Western Germany is that the East zone's flash back to 1933 may serve as a tragic warning to democratic elements in the West. But still, the goose step clatters ominously over the Allied-occupied zones.

In their struggle to overthrow the democratic government and establish some kind of totalitarian regime, extremists of the right in Western Germany are quite prepared to join forces with the Communists on the opposite end of the political spectrum.

The speaker for the Free Democratic Party —listed as a "conservative" group and a moderate right-wing party—recently labeled the Marshall Plan "American economic colonization." Then he went on to relate a fantastic tale about 10,000 tons of rotten rags which the European Cooperation Administration had literally forced Germany to accept and pay out its marks for.

While this "conservative" speaker gave no source for his information, he could easily have found it in any Communist-controlled newspaper in Germany.

A few days later in Marburg, students marched through the town, pushing aside the authorized police officers with truculent comments and sneers. "We've all been storm troopers," they shouted. "We don't need you to keep law and order." That night the Nazi Horst Wessel song echoed from secret meetings.

In the Ruhr area to watch pre-election activities last fall, I saw motorcycle shock troops and heard Nazi-type threats and promises which recalled the old days of violence and intolerance. In Bavaria a man was stabbed to death at a political meeting; in the British zone a campaign worker was murdered when he tried to put up some election posters . . .

The parallel between '28 and '50 seems almost incredible. Twenty years ago, the nationalists had ranted against "foreign chains," against reparations payments, against the alleged exploitation of victory to soften competition in German markets. Today, dollar aid from America has been either overlooked or branded as "capitalist imperialism" by Communists, as "Yankee enslavement" by Nazis.

(From the article, "Germany . . . Flash Back to Disaster?" by Fred M. Hechinger, in This Week magazine)

". . . Instead of concentrating on trying to find solutions to the immense and thus far largely untouched domestic problems of the country, West Germany's politicians are taking advantage of the rump state's strategic position. They are playing off the Western Allies against the Russians in the time-honored manner of Talleyrand, whose similar tactics restored France to its position as a world power after the Napoleonic adventure . . ."

(From an editorial in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch)

According to a report in German newspapers, Martin Niemoeller in a recent speech before the Protestant Church community in Tuebingen, Germany, reiterated that "the German people will never fight either against the West nor against the East." And he added: "If Bolshevism should be established in Germany the German people will have to take it exactly as it took national socialism in 1933."

We Applaud . . .

. . . JOHN J. McCLOY, High Commissioner for Germany, for the excellent speech in which he called a spade a spade and used the only language the Germans can understand.

. . . JUDGE MICHAEL A. MUSMANNO, one of the principal jurists at the Nuremberg trials of Ohlendorf and other S.S. leaders charged with the murder of 1,000,000 Jews, for upholding the death sentence passed on the 16 war criminals as "eminently just and proper."

. . . REPRESENTATIVE DOLLINGER, who demanded an explanation from the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, John J. McCloy, of why the execution of Nazi war criminals sentenced to death many months ago is still being postponed, adding: "Further delay is unconscionable and a violation of the trust imposed in you."

. . . DR. JAMES R. NEWMAN, American Commissioner for the State of Hesse, for his statement warning the Germans that if they refused to cooperate with the U. S. program for political reorientation, they could be excluded from the Marshall Plan.

. . . MR. MAX H. DIAMOND, of Chicago, Ill., who wrote a letter-to-the-editor of Time magazine commenting as follows on the magazine's recent cover story on German Chancellor Adenauer: "Your Adenauers, Erhards and Schumachers, your 'good' people, they are the dangerous ones; the ones who are fronting for Thor and getting another chance for the ever-resurgent militarists of Germany. Between wars the good Germans are pushed forward, and they spout about culture, music, art, science and civilization . . . They will be liquidated when they have served the purpose of the nascent militarists . . ."

. . . REPORTER OLIVER PILAT of the New York Post for his excellent expose series, "Under Cover in Yorkville," spotlighting the Nazi rabblerousers of the lunatic fringe.

. . . JOHN HOHENBERG, the UN correspondent of the New York Post, for his recent series of excellent articles on the Nazi war criminals and mass murderers, Pohl, Ohlendorf and Co., whose executions are still being delayed.

. . . REPRESENTATIVE ADOLPH J. SABATH, Chairman of the House Rules Committee, for introducing a resolution calling for an investigation by the Foreign Affairs Committee of occupation administration in Germany.

. . . THOSE UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES in Germany who barred Hitler's one-time mountain retreat of Berchtesgaden as a German shrine and permit only Western tourists and G. I.s to visit the Fuehrer's famous eagle's nest.

. . . DAVID M. NICHOL, of the Chicago Daily News, for his excellent story exposing top German officials in the Reich's civil service as a threat to real democracy by sabotaging the laws.

. . . FRED M. HECHINGER, for his fine article, "Germany . . . Flashback to Disaster?" in This Week magazine.

. . . GABRIEL HEATTER, of the Mutual Network, who unlike some other radio commentators, speaks out bluntly on the rise of neo-Nazism in Germany.

A Purely "Internal" Affair

The Stuttgart denazification bribery scandal plainly shows what the Germans are up to. It has been established that Minister President Reinhold Maier in Stuttgart has issued more than 19,000 pardons during the last year, and police investigations have shown that most of these certificates were sold to the highest bidders. According to Drew Middleton in the New York Times, the Chief of Police in Stuttgart has documentary evidence that would involve a number of the highest ranking members of the State Government.

The Stuttgart scandal centers on the ability of certain highly placed former Nazis to buy themselves out of denazification court. Involved in this scandal is the right hand man and adviser of Minister President Maier, a certain Stroele. According to the French newspaper, Parisien Liberé, Stroele is the brother-in-law of Fritz Thyssen. Others involved are one August Mayer and one Heinz May. Mayer was a Chief of the Hitler Youth during the Nazi regime, but at the end of the war, for non-political reasons, he was jailed by the Nazis. When the Americans occupied Germany, August Mayer presented himself to the American authorities as a victim of Nazi persecution.

His colleague, Heinz May, was a prisoner of war in the United States. On his return to Germany he wrote a book entitled: "The Democratic Constitution." The book was a great success, and consequently May was named one of the Chiefs of the denazification board of Ludwigsburg.

Early in 1949 May and Mayer met. Mayer at that time had some sort of agency for publicity, translations, road shows, etc. But this was nothing but a coverup for his real purpose, namely, denazification briberies. So Mayer and May started to work hand-in-glove and in one year 1,035 highly compromised Nazis were denazified and freed through their help.

These 1,035 operations worked out smoothly but the 1,036th proved to be fatal. No. 1,036 involved a certain Stockinger who not only refused to pay, but denounced the two racketeers to Mr. Stroele, Director of the Ministry for refugees in Baden-Wuerttemberg, whereupon the scandal really started. Mr. Stroele answered to Stockinger that his denunciation didn't interest him at all. Whereupon Mr. Stockinger complained to the American occupation authorities. An inquiry was ordered and as a result, May and Mayer were arrested on January 3.

Now the story broke into the papers, and Mr. Stroele was forced to answer questions at a press conference. In order to excuse his negligence he declared that he knew Mayer since 1945; that the denunciatory letters were illegible (!) and that Mayer had sent Mrs. Stroele a bouquet of flowers.

This is what the German newspaper Stuttgarter Nachrichten had to say about Stroele:

"During the Nazi-Reich Stroele worked closely with the Nazi Minister, Mergenthaler, insuring the liaison between the latter and the Gauleiter of Stuttgart. He was prosecutor against anti-fascist functionaries. How such a man could be put at the head of a denazification court remains a mystery."

It is now revealed that it was thanks to the personal intervention of Stroele, that Dr. Schacht was acquitted by the denazification board of Ludwigsburg.

Reporting from Stuttgart, Don Cook wrote to the

To Check German Intrigues . . .

On the occasion of the recent visit to the United States of John J. McCloy, High Commissioner for Germany, the Society for the Prevention of World War III sent the following wires to President Truman and to Mr. McCloy:

President Harry S. Truman
The White House
Washington, D. C.

The efforts of the Germans to undermine Allied agreements on the status of the Saar is a continuation of their policy of blackmail. Through such tactics, the Germans have extracted concession after concession at the expense of American security and our moral leadership.

When the Germans agitated for the scrapping of the reparations program, we notified the Secretary of State that submission to German demands would only "whet the never satiated German appetite. "The Germans will continue to demand still greater concessions and thus further undermine the security of the United States and her friends in Europe." It is high time that American policy be made by the State Department and not by the Germans.

We respectfully urge that you reject the German attempt to split the Allies on the Saar issue. The American people expect High Commissioner John J. McCloy to carry out American policy and not be the mouthpiece for Chancellor Adenauer's policies.

Respectfully,
Mark Van Doren, Chairman
C. Monteith Gilpin, Secretary

John J. McCloy
U. S. High Commissioner for Germany
c/o State Department
Washington, D. C.

We respectfully draw your attention to special New York Times dispatches January 14 and 15 revealing Chancellor Adenauer requested group of German generals to draw up schedule and plan for German rearmament. These German military officers are organized in a so-called Brotherhood having chapters in key German cities. It is responsibility of Allied Military Security Board to investigate Times reports concerning Adenauer's activities for German rearmament and character and purposes of Brotherhood organization. If Times reports are correct Adenauer should be brought up on charges of wilfully violating basic policies of Occupation Statute and Military Security Board. The Brotherhood if found guilty of planning military resurgence and "the revival of military or para military organizations and of the militaristic spirit" should be disbanded and its responsible leaders brought to trial. Failure to take prompt investigatory action would contradict letter and spirit of American and Allied policy prohibiting revival of militaristic activities. Failure to act would nullify mission of Allied Military Security Board and would prepare resurgence of German General Staff. It would increase fears and suspicions among our most reliable allies and friends in Western Europe. Overwhelming majority American people oppose revival German militarism and expect their representatives in Germany will use their full powers to check German intrigues.

Respectfully,
Mark Van Doren, Chairman
C. Monteith Gilpin, Secretary

Herald Tribune:

"Political pressure of the strongest kind is being brought against the chief of the criminal investigation division of the Land police, Otto Oster, who has been pressing ahead with the probe of the scandal. To remove Mr. Oster would be too much, for the ramifications are by now far too wide. But the police chief is fast reaching the limit of his powers to see the affair through.

"An official of the Land Commission who has sided with the Americans received a threatening telephone call, and his home has been under guard ever since.

"The police investigators, it was learned, have uncovered direct evidence, so far suppressed by the news blackout, which links the Minister-President Reinhold Maier himself to the scandal through a series of extra-legal actions. The Minister-President admits publicly to having pardoned or reduced sentences of 19,000 Nazi offenders, most of them in the last five months. In reviewing these cases, the police have found that he granted many judicial favors beyond the scope of his authority."

It is to be hoped that this denazification bribery scandal will be thoroughly investigated by the American High Commission in Germany. It is high time that the circumstances involving the whitewashing of highly compromised Nazis be brought into the open.

It has been said often that it was a very good idea to turn over Denazification to the Germans themselves.

WHO IS FOOLING WHOM?

"The West German government's answer to the Allied demands for decartelization measures may be a law that foresees the continued existence of cartels but with a government division to license them."

(From a dispatch by Jack Raymond in the New York Times)

"The leading Frankfurt newspaper (Frankfurter Rundschau) is denouncing West German Chancellor Adenauer for giving a high post to a former prominent Nazi. He is Dr. Hans Globke, who published Nazi racial literature for Hitler."

(Robert S. Allen)

ABSENT-MINDED GENERAL

"German Field Marshall von Manstein told a British war court trying him for war crimes that he was not aware of Hitler's policy to exterminate the Jews."

Nothing to Worry About??

"This is a critical period for Germany and one which finds the Germans, in general, receptive. It is a period in which we should redouble our efforts to guide German public attitudes in the direction of the free Western world." (John J. McCloy, U. S. High Commissioner, to Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, in his First Quarterly Report on Germany.)

The American people will now be able to breathe a sigh of relief as they read the resolute words of the U. S. High Commissioner. Henceforth they need not fret about such insignificant occurrences as they read in the press daily:

The Chancellor of the West German Republic leading a German rally to the tune of Deutschland Ueber Alles;

The growing defiance of Allied policy and personnel by Germans of all stripes and colors;

The ever-increasing influence of neo-Nazi politicians and their political parties;

The training of ex-Nazi diplomats to take over where they left off under Hitler;

The re-establishment of the German Civil Service as it was under Hitler and staffed with pro-Nazi bigwigs;

The return to power of the industrial war lords of the Ruhr who provided the guns and tanks for the Hitler war machine;

The rising clamor of the Germans for the freedom of the top Nazi war criminals;

The hounding and persecution of genuine anti-Nazis for participating in the Allied denazification program;

The resurgence of the German cartel network which aims at strangling the economies of her neighbors;

The re-emergence of the I. G. Farben octopus, spearhead of past German aggressions;

The spending of American funds on unnecessary luxuries, while making no effort to cope with the unemployent problem—as revealed by the ECA;

The deliberate falsification of statistical data by the Germans in order to mislead the Allies as to the true state of Germany's economic revival;

The conspiracy of German industrialists to grab hold of the markets in Communist China, and the secret deals they are making with the Iron Curtain countries;

The undermining of all agricultural reforms by the Germans, despite the hundreds of thousands of farmers who are landless, though close to 2 million acres are available;

The sabotage of the reparations program which has now resulted in the retaining of most of the Hermann Goering Steel Works—a basic component of the Nazi war potential;

The smuggling into Germany during the year 1949 of $1 billion worth of goods, chiefly coffee, cigarettes, choclate and nylon;

The deliberate attempt by German politicians to aggravate the financial crisis by providing tax windfalls for the industrial war lords,—another device to squeeze more money out of American taxpayers;

The German threats and insults against the West over the Saar Treaty;

The boasts by members of the German General Staff that they are in constant contact with some four thousand generals and high officers who held key positions in Hitler's Reich. . . .

This is but a partial list. There is much more to be told, but should we bother when the American people are now assured by the U. S. High Commissioner that the situation is well in hand, that "we" are "guiding German attitudes" and that the Germans "are receptive?"

Why should the American people pay any attention to eight prominent Senators, Republicans and Democrats alike; Gillette, Hendrickson, Ives, Lehman, Kilgore, Douglas, Chavez, Pepper, who have expressed alarm over developments in Germany? Why should the people become excited when they are assured that the Germans are meek lambs who are being "guided" and are "receptive" to the standards of free communities?

These Senators have asked President Truman to appoint a Commission to investigate all matters pertaining to Germany. Do they really believe that there is something intrinsically wrong with our German policy? Or have they been taken in by the hysteria of fanatical diehards who believe what they read in the newspapers?

In this connection The N. Y. Times recently carried a story bearing the headline: "U. S. Expert Defends Employment of Former Nazis in German Jobs." This anonymous high official in the Office of the High Commissioner told the press that it was a "misinterpretation" of the facts to assert that the denazification program had failed because many former Nazis had been returned to their jobs or had obtained new positions.

Should we listen to such experts because they possess a certain kind of logic which is above the heads of the common man? The common man just can't understand that putting the Nazis back into power is "really" a subtle way of denazifying Germany. As reported by the Times this high official said, when we put them back into office, they are less "vulnerable to neo-Nazi schemers."

General Guderian Talks Back

Elsewhere in this issue we deal in detail with the rearmament and remilitarization of the Soviet zone in Germany under the guise of the so-called People's Police. We are strongly opposed to this development. We are equally opposed to certain dangerous trends in Western Germany regarding the rebuilding of a new German Wehrmacht.

Karl H. von Wiegand, who calls himself the "Dean of American Foreign Correspondents" and is well known as one of the oldest Germanophiles in this country, a man who had once enthusiastically written about Hitler, Goebbels, Goering and other Nazi big-wigs, is back at his old game. The other day he visited German General Heinz Guderian, who lives in a Benedictine Monastery in Bavaria. The German general granted von Wiegand an exclusive interview which the Hearst papers prominently splashed across their pages. The New York Journal American of April 16, 1950, ran Wiegand's interview over a whole eight-column page.

Guderian, given the opportunity by the "Dean of American Foreign Correspondents" to talk freely about his opinions and his feelings, didn't overlook the opportunity to fire the first gun of the coming propaganda battle for a Western German army. He did it in true German fashion, self-conscious and arrogant with not the slightest bit of humility as would have befitted a Commander whose armies, after all, were beaten.

In order to underline the importance of Guderian's statements, von Wiegand emphasized that Guderian "can be regarded today as the spokesman for the former German Wehrmacht or army, the Luftwaffe and the Navy." And Wiegand added that Guderian "enjoys the confidence of former members of those branches of Germany's wartime machine as perhaps no other former general does."

Seen against this background, Guderian's statements appear to us even more significant and more important. For example, the German general spoke in a rather derogatory manner of the military strength of Western Europe and added that "the best guarantees of peace, perhaps the only one—if we can use the word 'guarantee'—would have been the timely setting up of a highly efficient, modernly-armed German army in West Germany. . . ."

This is the basic theme of the interview and of General Guderian's thinking. Without such a German army, he sees no chance whatsoever to resist eventual Russian aggression.

Clever strategist that he is, Guderian mentions en passant that it might today be too late to form such a German army and that it should have been done long ago. Then he adds that perhaps it might still be possible. But do not think that the Germans are ready to form an army so easily—first certain conditions must be fulfilled by the Western Allies.

What are these conditions? General Guderian is quite frank about them. Wiegand asked him if he would be willing to command a German army against Russian attack. This is what Guderian answered:

"I would not offer my services, nor would I personally know of any German general, officer or soldier who would serve unless three preconditions were granted by the Western powers. These conditions are:

"1. That Germany be integrated in the West with complete equality in every respect with other nations.

"2. That a German army be commanded by German generals and officers, and that any such German force would have in the inter-allied High Command and combined general staff a German general of equal rank with the others.

"3. That the German generals, admirals, and other officers and statesmen or diplomats in Spandau, Landsberg and other prisons be released."

Here you have it, says General Guderian: Take it or leave it. Without these preconditions the Western Allies should not even think of being helped by a German army. If the West does not take the German on a basis of complete equality and doesn't fulfill the conditions which General Guderian outlined, then—and here you must realize the full impact of his statements—Germany will "turn to the East and even endeavor to find a basis of cooperation with Soviet Russia."

Thus spoke Hitler's former Commander-in-Chief who, as the New York Post stated the other day, "is not only alive but kicking." It is the old story all over again. Give the German an inch and he'll take a mile. Guderian, incidentally, is not the only German general who speaks this way. The Swiss newspaper, Der Bund, of Bern, Switzerland, reported recently that at a meeting of German war veterans in Braunschweig the former General Kurt Ebeling shouted that "only the German soldier has the psychological strength and courage to stop a Soviet attack." General Ebeling doubts that the Western Allied troops have the necessary fighting capacity to hold off a Russian onslaught.

In the opinion of this German general, in order to stop such an attack, the soldier "has to have physical strength and courage which only the German infantryman has."

It seems to us that these German generals do not even try to hide the fact that they are blackmailing the Western Allies. Their ideas are quite clear. If you want us, you must accept our conditions. And don't forget that only we can do the job. Without us you are hopelessly lost. But if you don't accept our conditions, we will turn to the other side.

NOTE: It appears that General Guderian has made an impression at the Pentagon, according to U. S. News and World Report, which stated on Feb. 10, 1950, that "the blueprint for a U. S. General Staff has been prepared, at the request of the U. S. Army, by General Guderian, former Chief of Staff in the German High Command."

This is our method of fooling the Nazis. If this doesn't make sense to the common man, let him at least retain his faith in the wisdom of the American High Commissioner. Is it not high time that the American people ignored the ravings of alarmists who cannot perceive the enormous good that is coming out of Germany day after day?

Don't we realize that they will be faithful friends of the democracies whom they despise as a matter of fact, and as long as our taxpayers' billions will flow to them, they surely will not make open alliance with their Eastern neighbors?

Therefore, all we must do is to show some tolerance and understanding to a misled but essentially dynamic and democratic people. . .

Editorials

MEMO TO MR. ACHESON . . .

Although the barrage of Soviet propaganda launched against the United States grows more intense each day, it seems to us that the State Department has been overlooking an excellent opportunity to counter these distortions with facts. These facts deal with the creation of a German army in the Soviet Zone under the very eyes of the Western Allied occupation authorities. Eye witnesses, intelligence reports, newspaper and diplomatic sources in this country and in Western Europe have, by now, provided detailed documentation covering the open reconstitution of German military forces in the Eastern zone. Nevertheless, the State Department, strangely enough, has not yet seen fit to lodge a strongly worded protest with Moscow against this open and flagrant violation of the Yalta and Potsdam agreements.

We have before us recent photos published in European newspapers showing various formations of the so-called People's Police of the Soviet zone goosestepping through the streets of German towns; we have pictures showing those so-called People's Police forces being trained along strictly military patterns and wearing smart new uniforms. Foreign correspondents who accidentally were able to observe the barracks of the People's Police describe them as open military camps where the cadres of a new German army are being trained. Although last year the activities of the People's Police were shrouded behind a cloak of secrecy, the Russians by this time have dropped all pretense and are no longer hiding these newly formed and splendidly equipped German troops.

The establishment of military cadres in the People's Police is a clear breach of the Potsdam agreement, which the Russians usually profess to follow to the letter. But this creation of a skeletal structure for a new German army is not the only flagrant breach by the Russians of an agreement which only a few years ago was trumpeted as the chief instrument for crushing German militarism. What we are referring to is the almost unbelievable amount of military indoctrination of youth in the Eastern Zone that is taking place under the banner of the "Free German Youth Movement." As in the days of the Nazi Reich, German boys and girls parade in uniform with flags and banners displayed, singing Communist marching songs which strongly remind the observer of similar songs they sang in the Hitler Youth.

At the door of Russian responsibility—or rather irresponsibility—must be laid the fact that the Soviets are deliberately creating a militant marching German Youth, with the obvious goal of laying the foundation for a movement that is thoroughly indoctrinated with the Kremlin party line and subject to instant obedience. This Communist "Free German Youth" is a dangerous weapon which the Soviet policy-makers in Germany intend to forge for their use. Perhaps nothing better indicates what is going on than a statement made by the Chief of the "Free German Youth," Guenther Knauthahn, at a meeting in Saxonia when he said: "We have to foster in the thinking of our youth a deep hatred of the Western powers and at the same time unlimited love for the Soviet Union."

It is little wonder, therefore, that the creation of the People's Police in the Eastern Zone has furnished a much desired pretext for the militarists in the Western Zones to step up their demands for the creation of a new Western German army. It may now be expected that soon politicians in the Western Zone will start demanding that Western German youth, too, be organized along militant lines and that they be given uniforms, marching songs, flags and all other military trappings so dear to the hearts of the Germans.

These events were foreseen long ago by a number of clear-sighted observers, and in these pages of Prevent World War III we have never ceased to draw attention to these increasingly dangerous developments. We believe, therefore, that it is the duty of the State Department to present to the American people all the facts available on the remilitarization of the Eastern Zone of Germany. We believe, too, that it is high time that Mr. Acheson himself openly denounced the creation of a Soviet-sponsored German army and protested to the Soviet government. We know very well from past examples that little or nothing will result from such a protest. However, the fact remains that we are not using an effective propaganda weapon by failing to denounce Soviet remilitarization of the Eastern Zone.

Regarding Soviet double dealing with the German problem, it would be of interest to learn how the German Communist press, sponsored and controlled by the Soviets, is presenting the German people with the facts of recent history. The issue of the Communist political periodical, Die Weltbuehne, for January 15, 1950 (published in Berlin in the Soviet Zone), features a leading article by the well-known Cominform agent, Andre Simone, entitled: "The Way Out of the Labyrinth." Let us quote from this article:

"When, at the Teheran Conference in November, 1943, the Americans proposed that Germany be dismembered in five parts, it was Stalin who successfully defended the democratic unity of Germany.

"A year later Churchill and Eden made the proposal in Moscow that Germany be split into three parts. This proposal, too, was defeated by Stalin. On the day of victory, May 9, 1945, Stalin, in his Order of the Day, expressly emphasized that the Soviet Union does not seek to 'dismember and to destroy Germany.'

"The Soviet Union has continuously fought to create conditions leading to a democratic and peace-loving Germany. The imperialistic Western powers have fought to turn Germany into a colony which would supply not only raw materials and a great war potential, but also 'human material' for an aggressive war against the Soviet Union, against the people's democracies, and the democratic movements in all of Europe. . . ."

But when Anthony Eden, then British Foreign Minister visited Stalin and Molotov early in the war, on December 16, 1941 in Moscow, the Soviet leader—according to the original document reproduced in Churchill's Grand Alliance—"set out in some detail what he considered should be the post-war territorial frontiers in Europe, and in particular his ideas regarding the treatment of Germany." Stalin then "proposed . . . the detachment of the Rhineland from Prussia, as an independent State or a protectorate, and possibly the constitution on an independent State of Bavaria. . . ."

That was way back in 1941 when Hitler's armies were advancing in Russia, but today Soviet propaganda distorts and falsifies facts and events to fit their present line. . . .

The Soviet propaganda mill grinds on and on and recent history is rewritten and falsified in order to implant in the German people the idea that the Western Allies are guilty of brutality toward the Germans while the Soviet Union has always fought for their interests.

The other day, when U. S. District Judge John A. Cabo, of Gary, Indiana, passed sentence on members of the East German People's Police who had inadvertently entered the American Zone while armed and in uniform, he stated that "the innocent sounding but misleading name of People's Police was applied to an organization which has carbines, light and heavy machine guns and grenades—weapons used during the last war by the German Wehrmacht."

And Judge Sabo added the People's Police is "a revival of the blatant type of militaristic fanaticism so rampant in the Hitler era, with hatred as its credo." This militarism, he added, "is daily through lessons and lectures whipped, lashed and fanned into flame by a calculated and grossly misleading propaganda line." And he concluded that the Court "sees in the accused —as members of a large and well-trained military organization—a very live threat and menace to the peace and security of the world." This statement by an American judge, perhaps more than any other report, focuses attention on this explosive issue.

It would be unwise to overlook the opportunity the situation offers and we strongly urge the State Department to take the steps necessary to make public the truth concerning the new Soviet-sponsored goose-stepping German army, which is being created and trained and expanded to increasing strength at this very moment in Eastern Germany.

NOTE: As we go to press, we are glad to learn that the U. S., France and Britain have just made a vigorous protest to the Kremlin concerning the setting up of a German Army in the Soviet zone of Germany.

AT GERMANY'S EXPENSE

Dr. Konrad Adenauer, Chancellor of the West German Republic, seems to be a very versatile politician. In one moment he will be hurling invective at Russian aggressions; at another time he will be scolding the Allies, or in another instance he will be found negotiating with former members of the German General Staff on ways and means of reconstituting German armed forces.

A man of many roles, his latest appears to be that of the peace-maker. In a policy speech before the Christian Democratic Party in Munich, he said:

"The tension between East and West has been constantly rising since the end of the war, and Germany lies in the middle. We do not want to see another war. We want to see an understanding between the Soviet Union and the Western Allies just as quickly as possible. But this understanding should not come at our expense."

It is not often in history that we find the Germans playing the role of peace-maker. We recall, however, that during World War I the Germans set down some ideas on peace. They were based on the assumption that the Germans would be victorious in the war. For example, in the Treaty of Bucharest which they actually imposed upon the Rumanians in May, 1918, we find the following provisions:

1. Cession of the Dobrudja, depriving Rumania of outlet to sea; regulation and control of Danube.
2. Removal to Germany of gold of National Bank.
3. All foreign firms in Rumania to be liquidated and their acquisition by German firms to be arranged.
4. Cession of all Rumanian districts producing petroleum, coal, gold and manganese.
5. All Rumanian demesnes to be leased for exploitation and development to a German company for a period of 90 years, Rumania to furnish all the labor required therefor.
6. Rumania to grant to Germany for 90 years the exclusive right to exploit and develop all land producing or possessing oil, natural gas, asphalt and bituminous products.
7. Rumania's indemnity placed at 9,000,000,000 lei (according to Baron von Kuehlemann), equivalent to $1,738,280,000, or about $250 for each man, woman and child in Rumania at the time.
8. Rumania agrees to maintain indefinitely six German divisions as an army of occupation, presumably to enforce the terms of the Treaty.

This was an example of how the Germans were going to construct the peace in Eastern Europe, but they didn't forget the West. Flushed with the victories of the German armies in 1915, the six largest German economic organizations, including the farmers and industrialists, drew up a memorandum on how to handle the West after the war was won. It was presented to the Reich's Chancellor, von Bethmann-Hollweg, on March 10 of that year. The following are excerpts from the memorandum:

"As far as France is concerned, the possession of the coastal district from approximately the Somme up to the Belgian frontier must be regarded as vital. . . . And of course Verdun and Belfort with the slope of the Vosges in between. . . . Apart from the already-mentioned district of Briey, the possession of the coal districts of the Departments of Nord and Pas-de-Calais. . . . Belgium must be placed under the laws of the German Reich. . . . A very considerable extension of Reich and Prussian territory in the east. . . . A colonial empire. . . ."

These demands drew the following comment from a noted historian: "The annexed districts were to be exploited as semi-colonial 'Reich land' under 'protectorate.'"

Shortly after this memorandum was presented to the German Government, another group of industrialists plus 352 German professors, 145 high officials, and 18 admirals and generals made certain financial demands that were to be added to the acquired territories from the West. They declared:

"We must ruthlessly impose a heavy war indemnity on France. . . . And should we be in a position to impose an indemnity on England, no sum would be too great."

This was the German brand of peace.

Fortunately for the world, the Germans were spared the role of peace-maker after World War I. But how many influential groups in Germany ever disavowed these war aims?

It is clear from Dr. Adenauer's carefully chosen words before the Christian Democratic Party that Germany is the heart of the cold war. He is fully aware of the fact that both East and West, in their own way, have been breaking their common agreements, thus laying the basis for a resurgent Germany. He knows that Germany is escaping the consequences of her military defeat as a result of the split between East and West. The kind of peace that Dr. Adenauer wants is one which would continue to give Germany every chance to reconstitute her power and at the same time bring about a "settlement" between Russia and the West.

But Dr. Adenauer is not that naive. He knows that only as long as East and West continue to remain at loggerheads with each other, breaking their original agreements on Germany, can the Germans regain their former position in Europe. That is why Adenauer's statement is not a call for peace, but in reality, a continuation of the cold war.

Now just what kind of an agreement between East and West would be at the expense of the Herrenvolk? It would be a settlement that would finally root out Nazism and create a climate where democracy would have some sort of a chance to grow in Germany.

It would be an agreement that would whittle down Germany's industrial war potential to genuine peacetime needs and encourage the industrial reconstruction and independence of her neighbors.

It would be an agreement that would smash the cartels, the trusts, the combines, and the syndicates.

It would be an agreement that would prevent the rearming of Germany by Russia or the West.

It would be an agreement that would make Germany compensate for some of the damages she has inflicted on her victims.

It would be an agreement that would take the Germans off the backs of the American taxpayers and oblige them to work out their own salvation.

These are some of the essentials of an agreement which Adenauer would call "at Germany's expense."

Such a settlement would be the greatest step forward toward the pacification of Europe. It would immeasurably strengthen American security and reduce some of the burdens of defense appropriations. But this is precisely the kind of program which is anathema to Dr. Adenauer. It is the last thing he wants to see done, for, in reality, whatever Germany has managed to extract from either side has been accomplished through the growing tensions of the cold war.

A peace "at Germany's expense" would eliminate that country from the competition between East and West. Indeed, it would enable the Germans at some future date, to take their place in the family of nations as a relative equal, not as the overlord.

When the world awakens to the fact that a lasting peace can only be obtained "at Germany's expense," that is, by shaping her economic power toward peaceful pursuits, and eradicating German militarism and pan-Germanism, will the spectre of a third world war be less menacing.

In a few years, Germany will grow into a problem that neither the East nor the West will be able to handle.

REFUGEES—PAWN OF GERMAN POLITICS

Ever since the end of the war, the Germans have displayed a singular talent as propagandists. To some extent, their present success can be traced back to the falling out among the victorious Allies. In addition, it should be borne in mind that the Goebbels school of propaganda has made a deep imprint on German methods in dealing with their neighbors.

It will be recalled that immediately following the cessation of hostilities, a great hue and cry went up about the "starving Germans." The noise was intended to drown out the pleas of those who were starving in the lands ravaged by the German war machine. The food-for-Germany campaign built on a tissue of distortion and half truths, cracked the common front of the Allied peoples and was the wedge through which the deliberate undermining of Allied power was initiated. Since then, the Germans have continued their tactic of grabbing on to an issue and exploiting it for all that it is worth. In 1945 it was food. In 1947 it was reparations. Today it appears to be the refugee problem.

The refugee problem is being played up by the Germans in every possible way. It is being used to assault every remaining safeguard against the resurgence of Pan-Germanism and Neo-Nazism. It is employed as a weapon to discredit and injure Allied prestige. It is manipulated as a lightning rod to shift the responsibility of the present unemployment situation in Germany on to the backs of the Allied powers; and last but certainly not least, the refugee problem is utilized to bolster Germany's case for the rebuilding of her industrial might far above pre-war levels. It is, therefore, a very potent and dangerous weapon which can easily fool the gullible and pervert whatever needs to be done to resolve the problem of the refugees in Western Germany.

Recently the London Economist published a penetrating article on the German refugee problem and its relation to unemployment in Germany. In speaking about the number of refugees in Western Germany, the Economist revealed that:

> "Varied and exaggerated figures regarding the number of expelled Germans are bandied about in public speeches. In the rather more objective columns of the official statistical returns, the total is given as 7 million 750 thousand. Guesswork places the number who have come from Soviet Germany as one million. The total population is said to have risen from 39.3 million in 1936 to 47.7 million today. There has, however, been no census since 1946."

Thus, the Germans are not only confusing the picture by exaggerations and guesswork designed for political purposes, but there has been no official counting of the population in Western Germany for the last four years. Therefore, how can we talk intelligently about a problem which has been turned into a political football by the Germans?

From the evidence presented by the London Economist it appears that the Germans are not very anxious to get at the elemental facts.

On the contrary, they are building up the problem of the refugees as though it were the cause for every ill afflicting the Germans today. They have declared that the refugees are creating unemployment, and have

THE CRY OF THE WILD GOOSESTEP

(Cartoon by Reidford—Courtesy Montreal Daily Star)

"Baron von Stauffenberg, . . . president of the Right-wing German Union Coalition, warned . . . that thousands of young Nazis had gone underground. . . .

"He said there are more than 80,000 former members of the Hitler Youth and officer corps—young reactionaries and still ardent Nazis—who live under assumed names.

" 'They will continue to keep these false names until the hue and cry has died down,' he declared. 'Then they will come out into the open, ready and eager to rebuild the Nazi tradition'. . ."

blamed the Allied powers. But as the London Economist declares, the unemployment situation is being used by the Germans "as a political lever against the Western powers. For these reasons, German statistical assertions are likely to be unreliable."

Undoubtedly there is a refugee problem in Western Germany. It is also true that unemployment has been increased by the influx of these Germans from the East. But are the German bigwigs really and truly anxious to tackle it? Let the facts speak for themselves.

It is well-known that hundreds of thousands of these refugees are efficient farmers but they are landless because the German officials have sabotaged all land reforms with the tacit approval and in some cases active collaboration of the Allied authorities.

In the United States Zone alone, 1,235,000 acres are owned by seven hundred individuals and organizations. This huge territory was supposed to be broken up under the land reform law passed more than three years ago. But as of April, 1949, only 71,000 acres were redistributed.

But that is not all. In the spring of this year the Allies abandoned all direct intervention in land reform and turned the entire program over to the Germans. The land reform law was originally intended to make room for German refugees, rationalize agricultural production and diminish the economic and political power of the landed nobility in the West. It was estimated that 2,000,000 German refugees could be resettled and taken care of economically on the available lands. Now the program is turned over to the very same people who have in the first place blocked its implementation since 1946.

The importance of land to these German refugees is not exaggerated. Indeed, when it was announced that the Allies had given up this program, many of these refugees announced that they would take matters in their own hands. One group wired John J. McCloy that they were considering the seizure of farm land without authority and added "don't force us to follow the example of the Italian agricultural workers."

If the German officials were so anxious to help these refugees, they would see to it that German agriculture was democratized. The London Economist however, reveals that the Germans are not very anxious to help their brothers from the East. They weep for them in public but privately they have utter contempt for them.

This is also indirectly implied by Mr. Guy J. Swope, Chief of the Displaced Population Division in the Office of the American High Commissioner. Writing in the March, 1950 issue of Information Bulletin, published by the High Commissioner's office, Mr. Swope noted that:

"If the German leadership resolutely took the position that the refugees, who are, it must be remembered, of German blood, and therefore should be easily assimilable on that score, can be converted into a strong asset through establishing conditions under which they can add to the German production, it would be an indication of sound and sensible planning."

The Bonn politicians have other ideas. They regard these refugees as pawns in their long range policies which have nothing in common with security or a peacetime German economy. But why do Allied officials continue to play along?

Speaking about the unemployment situation in Germany which is supposed to be aggravated by the refugees, the London Economist declares that the Bonn Government "does not object to having a pool of unemployment at present. . . ." Why? Because this pool keeps wages low and therefore enables German exporters to undercut competition on the world market. German industrialists are not enthusiastic about creating new jobs because, according to the London Economist, home industries "reduce the volume of credit available for financing the present boom in imports and trade in consumer goods."

On the other hand, the Bonn Government argues that to employ these refugees and hundreds of thousands of other unemployed would endanger the currency. Why? Because as the London Economist says, "If the unemployed were given jobs . . . they would spend more."

A pool of unemployment increased by the refusal to solve the German refugee problem is viewed by the Germans as a very effective economic weapon against their competitors. Furthermore, these refugees are regarded by the Bonn Government as reliable reserves for future eventualities. The character of many of these German refugees is described by the London Economist as follows: "The worst factors are rather that the refugees became penniless and that many of them are officials of the Nazi state or Party and dispossessed farmers for whom no jobs can be found. These are the men who represent a dangerous hotbed of nationalist ideas."

The refugee problem and unemployment in Germany cannot be attributed to the disinterestedness of the Allies who have poured billions into Germany since the end of the war. It is true that we have failed to take firm action and have allowed the Germans to block every decent program to alleviate the distress.

But the facts also show that the Germans have no intention of solving this problem. Just as they engineered inflation after World War II to avoid reparations payments, so they are now employing the refugee and unemployment situation as an economic and political instrument to extort more and more concessions from the American taxpayer.

Marion Donhoff, political editor of the German newspaper, Die Zeit, writing in Foreign Affairs, April, 1950, gives a frank estimate of the extortion which may be expected. Miss Donhoff calculated that if these unemployed, including the German refugees, were put to work, "about 2,000 dollars must be invested in order to employ one worker productively."

Multiply $2,000 by her own estimate of 9,000,000 refugees and it becomes clear that the Germans are waiting for a couple of more billion dollars to add to the jackpot they have already extracted from the U. S. Treasury. This is how the refugee and unemployment problem is shaping up in Germany today.

The American taxpayers would be more than justified in insisting that no more funds be handed over to the Germans until there is a proper Allied accounting of what the Germans have done to date on their own. The aid we have given Germany is unprecedented in the annals of history. We have handed over billions to a former enemy who ravaged a substantial part of the continent of Europe and who would have destroyed us too if they could.

We have given those billions as though the taxpayers were obliged to do so without auditing Germany's reserves to find what they themselves could achieve without handouts from abroad.

No other country in the world has received such a blank check from the United States. How long will the American taxpayers be willing to put up with this scandal?

CHURCHILL'S ILLUSIONS

When Britain was alone and the terrible blow of Dunkirk had brought that nation to the brink of defeat, it was Winston Churchill who assured the world that his countrymen would never surrender or be conquered.

He told the British that all their sufferings at the hands of the Nazis would be paid back and that the day would come when the Nazi beast would be defeated in his own lair. He predicted that the Allied cause would ultimately triumph and Britain would share in the leadership in establishing a world of peace.

His inspiring leadership in those fateful days of the blitz contributed in no small way to the fight which the British put up against the would-be invaders. Britain was ruined by the German Luftwaffe; her homes, churches and factories scarred; her merchant marine crippled and her food supply at subsistence level. But Winston Churchill's promise of a better day drove the British to heroic feats. For this he deserves the acclaim and tribute of all the Allied nations.

But what shall the British say when their famous wartime leader who urged them on through "blood, sweat and tears," tells them in effect—you have been fooled. Your sacrifices were needless.

Most Americans did not experience the physical ravages of the war. Our homes and towns were spared. Perhaps this is one reason why it is easy at present for certain individuals in this country to publicly defile the Allied cause. But we wonder how the British people feel when they read the reports of the debates in the House of Commons where Mr. Churchill proclaims that his people should clasp the bloodstained hand of the former enemy. How must they feel when they read Mr. Churchill's words "I see no reason why the Germans should not aid in the defense of their own country and of Western Europe or why British, American, French and German soldiers should not stand in the line together on honorable terms of comradeship as part of a combined system of defense." Or, "The Strong German race which during the last 40 years we, and our Allies, twice fought and defeated, have now the opportunity to render an immense service to mankind." Or, that the Germans "now have a chance to redeem the German name . . . in lifting the civilization of Europe to a level where its old glories may revive."

This is not the Churchill of Dunkirk. It is someone else who speaks. Someone who has forgotten his own remark that "The Hun is either at your neck or at your feet." Or his statement: "There are only 65,000,000 malignant Huns, most of whom are already engaged in holding down Austrians, Czechs, Poles and many other ancient races they now bully and pillage." (Page 160 "The Grand Alliance.")

Churchill's plea that Western civilization must be protected by the Germans, must be hard to swallow by the survivors of the millions who perished under the German onslaught.

Churchill, himself, must have sensed that his words would create profound indignation among the British, for he tried to quibble over what he originally said and what he allegedly did not say. But Mr. Churchill failed to cover up his basic thought which runs contrary to everything he represented before and during the war.

The true feelings of the British are perhaps reflected in the reply made by Mr. R. H. Crossman, M.P., to Mr. Churchill during the Commons debate. "Strategic- ally and militarily we depend upon the Anglo-French alliance—that is what upset me about the speech of the Rt. Hon. Member for Woodford—if we are militarily integrated to Europe, we are militarily integrated to France, and if we are militarily integrated to France, then we are integrated to a Communist State if we rearm Germany. I say it quite bluntly. The French people, in the event of the rearming of the Germans, would rather be on the Russian side. They do not look at Europe in terms of ideology, they look at it in terms of national survival. They have had the Germans in twice and now, four years after the end of the war, the Leader of the Opposition, a week after the French President has been over here, talks in this House of Germany being allowed to play her share in Western European defense. Was Goebbels right after all? Did we fight the wrong war last time?"

Though Mr. Churchill is usually most eloquent, he could find no words that could answer Mr. Crossman's wise, penetrating remarks. Mr. Crossman was not only speaking for himself, but undoubtedly spoke for the millions throughout Britain who fought and suffered to keep that ancient bulwark of freedom alive.

Mr. Churchill is supposed to have a reputation of being a realist. But, judging from his remarks in the House of Commons, his realism stops at the Rhine. Indeed, one must conclude that in spite of all his past statements on the Germans, Churchill is no longer sure about his own convictions.

Even Ernest Bevin, the British Foreign Minister, who has contributed to the disastrous policies which are giving new aid and encouragement to the aggressive forces in Germany, admitted that he was most disturbed over Mr. Churchill's remarks.

When Mr. Bevin pointed out that "The Hitler revolution did not change the German character very much. It expressed it." Mr. Churchill immediately countered with a loud "No." But Mr. Bevin could speak of five years of experience and contact with the Germans.

This is not to say that Mr. Bevin has not harbored illusions. He believed that there was a substantial element in Germany who could be relied upon and trusted. But in replying to Mr. Churchill it becomes evident that Mr. Bevin's ideas and hopes are facing disappointment. Here is his confession: "I have to tell my Socialist colleagues in Germany very often that they are a little bit too nationalist for me and that their nationalism breaks through their ideas of social democracy rather too frequently to make me feel comfortable in arriving at decisions in dealing with them. All that means caution."

It seems to us that there is much more significance in Mr. Bevin's admission than the fact that he, as a British Laborite, is ever becoming wary of the real intentions of the German Social Democrats.

Placed alongside of Mr. Churchill's plea for rearming the Germans in comradeship with the Allied nations of the West, it tells in simple terms that the British would be courting disaster if they followed Mr. Churchill's lead and embraced a nation whose trustworthiness is lacking.

ON EDUCATING THE GERMANS

The Office of the United States High Commissioner in Germany recently announced that 2,100 Germans would visit the United States during 1950 "to see democracy in action; after their return home they will be expected to bring the greatest possible benefit of their experience to their fellow Germans." Implicit in this announcement is the belief that democracy can best be brought home to the Germans by example. This view is shared by Mr. Benjamin Buttenwieser, the American Deputy High Commissioner for Germany. In an address before the Annual Spring Conference of German Teachers, Mr. Buttenwieser declared:

"Obviously we Americans cannot reorientate, we cannot recast the attitudes and the thinking of the German people. We can, I reiterate, achieve much by example, by advice and by assistance. Above all, we can help those Germans of liberal mind and public spirit—and there are such Germans—in their efforts to reach our common goal and to guide others of their countrymen along pathways leading to that goal."

These are noble words and they undoubtedly reflect the hope of many that eventually democracy will triumph in Germany. It is also probably true that the 2,100 who have been invited to see democracy work in this country are part of those elements whom Mr. Buttenwieser trusts will infuse Germany with the democratic spirit.

But will these German visitors return to a Germany where the soil has been carefully prepared for the sowing of democratic principles? Recent developments would seem to indicate that these 2,100 Germans are not going to have an easy time spreading the democratic gospel. For example, they will come face to face with the fact that the American High Commissioner has established a so-called Clemency Board to consider recommendations for the parole of German war criminals convicted by U. S. courts in Nuremberg. Among these criminals are Frederick Flick and Alfred Krupp, the munition kings who provided the murderous weapons for Hitler's wars of aggression. The Ohlendorf and Pohl criminals, 16 in all, who were originally sentenced to death for the murder of thousands of people, will also receive the opportunity to have their death sentences commuted by this board. By no stretch of the imagination could this be called democracy by example in Germany.

When these Germans return from their visit to the United States they will be confronted by the fact that the American High Commissioner has refused to investigate the denazification scandal in the State of Wuerttemberg-Baden which involved the Minister President Reinhold Maier. It is worthwhile noting that as a member of the Reichstag in 1933, Maier voted in favor of giving Hitler full powers. At the time that he cast his vote for Hitler, he said,

"It is our hope and desire that the German people under Nazi leadership may bring the struggle to win freedom and new strength to a successful conclusion. We feel ourselves at one with the views expressed by Hitler here today."

The 2,100 Germans will also learn that Chancellor Adenauer is busily reconstructing a German Foreign Service. Fourteen of the 31 senior members of this embryo foreign service belonged to the Nazi party. Dr. Wilhelm Haas, appointed by the Chancellor to set up a German Foreign Service, defended these Nazis declaring that his sole concern was how "efficient" they were and could be. Indeed, he went on to say that at least 90 former officials who had worked in von Ribbentrop's Foreign Office under Hitler were slated for important posts. Parenthetically, it should be stated that there is nothing in the Occupation Statute which permits the Germans to establish their own foreign office. Yet the plans proceed as though the Germans were confident that the Allies would grant another concession.

The German visitors will be returning to their Fatherland at a time when German politicians are hastily scrapping whatever remains of denazification, vying with each other in villifying the whole principle as contrary to German "rights." If they had sat in on a recent debate in the Bonn Parliament, they would have heard Herr August Martin Euler denounce the denazification laws as having been "imposed" upon the Germans and that these so-called abominable laws were incompatible with what he termed the "principles" of the German democratic state.

Dr. Richter, a fellow member of the Bonn Parliament, attacked denazification as contrary to the Hague rules of warfare (sic) and urged that everything should be done to give the Nazis another chance because Germany "could ill afford" to dispense with their services.

Another Parliamentarian, Dr. von Merkatz, castigated denazification as "a measure initiated purely by the victor powers and an insult to German justice." Dr. Etzel of the Bavarian Party, went further and called it a "tumor" on the German body politic.

Outside the halls of Parliament, Dr. Fritz Dorls, the leader of the German Socialist Reich Party, boasted "I was a Nazi Party member from 1928 to the very end —to the very end! . . . Roosevelt," he ranted, "is the real criminal of today responsible for the tragic disunity of Germany in Europe because he did not force the Russians into compliance at Teheran and Yalta but delivered East Europe to the Russians. The idea of a united Europe is acceptable even if it must be accomplished through war."

The 2,100 Germans will come across a rash of biographies and serialized stories in newspapers and magazines devoted to romantic and nostalgic memories of the "good old days." In the previous issue of Prevent World War III, Dr. Robert M. W. Kempner, former deputy chief prosecutor at Nuremberg, discussed this phenomenon. He pointed out for example, that one periodical in Bavaria, Revue, ran a serialized story entitled "The Great Lover, Adolf Hitler." Other publications, according to Dr. Kempner, glorify the heroic feats of Hitler's armed forces. Even Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's financial adviser on rearmament, has had a huge success with his books glorifying his own record on behalf of the Fatherland.

These German visitors will also learn after returning to Germany that two more leaders of the German SS, Oswald Schaeffer and Dr. Ludwig Lebkuechner, have been acquitted though they had murdered scores of concentration camp victims. And speaking about concentration camp victims, Inspector Valdenz, at a training school for the police at Hesse, told his pupils that the name V. V. N. (victims of Nazism) was wrong. It ought to be changed to N. V. V., according to the Inspector, "Nicht Vergaste Verbrecher," (criminals who were not gassed).

When they return to Germany, they will find out that the Bonn Government has clamped down a sort of blackout on its activities. The information which will be passed on to the German press will be screened so as to prevent undue embarrassment. The American, steeped in traditions of freedom, would never agree to a blackout, but the German press obediently, complied. And to make doubly sure that only selected information would be available to the public, the United States High Commissioner has ordered his staff to refrain from publicly criticizing the activities and policies of the West German Government without first clearing it with him. As the New York Times reports, Mr. McCloy took this action after Herr Adenauer complained about "unfavorable" publicity.

2,100 Germans imbued with democratic principles will return to all this.

In his famous speech of February 6th at Stuttgart, Mr. John J. McCloy declared:

"Here I wish to emphasize that one of the primary purposes of the occupation has been and is to eradicate Nazi influence and leadership from German political, economic, and cultural life."

We hail this objective and we support its implementation. We believe that the fulfillment of this objective would provide invaluable assistance to those Germans who Mr. Buttenwieser declared as the great hope of genuine democracy in Germany.

We sincerely support the efforts of those in the Educational Branch in the Office of the High Commissioner who are trying with all their might to root out the scourge of Nazi ideology and Pan-Germanism. They are up against more than one obstacle and it is clear from the examples mentioned above that all of the obstacles do not stem from the Germans alone. Moreover, they do not have much money to work with—only $12,650,000 for the year 1950. As Brig. Gen. Telford Taylor and several other experts on Germany mentioned, this amounts to less than $1.00 per capita for the American Zone. Since the end of the war, the worshippers of German "efficiency" have determined how and where the taxpayers' billions should be spent in Germany. Democracy is considered by the members of this cult as a luxury at best.

These are the roadblocks which confront those who are directly responsible for the reeducation of Germany. They were the same impediments which undermined the efforts of their predecessors who tried to make democracy work in Germany.

Whether the American educators who are now trying to clear the climate in Germany of backwardness, hatred and arrogance will succeed, depends in the long run on whether the American people will insist that democratic education take priority in our German policy.

Democracy by example is a perfectly sound method of lifting the Germans from the morass of reactionary and militaristic ideologies. But no matter how enthusiastic the 2,100 Germans become to impart to their fellow countrymen what they have learned from their visit to the United States, their efforts will be in vain if Allied officials fail to create a climate in Germany which is conducive to the democratic way of life.

What is behind the 'Bruderschaft' of German Officers?

"The goal of the 'Bruderschaft' is the union of the peoples of Europe between the Atlantic and the Ural with the Reich of all Germans in its ethnographic and historic borders as an organic part"

There has been much discussion in political circles recently of the so-called Bruderschaft, an organization of former German army officers under the leadership of ex-Lt. Kurt von Manteuffel, a former Commander of the Greater Germany Division. Newspaper dispatches reporting the founding and the activities of this strange new outfit were somewhat confused and vague.

We are now in a position to render the following report, based on information from well-informed and reliable European sources, regarding the background, organization, leadership, plans and intentions of the Bruderschaft. Our information is based on carefully detailed reports published by the National Zeitung of Basel, Switzerland (February 22); Tagblatt of St. Gallen, Switzerland (March 1); Wochenzeitung of Zurich, Switzerland (March 2); and Stuttgarter Nachrichten of Stuttgart, Germany (March 1).

THE INNER CIRCLE AND THE MEN BEHIND IT

Unlike a large number of other nationalistic or neo-Nazi secret organizations, until recently the Bruderschaft was able to conceal itself so cleverly that even today many of its members in Munich, Hamburg, Hannover and Duesseldorf are convinced that they belong to a highly patriotic and completely legal organization whose goal is only the restoration of the honor of the former German army against defamation.

Another task of the Bruderschaft is the collection of money to pay the fees of attorneys defending former German officers accused of war crimes and to help financially other German officers and generals who are in need. Most of the members of the various districts of the Bruderschaft would be very much surprised if they were to learn the truth, namely, that the inner circle of the Bruderschaft contains a number of high-ranking former German General Staff officers who together with former Nazi Gauleiters and high police functionaries form some sort of lodge.

These men regard themselves as a sort of general staff of a future German Army whose first cadre—an infantry division—should be ready by June 1951, with the cadre of a Panzer division ready by the end of 1951. The plan is to induce the Western allies to sanction such divisions as an equivalent of all the cadres of the Soviet-sponsored Eastern People's Police.

When von Manteuffel outlined his plans to Chancellor Adenauer he did not mention that these divisions would be staffed by highly qualified officers and technicians and that they are considered the backbone of a future German Army.

It is interesting to note that two of Hitler's Gauleiters, Karl Kaufmann of Hamburg and Lauterbacher of Hannover, belong to the inner circle. (Lauterbacher himself does not live in Germany but hides somewhere in Italy.)

According to these European sources, it would be a mistake to consider the Bruderschaft simply as a national socialist or neo-Nazi organization. Despite the fact that former leading Nazis belonged to the inner circle, the Bruderschaft ought rather to be called a national chauvinist German organization. It has no strict social program and at present its cross-connections and cross-relations to labor unions and monarchistic circles are restricted to a few unimportant people.

It is, however, far more important to spotlight their far-reaching connections to high financial and industrial circles. These connections are covered up and hidden. But it is no secret that the banker Pferdmenges, generally considered a close friend of Chancellor Adenauer, has von Manteuffel on his payroll. Thus, while Pferdmenges does not directly belong to the inner circle, his relationship is established through von Manteuffel.

Chief protagonist of the so-called inner circle of the Bruderschaft is a certain Alfred Franke-Grieksch who lives in the castle Holste near Bielefeld. It is he who officially conducts discussions with other legal and illegal right-wing organizations and groups for the Bruderschaft. It is interesting to note that Alfred Franke-Grieksch was a district leader in the Reichs Security Hauptamt in Berlin during the Hitler regime and a close collaborator of Gestapo Chief Heinrich Himmler.

Officially, the Bruderschaft rejects Nazis; but it backs the oath of the German flag, be it that of the Weimar Republic or that of the Hitler Regime. The primary purpose of the Bruderschaft is to rally all the national forces of Germany.

The conspirators of the July 20th anti-Hitler revolt are considered traitors; according to the Bruderschaft they have broken their oath of the flag. In this connection it seems rather grotesque to note that Hans von Stauffenberg, cousin of the chief conspirator of July 20th (who had been assassinated by Hitler) nevertheless belongs to the Bruderschaft and works hand in glove with Gottfried Griessmayer, former Reichs training chief of the Hitler Youth.

The latter first tried to form some kind of secret and illegal Hitler youth movement himself, until the Bruderschaft convinced him that his chances of success would be much greater inside the ranks of the Bruderschaft.

Griessmayer and von Stauffenberg worked closely with Mende-Partenau of the "German Union," one of the new youth organizations permitted by the Western occupation powers. The "German Union" was founded on October 30, 1947, by August Hausleiter in Rottenburg near Tueningen. There can be no doubt that Hausleiter and Mende-Partenau, the leaders of the "German Union," are well-acquainted with the goals and motives of the Bruderschaft.

It is most significant to note—particularly in view of the military character of the Bruderschaft—that all the generals and general staff officers of its inner circle were members of the former Gross Deutscher Division.

A PROGRAM OF CONSPIRACY

On February 11, 1950, the first meeting of the Bruderschaft took place in Hannover. It was a secret meeting at which the press was not invited. Participants at this meeting were presented an outline of a program. One of the participants made notes and was able later to communicate the contents of the outline to a German newspaperman, when he decided against any further dealings with the Bruderschaft.

The Stuttgarter Nachrichten, a reliable democratic German newspaper, was able to obtain this sensational document and published it in its issue of March 1. It is addressed to "Dear Political Friends" and reads as follows:

"What basically ties us together is a common experience at some time of our life: the youth movement; our fate at the front, in war prisons or in internment camps; the political fight; or only human nature—in the end. (What ties us together) is our common conviction and character. We are of the opinion that the time of the masses is over and that we have to start forming a true elite. It is absolutely of no importance on what field of public life we were or are active. (It is absolutely of no importance) whether we are former troop commanders or general staff officers, masters or experts in trade, in technical or commercial projects, editor, administrative expert, jurist or scientist—all this is of secondary importance. Decisive only is the value of the personality! . . . When in 1945 the greater German Reich collapsed our people became tired. Remembered retrospectively we have to condone and to pardon them. At that time each of us probably has asked himself whether it would make any sense at all once again to pledge himself or to put everything at stake unselfishly for our people. We had almost lost faith in Germany and we put ourselves the awful question of whether this is Germany at all. But once again (we remembered) the saying of Ulrich von Hutten: 'Germany is where strong hearts are.'"

So much for the introduction in the letter to the political friends. As far as the program of the Bruderschaft is concerned here is what the document says:

"The idea of forming an organization again became topical when the collapse of the Reich brought before us the decisive question of how the tradition of German leadership could be saved for a future time and how we could again take into our hands the command of the fate of our people in the frame of the political order which was forced upon us and controlled by the victorious powers. It became obvious that the forces that went through the same sufferings and the same fate due to the persecutions of recent times but who came out purified from this melting pot of human and political probation, would rally together. It seems important to us that those on whom we called upon are equal to the demands which the German tradition of leadership makes. . . . We are of the opinion that German leadership has been blessed in two World Wars to such an extent that another splitting up into ideological or other factions cannot be accounted for before history under any circumstances. . . . For more than 750 years our history knows the form and the effect of the German Ritterorden (Order of the Knights). These traditions we want to continue.

"Prussia and Germany became great through the spirit of the Order. The Order gave us the law of Service. Therefore we do not say 'to everyone an equal share,' because this interpretation has led and must lead to the dissolution of any organic Order. The slogan of Prussia will therefore be our slogan 'Suum Cuique' (to each one what belongs to him). Today we are a community tied together with common convictions. Tomorrow we will come out of the political fight for a new order . . . (as an organically grown Order) which will form clear laws and regulations for itself as a community Order.

"We want to be considered as a growing order and as nothing else—not as a lodge in the sense of Free Masonry, from which we are quite different—(We want to be considered as an Order) which out of its conviction discusses the question of European policy. . . . Particular political conditions require particular forms of our 'living together.' The Bruderschaft therefore is no organization with membership cards, etc., because it does not want to expose itself to the arbitrary actions of the enemy law-making machine.

THE GOAL — A NEW "FUEHRERSTAAT"

"The goal of the Bruderschaft is the union of the peoples of Europe between the Atlantic and the Ural with the Reich of all Germans in its ethnographic and historic borders as an organic part. European union and the German Reich are not contradictions . . . our foreign policy should not lead to a unilateral tieup with the West. . . . Proof of it is that we are against the participation of Germany in the Atlantic Pact. But at the same time we declare our readiness for a European pact.

"At the present moment, the question of remilitarization is not debatable for us, despite the fact that we have very clear ideas in the military field on the defense of Western Europe, conceptions which have found the greatest interest in far-reaching circles of Germany and foreign countries. German honor demands of us that we hold these questions in reserve because we are not ready to let Germany negotiate as an object of barter. Only a Germany formed in the sovereignty of a free independent Europe makes sense and can be welcomed.

"The Bruderschaft is not a social organization but rather includes the obligation to work. It is of subordinate importance and a problem to be decided by each for himself whether he wants to be active in the background as a planner or political general staff worker in his own field or in the foreground in a political organization which can only be considered an instrument. . . . The first step for the formation of local Bruderschaft will be followed by the second step: The distribution of tasks and the method of operation.

"But the question arises: What has to be done now after the Bruderschaft has come into being? The preparation of the great people's movement or political front needs very exact preparatory work. This work can be considered as concluded only when the personalities of the foreground are ready in all circles and localities; the forefront instruments have to be coordinated together, they have to move down at a given moment into the great political front.

"The task of our Brothers working in the foreground will be to prepare this. Neither time nor overzealous measures should bring us into trouble. We will be considered in a state of readiness only when the broad front starts to attack and begins to entrench upon the political fight on a broad line. The various outpost fights can only contribute to this readiness. The most important task in the forthcoming elections for the Landtage in the Bundeslaender is the creation of a broad anti-Marxist front in order to break the power of the Social Democratic Party, particularly in Northern Germany and in Lower Saxony. In order to achieve this it is necessary to use proper local measures and to rally all non-Marxist parties who are ready to participate in the election into a common coalition.

"It is therefore important to find out which Brothers are able to instigate propaganda inside the parties for this idea of an anti-Marxist front. These key positions have to be coordinated and integrated with the activities of the Reichsbruderrat (Reichs Brothers Council). The election in Hamburg and the failure of the anti-Marxist "Vaterstaedtischen Bund," which through the splitting up of the anti-Marxist forces facilitated the victory of the Social Democrats, should be a lesson."

OLD GERMAN MYSTICISM

According to the St. Galler Tagblatt, the Bruderschaft has organized itself into an underground organization with a strongly nationalistic and militaristic character and has cells all over Western Germany. It is clear that the whole movement is based on the Fuehrer principle and on the mysticism of all Germandom.

The organization's idea is based on the old German Ritterorden which from the 12th to the beginning of the 15th Century christianized and Germanized Eastern Prussia, Western Prussia and the Baltic countries. The staff officers of the Bruderschaft are designated as Ritter. The officers are Fahnenjunker (ensigns). The present medieval Order, according to the spirit of the crusades, was based on a mixture of religious and Messianic policy and an expensive militarism. The Bruderschaft is devoted to the old German mysticism, a heritage of the Nazi Party, and a fanatical nationalism. As can be seen from the document quoted above, the chief goal of the Bruderschaft is the destruction of the Social Democrats under the reasoning that the Social Democrats reject remilitarization. And here we come to what is perhaps the most important and significant point of the Bruderschaft program, a point which unfortunately has not been given the attention it deserves. As a matter of fact, it has not even been mentioned in any American paper and we therefore consider it extremely important to stress this point, which the Swiss newspaper St. Galler Tagblatt reports.

"Proof of the political naiveté of the high military lies in the fact that the Bruderschaft in its foreign policy follows a strong mixture of mysticism and realism. Pointing to the convention of Tauroggen (desertion of the Prussian Yorck from Napoleon during the invasion of Russia); pointing to Rapallo and the foreign policy directives which Bismarck had given to German Eastern policy, the Bruderschaft strives completely in accordance with the Soviet propaganda for a National Front, for a close union of Germans with Russian interests with the goal of creating a German-Russian power alliance against the West. The officers of the Bruderschaft maintain an intensive exchange of letters with their former comrades of the German Wehrmacht who at present have high positions in the Eastern Zone, with the object of preparing the territory for Communism and Bolshevism; they are of the opinion that the German-Russian power alliance can be realized even by groups representing opposing opinions on social and economic questions and that the Bruderschaft could be effective in the reestablishment of the German power position."

According to the Swiss paper, the political development of the Bruderschaft makes this movement an extremely dangerous one for Western German democracy. It is stressed that at the proper moment the leadership of the Bruderschaft would not refrain from using force, eventually with Soviet help, to start an armed revolt. From the political and tactical viewpoint, the existence of the Bruderschaft could easily encourage the Russians into new political aggression in Germany. Furthermore, the existence of the Bruderschaft would enable the Russians to solve the German problem by using the Germans themselves against the Western Allies.

Finally, from the psychological viewpoint, the Bruderschaft is a source of danger because the people in Western Germany are dissatisfied and ready to rally behind this new nationalism hidden under the cloak of the mystic Order.

THE SECRET PROGRAM OF THE BRUDERSCHAFT

In addition to the foregoing document, another Swiss paper, the Wochen Zeitung of Zurich, reprints the minimum program of the Bruderschaft as it was published in the illegal mimeographed underground news sheet, Der Scheinwerfer:

"The participation of German soldiers in any kind of military formation cannot be even considered until the following preconditions have been fulfilled:

"1. Defamation of German militarism has to be stopped completely. Those German soldiers still in prison, including the army leaders condemned at Nuremberg, must be released and given their freedom. Regarding the accusation of violation of human rights made against individual members of the former German Wehrmacht, including the Waffen-SS these cases should be brought before a German military court.

"2. The German cadres to be established must be subordinated to a German Commander-in-chief whose behavior in the past will guarantee that these German soldiers will not be used to serve foreign interests.

"3. The equipment of the German cadres must be adequate to meet modern military demands. Stockpiles of weapons, munitions, trucks, gasoline and all other equipment have to be guaranteed.

"These requests are limited to the minimum in view of the present subordination of justified demands—(they are the minimum) which can be demanded if German men who have a bit of honor should find themselves ready to serve with the armies in our fatherland that is still occupied and economically plundered by the enemy. We therefore address an urgent appeal to our friends to keep a careful watch on developments and to instruct all comrades accordingly, from simple soldiers to generals: Every German male who engages himself in a German Foreign Legion without these minimum requests being granted is a traitor to the German people.

Whoever, nevertheless, declares himself ready (to serve) should know that we will not refrain, if need be, from opposing him publicly. As it is clearly recognized that in the great power fight between East and West both sides have begun to count on the German power potential—it becomes necessary for us to stay together in strong determination in the decisive moment."

NEW EFFORTS TO COVER UP BRUDERSCHAFT ACTIVITIES

As a result of the exposes in the German and Swiss press, on March 1 the Bruderschaft came out with an official statement signed by Beck-Broichsitter, the former IA—officer of the division Grossdeutschland. This statement obviously tries to dissipate the unsavory impression on public opinion left by the exposes. The official statement of the Bruderschaft declares that it is neither an underground organization nor a union of generals or militarists, nor a new party. According to the statement, the Bruderschaft is neither right nor left but sees a greater danger in National Bolshevism than in Neo-Fascism.

The Bruderschaft's efforts are designed to unite the best forces of all parties and all organizations which have the common desire for order. Forced to establish its position, the Bruderschaft considers its task to be "the unity of the leadership personalities who have remained after the two world wars."

As far as interior policy is concerned, the Bruderschaft slogan is "liberty and responsibility—fraternity and right." As far as foreign policy is concerned, the Bruderschaft aspires to the union of the European peoples into one nation with each nation keeping its individuality. The Bruderschaft, according to the statement, knows that the way to this goal lies through the West but it rejects doing anything to harden the front which divides Europe today.

Perhaps the most amusing part of the official statement of the Bruderschaft is that in which it declares that "out of European responsibility" it rejects any rearmament of Germany categorically(!) Any statement to the contrary should be considered a deliberate lie. The Bruderschaft considers military questions as absolutely subordinated(!) However, it ventures the opinion that the youth of Europe should be called to voluntary reconstruction and voluntary help.

Finally, the statement denies that the Bruderschaft is working towards German leadership in Europe. Such an accusation could be made only by Nationalists who have not yet overcome the principle of the national state; they are the real reactionaries.

So much for the official statement of the Bruderschaft, which in itself is nothing more than a weak effort to whitewash the movement and its aims.

ADVOCATING "NEUTRALITY"

In conclusion, it is interesting to note that Drew Middleton in a dispatch from Frankfurt to The New York Times recently stressed the point that the Bruderschaft "is moving towards the advocacy of German neutrality in the cold war between the East and the West."

At a recent meeting of the Bruderschaft in Duesseldorf one of its leaders, Alfred Franke-Griecksch, made a speech in which he espoused the idea of German neutrality in the cold war. This espousal, stated Drew Middleton, "would be a political factor of greatest significance."

And The New York Times correspondent added: "Without having committed themselves to the merits or demerits of the idea of establishing Germany as a member of a chain of buffer states between East and West, several Western sources acknowledged that its advocacy by the Bruderschaft would give it greater importance in Germany. . . .

"Herr Franke-Grieksch's speech, reported by reliable sources, gave an insight into the changing character of the Bruderschaft, originally a welfare organization seeking only a united Germany within the frontiers of 1937.

"The speech showed that the organization represented the anti-democratic ideas its leaders believed would triumph eventually in Germany.

"The time is ripe for the Bruderschaft to play a role in Germany similar to that played by the Stahlhelm after the 1914-1918 war, Herr Franke-Grieksch said. The Stahlhelm (Steel Helmet) was the nationalist military organization founded by former German soldiers after World War I.

"The Bruderschaft contains 'men of proven efficiency' who will take over every phase of German administration when the time comes, Herr Franke-Grieksch added.

"He set this time as the winter of 1952-53 when 'the present parliamentary system will have broken down utterly.'

" 'We have our liaison officers and our agents everywhere,' he asserted.

"Asked when the Bruderschaft intended to emerge as an overt political force, Herr Franke-Grieksch replied that public meetings would be held 'in due course.' "

". . . A day of reckoning will come over Germany just as it came over China. I suspect that the resulting explosion in the U. S. will make the outcry of China seem like a pleasant afternoon tea.

"For in Germany it will be seen that we have not only lost the second world war—and that the Nazis, rather than we, were the victors—but that we have unconsciously prepared the way for us to lose a third world war if it comes. . . ."

(Senator Guy M. Gillette)

"An American educator, momentarily attached to the United States occupation forces, swears that the other day he overheard the following earnest colloquy among three erstwhile German supermen:

"First German: 'I'm the best democrat among us because I was a democrat even before Hitler took power.'

"Second German: 'Oh no, I'm the best democrat because I remained one even during the Hitler dictatorship.'

"Third German: 'You're both mistaken. I'm the best—because after four years of instructions by the Western Allies on how to act like a democrat, I'm still one.' "

Ruhr Steel Goes East

Writing in a recent issue of the weekly New Leader, Irving Brown, American Federation of Labor representative in Europe, made this significant statement: "The new German 'Drang Noch Osten' is on the way. This time the drive to the East extends to the very shores of the Pacific Ocean. For the Russians are now attempting to win the Battle of the Ruhr via China and thus conquer all of Germany. In addition to the markets of Eastern Europe, Ruhr industrialists cannot but cast longing eyes on the great and vast areas of primitive, underdeveloped China now resting in Communist hands."

Mr. Brown hits the nail on the head. As a matter of fact, the Western German industrialists, despite their alleged opposition to Communism, are casting, as Drew Middleton recently stated in The New York Times, "yearning glances toward trade with the East." In recent weeks these "yearning glances" have taken a very definite form. "Business is business and has to come first" is obviously the leitmotif. The Soviets, on the other hand, know this very well and they don't leave a stone unturned in their efforts to woo these German Ruhr industrialists.

In one of his columns from Frankfurt, Germany, Joseph Alsop in the N. Y. Herald Tribune reported the following significant episode:

"At a recent dinner in Duesseldorf this correspondent found that all of the seven big industrialists at the table were being almost daily besieged with generous business offers and flattering Soviet words by Eastern German emissaries of the Soviet High Command."

Other reports supplement this information. For example, Newsweek magazine's Washington Bureau stated:

"Diplomatic reports from Moscow claim that during the recent negotiations the Russians have demanded and obtained Chinese agreements to a scheme under which the Soviets would have a complete monopoly over all trade between Germany and China. These reports stress the presence in Moscow of a strong German economic delegation and indicate that some members of the delegation may have taken part in the negotiations with Mao. The only previous indication that the Soviets might be toying wth this idea occurred during a November steel-industry conference in Duesseldorf, when German technicians from the Soviet zone emphasized the importance of China to Germany's heavy industry.

"These reports stress that a Russian monopoly on trade with China could, under the guise of interzonal German trade, secure for Soviet-occupied Manchuria heavy industrial equipment from Western Germany. Also, the bait of Chinese orders could be used to win over the Western Germany industrialists to the Soviet side. Western Germany, the Ruhr especially, would find the prospect of trade with China most alluring."

Perusing the German press during recent months, it is interesting to note how much attention the Western German newspapers are giving the problem of German-Chinese economic relations. The Sueddeutsche Zeitung on March 28 significantly titled such an article "Germany and China—Natural Commercial Partners." The story reports the arrival of Communist buyers in Frankfurt and expresses the hope that the Chinese-Soviet Treaty of February 14, 1950, will undoubtedly have good results for Germany. The article furthermore states that one of the main objectives of this Chinese-Soviet Treaty was to further Stalin's efforts to gain the Western German industrial capacity for his own goal.

It should be noted that the Sueddeutsche Zeitung is being published in Munich in the American Zone. Nevertheless, the Americans are being asked openly to promote German-Chinese business relations. The most significant phrase in this article reads as follows:

"The Americans should, in due consideration of the security factor, promote direct German-Chinese commerce in line with their policy of strengthening the Western German economy." On the other hand, Eastern German politicians cleverly play up the economic situation in Western Germany and urge the West German leaders and industrialists to look to the East for their export. According to the Sueddeutsche Zeitung of March 9, 1950, one of the Eastern German Communist bosses recently stated:

"We are ready to help the West German population. Our first requirement is for them to fight against the dependency of Western Germany upon American imperialism. We have given the order to our export Minister to sign a commerce treaty with the People's Republic of China. The possibilities of deliveries of Western German firms have been taken into consideration. . . ."

As we stated in our leading editorial of the previous issue of Prevent World War III, the big stakes at present are the Chinese markets. In order to do a profitable business with Communist China, German conservative Ruhr industrialists and their friends have been begging the Western Allies to stop dismantling and to help them to rebuild German industry. The situation is perhaps best clarified by what J. Emlyn Williams of The Christian Science Monitor recently wrote from Bonn. Wrote Mr. Williams:

"West Germany wants the Western Allies' money, but not their instructions." This is perfectly true and nothing better indicates these trends than the recent resumption of negotiations between West German government representatives and Eastern Zone representatives for the lifting of the embargo on steel shipments from the Ruhr to the Soviet Zone—contrary to Allied wishes.

In this connection, we quote from a recent Associated Press dispatch from Berlin:

"East Germany is in the midst of a grandiose Communist two-year plan that vitally depends on steel. A long-term embargo would have spelled ruin for the plan."

Ernest Leiser in a report to the Overseas News Agency recently stated that U. S. officials in Berlin angrily charged that a curtain of silence has been lowered around the talks by which the West German Federal Republic is now seeking to conclude a new trade accord with the Soviet-controlled government of East Germany. Wrote Mr. Leiser:

". . . it would be only common sense as well as common courtesy for the Western Germans to keep the Americans posted on the status of negotiations....In rebuttal, the Germans insist they are under no obligation to present the agreement for United States inspection until it is signed, sealed and delivered. They accuse the Americans of 'unwarranted interference' in the 'limited area of sovereignty given us under the Occupation Satute.' . . ."

Furthermore, in another dispatch from Berlin Ernest Leiser calls attention to the illegal smuggling of goods and machine tools from Western to Eastern Germany:

"Substantial quantities of goods sent by the United States to Western Germany under the Marshall Plan are being smuggled illegally across the zonal borders to the Soviet-controlled East German State.

"A sweeping investigation is now under way to find ways to plug those leaks, or to force the West German Federal Republic to do so. However, economic analysts here estimate that as much as $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 worth of goods is now slipping from the Western Zones into East Germany without authorization, annually. Of that, as high as $5,000,000 may be Marshall Plan goods. . . ."

The most dangerous factor by far in the whole situation is emphasized in the following part of Ernest Leiser's dispatch:

"There is good reason today to believe that a number of industrial magnates in the Ruhr are making a secret, calculated effort to circumvent the Western Allied order limiting production of steel in the West German Federal Republic to 11,100,000 tons a year.

"Their method is as dubious politically as it is devious economically. The Ruhr industrialists are building up the steel-producing capacity in Soviet-controlled Eastern Germany by exporting the machines and machine-tools needed to construct plants there. Their 'reward' is reportedly a secret accord which gives them a share of the increased capacity. . . ."

And Leiser adds:

"The most reliable information available indicates an enormous jump during the past year in the steel output of the Soviet Zone of Germany. A year ago production was at a negligible 450,000 tons, far below that needed for the Zone. Today it has risen to a rate of more than 1,000,000 tons annually—still a small figure, but phenomenally higher than before. The target for 1950 is 1,350,000 tons and early in 1951 a plant is expected to be completed in Brandenburg which would raise total output to nearly 1,750,000 tons.

"A good deal of that increase, American economic analysts declare, can be attributed directly to the shipments which the industrialists of the Ruhr have sent to the Soviet Zone in the framework of a general trade agreement between the Federal Republic and East Germany. It has become obvious that those shipments have included not simply raw steel ingots or finished steel products as envisaged, but actually the machines and tools with which the East Germans can make steel. . . ."

The usually well-informed Overseas News Agency correspondent concludes his dispatch by pointing out that these dark maneuvers by the Western German industrialists are even more significant "in the light of present German pressures to get the steel ceiling lifted well above the present 11,000,000 ton level."

How the Germans are using blackmail tactics against the West in order to further their own interests is documented also by a significant editorial of the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung of April 1. This editorial contains the following message:

"Germany was always the bridge between the East and the West. . . . The Allies are not able to come to an accord with the Russians. . . . What is then more natural than for us in view of the present pressures to say: 'If until now, within the framework of world events, the others were not able to make an intelligent agreement, then it is our duty finally to arouse ourselves in order to obtain at least an economic understanding. . . .

"In doing so we will not turn to the little bosses of the Eastern Zone but directly to the big boss in Moscow. There is where decisions are being made. It is true that according to the Occupation Statute foreign policy discussions must be conducted through the three High Commissioners. Therefore we will have to take the road of private mediation and thus try to arrange economic agreements between Germany and Russia, which nobody can refuse us in view of the fact that our life is at stake. . . ."

(Courtesy Le Rassemblement, Paris)

"The first impulse of German diplomacy . . . consists of freeing Germany of the controls the Allies placed on it. . . .

"The Germans accept these limitations now because they are braced by 250,000 Allied troops, and sweetened by more than half a billion dollars of aid. What the Germans really want is the aid without the controls. . . ."

(Th. White to the ONA)

German Dumping on the March

There is a group of individuals in the United States who believe that German economic power, world security and American prosperity are all one word. A short while ago, a couple of Senators complained to the ECA that the limitations on German industrial war potential was a pro-British conspiracy which fitted in with the world-wide revolutionary plans of the Communists.

One of the Senators, Styles Bridges from New Hampshire, intimated that the drive for decartelization was nothing else but a plot hatched behind the walls of the Kremlin. Mr. Bridges, we fear, has acted rather hastily in defense of the German cartel interests. After all, he was elected by the people of the U. S. and like all other Senators he is expected, by his constituents, to safeguard the American people and the institutions of free enterprise which have made this great nation of ours. His brimming-over enthusiasm for the German cause may, one day, place him in a very embarrassing position in the eyes of our businessmen and the unemployed workers who will have to suffer so that Germany gets a more exclusive place in the sun.

Senator Bridges speaks for those who are supremely confident that the target of German economic power is any other country but the good old U. S. A. They do not fret over the fact that the Germans have already surpassed the French steel industry. They are not alarmed when they read that the Germans are out to undercut other Marshall Plan countries in the markets of the world. And when they read the report of the London Economist that German shipbuilding firms "have been able to offer much faster delivery at lower cost than British firms which have, until recently, been overcrowded with work. The advantage in delivery may prove temporary but on costs the Germans can always underbid British yards. A recent German quotation to a British shipowner was 75% of the lowest British tender. But when this quotation was refused, it was immediately cut to about 60% of the British price," they smirk and say—well, that's just too bad.

But does the threat of German economic power halt at the shores of the U. S.? Are we actually immune? If we are, then Senator Bridges and those who are behind him are realists in the business sense of the word.

Believing in the old proverb that "forewarned is forearmed," we submit herewith some facts which show that the American people have no cause for complacency—despite the wishful thinking of the pro-German interests.

Speaking about shipbuilding, The New York Times of April 10th reported in its financial pages that the Bethlehem Steel Co. will shortly close down one of its largest shipyards for lack of work. Mr. J. M. Willis, general manager of the Baltimore district of the steel company's shipbuilding division, said that the problem was not peculiar to Bethlehem but faces practically every shipyard in the country. He estimated that the closing of the Bethlehem shipyard in Maryland would result in the direct unemployment of 3,500 employees.

About the same time that Willis revealed the plight of the Bethlehem shipyard, the Associated Press reported that a tanker belonging to the American Olympic Whaling Co. would be converted into a floating fish-oil factory at the Howaldt shipyard in Kiel, Germany. Director Garver of the American company stated that the German dockyards tender was the lowest received.

The crisis in the U. S. shipbuilding industry has reached such proportions that Eugene G. Grace, Chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corp. recently told stockholders that Bethlehem might have to buy its ships abroad. This would undoubtedly result in additional unemployment for thousands of American workers.

The crisis in American shipbuilding is spreading to our merchant marine. At a meeting of American seamen, it was urged that the National Maritime Union of the C. I. O. protest the manning of a new super tanker by 39 German seamen flown here from Germany. Shipowners contended that Germans had been employed because of lower wages, while in Baltimore alone 1,450 American seamen were "beached" for lack of jobs. Does it appear from these facts that the Germans are forgetting Uncle Sam?

Indeed, the threat of German economic power has begun to produce a distinct uneasiness among many American businessmen. Their statements do not appear on the front pages of your daily newspaper. They are usually found in the financial sections which are read by comparatively few people. But some day they may appear as headline news—only then, we fear, it will be too late. We cite a few examples of this uneasiness as an indication that all the propaganda that Germany is the key to world prosperity and stability does not exactly produce a wave of acclaim by some of our more sensitive businessmen.

Mr. William L. Knox, President of the Westinghouse Electric International Co., recently addressing a Des Moines Chamber of Commerce meeting, warned that an international trade war was in the making. He pointed out that the U. S. is being confronted by attacks from "low wage-paying countries." He did not identify the low wage-paying countries, but we shall subsequently do so. In connection with Mr. Knox's remarks, the German newspaper, Neue Zeitung, February 7, 1950, boasted that production of the West German electrical industry has increased from 1,800,000 marks in 1948 to 2,400,000,000 Marks for 1949. At the same time, West German exports from the electrical industry amounted to 100,000,000 Marks, as compared with only 30,000,000 in 1948. The newspaper commented that "foreign customers have shown an increasing interest in German electrical products which are competitive with foreign production. . . ."

The Wall Street Journal of April 6, 1950, quoted an official of the American steel industry as saying "We can't possibly compete with importers." Among the importers referred to, was Germany. And speaking about the upsurge of German steel which has reached the permitted level of 11.1 million tons, the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe stated that by the end of 1949, Russian and German steel production increased by more than that of all of the rest of Europe over the 1948 output.

Mr. Michael Hoffman, one of The New York Times' leading correspondents in Europe, reported that the Germans, in an effort to "demonstrate to the Allies their need for an increased ceiling on steel production" had begun to use dumping methods to create instability in the world markets. Hoffman reported "German steel began to be offered in South America, Italy and the Far East at cut prices." This in spite of the fact that the needs of the German domestic economy "has made the German need for exports, at any price, less urgent." The drive on the part of the Germans to undercut competitors, including the U. S., in the world steel market, continues unabated.

German dumping methods are not only confined to shipbuilding and steel, but are reaching out in every direction. The chemical industry of Germany is on the march again. It is approaching its pre-war output. James B. Brennan, a foreign service officer detailed to the Chemical Branch of the Department of Commerce, stated that Bizonal Germany had moved up in one year to sixth place among the countries engaging in the international chemical trade.

Mr. Max S. Scheidt, President of a pharmaceutical import-export concern, after a recent trip to Europe, told the press that the German chemical industry was coming up fast. He called it a distinct threat to the chemical industry of the United States. In this connection, he mentioned that Norway, which had been under the heel of the Nazi invaders and was endeavoring to establish trade relations with the United States in pharmaceutical products, was told by ECA officials that they would have to buy the equivalent of $200,000 of bulk packaged pharmaceuticals from Western Germany.

The Norwegians, Mr. Scheidt declared, "appeared to resent having to aid in the rebuilding of the German chemical industry which they believe is the backbone of that nation's military might." Apparently, the criminal history of the Farben Chemical empire and its record of undercutting the chemical industries of other countries is of no concern to some ECA officials.

Mr. Jackson Martindell, President of the American Institute of Management, after a trip to Europe, also mentioned the great threat of German economic power. "The superiority of Germany's technique," he declared, "in certain lines of products is already apparent and can be expected to grow as the months go by. Germany, defeated in two major wars, is likely to come out far superior in technology to any country in Europe, or Asia."

Mr. Martindell's observations have been seconded by another businessman, F. W. Richman, President of the United States Foreign Corporation. He told the press that on the basis of his studies, U. S. exports were being threatened. He mentioned in particular the quick comeback of Germany in Western Europe and Japan in the Far East.

Lest it appear that we have intentionally exaggerated the picture, we refer to a recent announcement that both Britain and the United States "were investigating methods for preventing low cost production in Germany from undercutting sales by countries against which she waged war."

We hesitate to use the word competition with regard to Germany because competition presupposes a free market and free enterprise—neither of which was or is found in Germany.

Prior to World War I, the Germans had already shown that they were uncompromising enemies of free trade and fair business competition.

Mr. Douglas Miller, who was, for fifteen years, Commercial Attaché in Berlin—six of them under the Nazi regime—has written at length on this very subject. His book You Can't do Business with Hitler was a best-seller. Mr. Miller showed that Nazi trading practices were merely the extension of Germany's methods of doing business before 1933. He estimated that the "average German export transaction obtained a 40% subsidy from the German government at the expense of domestic industry." Because of the wholesale employment of subsidies the Treasury Department as early as 1936, was forced to adopt measures to counter Germany's dumping practices in the U. S.

Mr. Miller cited a couple of examples of German trade policy before the war:

A. "The Germans put a maximum price of 6 cents on U. S. cotton while at the same time they were buying cotton of inferior quality from Latin America, Africa, and Asia at 9 to 10 cents per pound. They did this to divert trade from this country and to put us in a more difficult trading position."

B. "Germany, having had a monopoly on crude Naphthalene used for dry cleaning, embargoed the shipment of this product and stated that shipments would be resumed "provided the American companies interested, would sign an agreement to purchase a fixed quantity each year for five years in advance, at a price which was three times the existent price at the time."

Germany's foreign trade policies were designed to insure her own self-sufficiency at the expense of other nations, including the U. S. She was the most flagrant violator of America's "most favored nation" policy which has not only been beneficial to American business but to the world at large.

"Putting the Cartel Before the Horse!"

Mr. Leo T. Crowley, former head of the U. S. Foreign Economic Administration, reported in detail on German trading methods and policy and said that they were designed to "import as large quantities of raw materials and products needed for war as possible and to import as little of anything else as possible."

The instruments utilized by the German government and German business to carry out this policy of economic autarchy were cartel arrangements, special tax rebates and other practices which have nothing in common with American free enterprise.

It may be said that this is all water under the bridge and that there is a new Germany. Yet, as early as January, 1949, The N. Y. Times commenting on German economic policy declared: "Basically the issue is one of how far the occupation authorities in Germany are to be allowed by the U. S. government to operate the German economy as an autarchic system without any consideration of the recovery problems of the rest of Europe." The policy of encouraging German autarchy in trade, The N. Y. Times declared "is having a disastrous effect on the recovery of Europe."

No, indeed, the German tune has not changed. This is clearly indicated by the policy recently announced by Ludwig Erhard who was the former Minister of Economics in Bavaria where he filled virtually all the key posts with known Nazis. He was advisor to Gauleiter Buerckel in the Saar and chief of the Hitlerite Institute for Industrial Research. (The New York Times, March 2, 1948.)

Equipped with such experience under Hitler, Erhard recently announced his plan for an all-out drive to increase German exports. This plan included among other things an increase in export guarantees for long-term export orders by 300,000,000 Marks to a total of 400,000,000 Marks. German exporters would be granted a dollar bonus from export yields for free disposal. Tax allowances for all export firms are also provided for. In addition, Erhard declared that industrial undertakings with a larger percentage of exports would be given priority in the allocation of industrial capital from ERP funds.

Together with subsidies from the German state in one form or another, it is clear that Professor Erhard's plan is by no means original. It is the continuation of the peculiar methods by which the Germans have done business in the past.

Throughout Western Europe the effects of German dumping are already felt. Netherlanders are increasingly concerned as they receive reports that German companies have been able to offer prices 30 to 50% below their competitors.

An example of how the Germans have operated is the case of the giant electrical trust, Siemens. This German outfit offers a whole thermal electrical installation to Greece "at just one-half the price bid by the next lowest of any of more than 35 competitors from all countries."

Senator Harley Kilgore, who headed the committee which examined the German economy after World War II, in describing the German method of doing business, said the following:

"It would, moreover, be false to assume that industrial disarmament means starvation for Germany. For 50 years, the imbalance of the German economy, with its overemphasis on munitions and munitions-supporting industries, was carefully nurtured. In designing an economy whose function was to prepare the nation for war, agricultural production was deliberately dwarfed until just before the outbreak of World War II. There is every reason why this agricultural production should be further expanded. It is absurd to follow any prewar pattern in reconstituting German industry. In Germany there was no 'normal' prewar pattern. Unless we make basic and fundamental changes in the German economy, we shall be perpetuating the type of organization that is itself an incitement to war.

"I have this consideration in mind when I am critical of the State Department's recent report on Germany, which declares that the United States does not 'selfishly' wish to weaken 'German industries of a peaceful character in which Germany has produced effectively for world markets.' In this context 'peaceful industries' is a contradiction in terms. Congressional investigations have shown how Germany insidiously used the 'peaceful industries' in which she supplied world markets as effective weapons of economic warfare, to secure a stranglehold upon and cripple the vital production of nations marked for conquest. It would be suicidal for American policy to aid in rebuilding such industries, jeopardizing our national security and world peace for the sake of short-term cartel profits to a few corporations whose views prevailed in the councils of our military government."

Senator Kilgore's warning is still timely and should be heeded by all Americans, especially by our businessmen and trade unionists. The fact that we have always underestimated what the Germans can do has perhaps beclouded the reasoning of many well-intentioned people who think in abstractions when it comes to trade and competition. They rightly insist that the world must expand commercially and that all nations should have the opportunity to participate in this expansion.

The Society for the Prevention of World War III is a firm supporter of this thesis, but we insist that free trade cannot thrive in the same world with the German cartels. The Germans are approaching the point where they will be able to undermine the economic position of their major target, the United States of America. They are gearing their internal economy in such a way that they will be able to upset normal economic trade relations and create havoc among the nations of the world.

Mr. Knox of the Westinghouse Electric International Co. talked about the international trade war which would result from low wage paying countries. The U. S. News and World Report spelled it out for Mr. Knox, as follows:

The Germans are in a very favorable business position. The German budget for 1950 amounts to $4½ billion as against $42 billion for the United States. In Britain where the population is only 6 per cent greater than that of Western Germany the budget is $10 billion. The Germans have no defense costs while for the United States 40 per cent is devoted to defense measures which include our army of occupation. Taxes are very low for German business and indeed this authoritative magazine states that the Germans are taxed less than France, Belgium, Holland, Sweden or the United States.

Commenting on these factors, The U. S. News and World Report declared:

"Business advantages are coming to the Germans from sources other than low taxes and government costs. With nearly 2,000,000 unemployed, German workers are docile compared with those in other countries. Wages have increased less than in any other country of Europe. The weekly earnings of German workers are only 44 per cent above the 1935-1938 average compared with 131 per cent in Britain and 155 per cent in the United States. . . . The Germans are also working longer hours than workers in other countries. Although the official work week is 48 hours, many industries average far more than that. In the paper industry, for example, skilled labor is averaging almost 53 hours a week. Strikers are rare in Germany. . . . Industrial strength is being preserved and expanded too. Dismantling has been halted, leaving vital steel synthetic oil and synthetic rubber plants in Germany. The Germans have been given permission to build a merchant fleet. Occupation controls are being loosened."

This is the German internal economy which fits in very nicely with the German plan to challenge American industry. A low standard of living may be found in other countries of Western Europe, but that is precisely why those countries are in a better position to meet the German drive than the United States. It is obvious what this will mean in the long run to American businessmen and labor. It should be borne in mind that while the weekly earnings of industrial workers in the U. S. averages about 55 dollars, the average for the British is about 20 dollars, and for the German worker approximately 13 dollars.

It may be that some of our larger companies, especially those with German cartel connections, will be able to weather the German economic onslaught. But the smaller businessmen and those who sincerely practice the doctrines of a free market are going to get hurt and with them thousands upon thousands of American workers will lose their jobs. This is the bleak perspective which faces the Americans who have been handing over billions to the Germans on the assurances that German economic power was the touchstone of world recovery. As we all know, this certainly wasn't true in the past. What reason is there to believe that times have changed, when the same groups who guided German economic destiny before and under Hitler are back in power?

". . . It is becoming obvious to Allied occupation personnel that German resentment of their presence, and of the controls and inconveniences they embody, is on a marked increase. . . .

"The Germans are growing aware that they can get away with criticism — blunt and direct — of their Western conquerors. . . . Those criticisms have been of all kinds, and on all political and economic scores. . . .

"Whatever form they take, they add up to one hostile conclusion: that the Germans can decide best what course of action to take for Germany, that Allied aid is welcomed but that Allied interference is unwarranted and that the conquering Powers are today motivated by dubious if not actually by evil aims in their 'suppression' of German political and economic development. . . ."

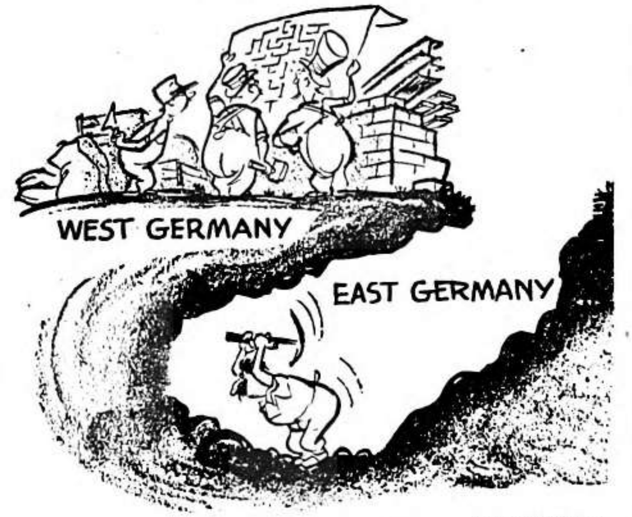
"REBUILDING GERMANY"



Stockholm Tidningen

Does Crime Pay?

In his opening address before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg concerning German crimes against peace, Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson noted: "The refuge of the defendants can be only their hope that International Law will lag so far behind the moral sense of mankind that conduct which is crime in the moral sense must be regarded as innocent in Law."

Despite Justice Jackson's misgivings, International Law managed to keep up with the moral sense of mankind and a set of juridical principles infused with a profound moral purpose was established. But this grand edifice of Justice is crumbling under the disintegrating and pernicious influence of POLICY. POLICY remains as it was—untouched by the elementary standards which must be the binding force of the fabric we call Civilization.

International Law condemned German crimes against humanity.

International Law condemned the burnings, the lootings and the destruction of a whole continent by a people whose raison d'etre was the cult of conquest.

International Law upheld the rights and dignity of man against violence, mass enslavement and degradation.

International Law announced to the world that criminals who violate the norms of civilization will and must be held accountable to Civilization.

But POLICY continues as in the past to condone the crimes which have been condemned by International Law.

POLICY coddles, frees and protects the worst German criminals.

POLICY dumps billions of the taxpayers money into Germany while it refuses to adequately compensate the peoples over-run by the German invader.

POLICY returns Germany's war arsenal, the Ruhr, to its former masters, who made and supported Hitler.

POLICY permits the Germans to impose their schemes on the free world and rehabilitates the former enemy at the expense of the security and economic wellbeing of its victims.

POLICY places the Germans on a special pedestal paving the way for the revival of German economic mastery over Europe and with it the disruption of international trade and commerce.

What must the Germans think of International Law which condemns crime condoned by POLICY?

What good can be expected from POLICY which is intrinsically evil?

It is only natural that most Germans should regard the developments of the past five years as proof that the great crusade for Justice and Freedom was an Allied fraud.

Can the Germans doubt that POLICY ultimately rewards CRIME?

". . . To the French the rearmament of Germany is not only morally repugnant but politically senseless. They have no confidence that the Germans, after getting arms from the West, will not go over to the Russians. And their distrust is understandable. . . . A well-known authority on Germany, a man regularly stationed in Berlin . . . not a Frenchman . . . said cynically: 'Everything will depend on how many troops the Americans have on the Rhine. If they have a million men there I believe they can depend on the Germans, can trust that the new German army will be loyal to the Western Allies. But if the Americans do not have a big force on the Rhine, the new German Army will go over to the Russians and fight with them against the West'. . . ."

(From The Nation)

"Today, the chief threat in the world is undoubtedly that of Soviet expansion and aggression. This should not blind us, however, to the importance of looking closely at the situation in Germany to see what is happening there. . . . .

"Five times—I repeat five times—within the last century Germany has been the starting point of aggressive wars. The last two of these wars threatened the very existence of Western civilization.

"What is going on in this heart of Central Europe? What has happened to our original war and peace aims for the German people?

"We are all pleased that Germany is recovering from the economic wounds of the recent conflict. But if there is being recreated the same Germany that confronted the world ten years ago, we are making another date with a terrible destiny for Europe and the world. . . ."

(Senator Herbert H. Lehman appealing for a bi-partisan review of the whole German program.)

"Der Weg" — Mouthpiece of Pan-Germanism

Argentine periodical in German has become chief organ of German General Staff and main rallying point of exited Nazis, waiting for a new "Der Tag."

It becomes increasingly clear that the most dangerous Nazi outpost outside the borders of Germany has been established in Argentina.

From time to time news dispatches have referred to the German language periodical, Der Weg, published in Buenos Aires. In recent years, this magazine has not only become the mouthpiece for reawakening Pan-Germanism and Neo-Nazism, but it is also being used as a rallying point for top flight Nazis, military men and scientists who after the defeat of Germany in 1945 were able to escape and find a haven in Argentina.

In the United Nations World of December, 1949, T. H. Tetens published a sensational article titled "New German Blueprints—War on Russia's Side," in which he exposed the activities of the Neo-Nazis in Argentina and the strange goings-on around the magazine, Der Weg.

Since then, more detailed information has become available on the real meaning of the Nazi activities in Argentina and particularly in Buenos Aires.

The New York Daily News in its issue of April 30th published an extremely interesting special dispatch from Buenos Aires significantly titled "Germans in Argentina Look to Red Alliance." In this dispatch it was stated that "a German language magazine published in Buenos Aires is keeping alive Nazi doctrines against the day when exiled Nazis, as a party, can ally themselves with Russia in an attempt to crush the Western democracies."

The magazine referred to is Der Weg, published by the Duerer Publishing house in Buenos Aires, which in its masthead harmlessly calls itself "Monthly for Cultural Care and for Reconstruction."

Behind this innocent-sounding masthead and a few unimportant and dull literary articles, the magazine openly defends Pan-Germanism, the German officers' clique, certain features of Nazism, etc.—all under the cover of a pseudo-European ideal.

The Daily News dispatch gives the following clear picture of the situation:

"Argentina is a haven today for Nazi brass, from military commanders and atomic scientists to aviation engineers and geopoliticians. The evidence of their own magazine indicates some of them form a skeleton 'administration in exile' which could be moved into control in Germany after it is freed from Allied occupation. The eventual objective would be to form an alliance with Russia.

"'It is impossible for the West to halt the tide of Communism,' declares Der Weg, a magazine which is the group's principal propaganda organ. This magazine has been banned from Western Germany by the Allied occupation authorities.

"Some of the Nazi group are working directly with President Peron's regime. Prof. Kurt (Willie) Tank, former chief Focke-Wulf aeronautical engineer, is now designing planes for the Argentine air force. Atomic specialist Wilhelm Westphal is carrying on research for Argentina. Gen. Adolf Galland, who headed Goering's fighter command; ace Hans Ulrich Rudel, who claims to have flown 2,350 missions, and a Col. Thieben are training Argentine pilots and testing their planes.

"The group's propaganda headquarters are at the Duerer Publishing Co. in midtown Buenos Aires. Der Weg is edited by Eberhardt Fritsch and Gustave Friedl. Collaborators include Colin Ross, one-time head of Nazi propaganda in the United States; Ferdinand Fried, one of Goebbel's chief editors; Col. Hans Mahler of the former German High Command, and such 'Lebensraum' experts as Anton Zischka and Walter Pahl, both graduates of Karl Haushofer's 'Realpolitik' school.

"The magazine's information on Russian science, from submarines and rockets to bacteriological warfare and a new 'ray' weapon, would be surprising if it were not for the fact that the political line foresees a future Nazi-Communist alliance.

"The Duerer firm also produces a stream of books, with Baumbach and Udel as its best-selling authors. Baumbach's 'Zu Spaet' (Too Late) laments that Hitler did not put more faith in guided missiles and contends that the Normandy landings by the Allies broke up a program which was within six months of perfection. Udel's 'Trotzdem' (Nevertheless) says things will be different next time."

Looking over the list of contributors whose articles appear in the columns of Der Weg, one finds a strange combination of Pan-German poets and novelists, Nazi militarists, non-German Germanophiles and last but not least members of that fringe of pro-German and pro-Nazi rabble rousers from the United States. However, unlike some of the revealing pro-German newspapers in this country, Der Weg uses more clever and subtle methods. Everything expressed is deliberately hidden behind a kind of intellectual facade, and one gains the impression that the pro-German propaganda used is being co-ordinated by a person of high calibre.

Taken at random, a few items stand out. Certain contributions are published without a by-line and the credit line at the end reads: "Sent to us by a Ritterkreuztraeger [member of the Wehrmacht who received that high German distinction] from Hamburg." This particular credit line is given a poem published by Der Weg under the title "The Watch on the Rhine?" This poem ridicules Montgomery and his suggestion that German soldiers should fight for the West against the Russians. Roughly translated the closing lines of this poem read as follows:

"Field Marshal Montgomery has badly miscalculated himself as never before.

"The 'war criminal' and the 'pig' do not want to be the mercenary of the Victor!

"We German soldiers say: No!

"Be it East or be it West, they should do their own dirty work!"

One recent issue of Der Weg devotes nine full pages to what it calls "The Martyrdom of the Black Caps." This article is an all out defense of the "poor and oppressed" SS troopers who at Malmedy killed American prisoners-of-war. The American prosecution is smeared and the whole article reads as if it had been written by Goebbels.

Another issue of Der Weg contains a poem eulogizing Pan-Germanism that is titled "Prussian Military Oath." Each issue of Der Weg has articles either by A. O. Tittmann or A. J. App, members of the well-known Nazi apologist front in the United States. Tittmann and App glamorize certain American senators like Langer and Wherry. One issue of Der Weg ran an article titled "An American Woman Appeals to the Conscience of America," glorifying Freda Utley and her pro-German book, The High Cost of Vengeance.

Perusing Der Weg one gets the impression, however, that the magazine has one main objective, namely, the defense of the officers and generals of the German Wehrmacht.

One such piece is entitled "The Hate and Lie Campaign Against the German Officers." It strongly criticizes Allied justice with regard to German generals imprisoned in Landsberg. Coming all out in defense of these German officers and generals, the article ends with an especially significant paragraph subtitled "A Question to the World." The writer, H. v. Knevel-Doebritz, obviously a German general, refers to the monument of the American Army of World War I at St. Nazaire, showing an allegoric figure keeping in one hand the cross, in the other the Bible. And he asks: "Can that which the Second World War brought us across the water and across the air from the West be reconciled with the symbols of the cross and the Bible?"

In conclusion, it is interesting to note that the most recent issue of Der Weg available at the time of this writing contains a hysterical answer to Tetens' article referred to earlier. It seems that the group around Der Weg is particularly disturbed about this expose of strange activities, because the answer, a vain effort to refute the attack, is printed not only in German: a footnote states that translations in other languages can be obtained from the publisher, while the English translation has been inserted into the copies of Der Weg destined for North America.

In this connection, it is interesting to learn from an article in the Swiss newspaper Der Bund of Bern that a well-organized outfit was discovered in the small Bavarian town of Kempten whose goal it was to smuggle Germans out of Germany into Argentina. According to the Swiss paper, these smugglers used the most modern transportation techniques for their purpose. The most important person of the gang was a 24-year-old technician, Martin Recher, son of a German teacher. It was thanks to his initiative that a large number of Nazis and German militarists such as General of the Luftwaffe Galland; the constructor of the famous Focke-Wulf-190 planes, Col. Rudel; Prof. Tank; Colonel of the Luftwaffe, Janke; the former gauleiter of Styria, Dr. Siegfried Ueberreither, were able to escape to Argentina.

"Cheering members of the Neo-Nazi German Bloc party in Bavaria . . . heard for the first time a new, 'improved' version of the forbidden 'Deutschland Uber Alles' national anthem.

"Above hysterical cheering, stamping of feet and shouts of 'Heil,' party leader Karl Meissner screamed: 'We are against Nazism, but we intend to adopt many good points which the Nazis had.'

"As the Bavarians, packed tightly in the smoke-filled Bayreuth Concert Hall, struggled to their feet, youthful party leaders distributed leaflets bearing the new text, which was sung to the accompaniment of a brass band.

"And the audience roared out the words:

" 'One aim, one call, unites Germans, regardless of States or new frontiers.

" 'Everywhere that Germans live, even unto the stars, the oath rings out.

" 'Never shall we submit: never shall we bow to forces against us.

" 'Deutschland, Deutschland Uber Alles — the Reich will rise again.'

"The meeting ended uproariously as the cheering hundreds sang their new National Anthem for the second time. . . ."

(From a dispatch to the London Daily Mirror by Kenneth Ames)

The report in the Swiss paper states that Recher, under the very eyes of the American Military Police, established the headquarters of his "human cargo" organization in the winter spa of Oberstdorf. For a whole year the organization worked perfectly.

Those who left Germany secretly were smuggled into Austria and from there to Italy. Usually they embarked in Genoa for Argentina. Where the financial means for these rather expensive activities of the smugglers came, is still a secret. But everything was paid in cash in the monies of the respective countries.

The Nazis and militarists who were able to escape usually took with them not only their families, but also a staff of technicians. Prof. Tank, for instance, traveled with the three technicians with whom he had worked closely for a long time.

It becomes increasingly clear that the headquarters of the future German general staff, comprising not only military experts, but also engineers, technicians, etc. have been quietly established in Argentina. The rallying point of these exiled Nazis and Pan-Germans is Der Weg, and they are all waiting for the moment they can once again start action.

At What Price Integration?

Mr. Robert P. Martin, correspondent for the Overseas News Agency in Japan, reports that Japanese steel interests are most unhappy about their inability to sell steel rails to Communist China. They are peeved at the fact that German industrialists have received permission.

"It's not in Japanese character," Mr. Martin was told by the President of one Japanese steel company, "to demand changes in American policy as the Germans have done."

We are not in a position to psychoanalyze the Japanese character, but we do know that this steel magnate is certainly on the right track insofar as the Germans are concerned.

From time to time we have cited instances where German demands have been transformed into Allied policy. In this connection, a development that bears watching is the present campaign for the economic integration of Western Europe. The Society for the Prevention of World War III has gone on record in favor of genuine integration which "could accomplish much in establishing a healthy economic and political climate under which the people could live without fear." (November-December, 1949, No. 32, Prevent World War III.)

We have recognized that economic integration under certain conditions would bring a measure of prosperity to Europe and strengthen American security. But we have shown that under present conditions the desire for the unity of Western Europe is being exploited by the Germans for purposes which have nothing in common with its praiseworthy objectives.

In our previous discussion of this problem we said: "If all economic restrictions and controls were lifted from present-day Germany, she could easily surpass the industrial power of any of her neighbors. This is the Germany which the Germans and their spokesmen elsewhere recommend as becoming part of a federalized Europe. What harm could result? Well, just put one wolf among a flock of sheep and the answer becomes clear."

Sensing that many of the nations of Western Europe suspect German motives on this score, Chancellor Adenauer decided to be more blunt. On April 3, 1950 he told the American press that Western Europe must be integrated: "I do not mind saying," he declared, "that America should use its power far more with the Europeans who are resisting their own unification." Three days later the New York Times ran an editorial echoing Adenauer's suggested method of bringing about unity. The Times said that the United States might have to "use pressure on the hesitant European governments to speed up the process of unification."

Why the need for pressure if the principle of integration is assumed to be supported by most people in Western Europe? If pressure is the only way to achieve such unity, then there must be something wrong.

Some may say that while castor oil is probably not a very palatable potion, it does a great deal of good once it is taken, even if pressure is required. But can we compare the nations of Western Europe to a bunch of children who just don't know what is good for them?

Adenauer admitted in his same statement to the Press that unity was being held up because "the French really fear the Germans." But is it only the French who fear the Germans? Does Dr. Adenauer think that the English, the Belgians, or the Dutch are waiting with open arms? The real truth of course, is that all of the nations of Western Europe fear the Germans. Nor is this fear an irrational mood which will pass away by the wave of a wand. It stems from generations of living next door to the Germans; of being forced into economic dependence on German industrial might; of being the victims of German aggressions and brutalities. There is hardly a household in Western Europe which has not lost a loved one due to the Germans' embrace. As though Dr. Adenauer is not aware of these facts!

Even such a stalwart of integration as Paul Reynaud, former Premier of France, declared that the unification of Western Europe could eventually result in German domination, without proper safeguards. Dr. Adenauer's reasons for desiring unification are the very same reasons which strike fear in the hearts of Germany's victims. They instinctively feel that German enthusiasm for integration is based on the hope that it will eventually result in Western Europe becoming a vassal to the Lords of the Ruhr. Chancellor Adenauer sensed this too when he scolded his neighbors. He tried to disarm their fears by saying that "Germany is weak and helpless." A weak and helpless Germany, according to Dr. Adenauer, should cause no anxiety among Germany's neighbors.

That sounds like good common political and economic sense. But is Germany weak and helpless? One would not think so judging from the boasts of Ludwig Erhard, the economic brain-truster for the Bonn Government. Erhard has come out for the free convertibility of all currencies including the Deutsche Mark. Aside from the fact that this is a clumsy effort to play up to the Americans, Erhard's proposal would seem to show that the Germans have reached a point in economic strength where they have no fear of convertibility. It must mean that the German economy is fully equipped to support such a plan. Is it not peculiar that a Germany which is supposed to be weak and helpless can undertake such a course of action?

Below the surface it is even clearer that Germany is far from weak and helpless. Her steel production today is at a rate exceeding the limit of 11.1 million metric tons of steel. This feat was accomplished within a very short period. Indeed, the rate of German production is greater than that of France and would overtake the English once the go ahead signal is given. Does this sound like helplessness?

The swift comeback of the German steel industry is reflected in other sectors of the German economy. Recently the International German Electrical Combine issued its financial statement which showed that it was in a very healthy position. In spite of the loss of assets in the Eastern zone, the company disclosed that present assets are very substantial "due to the existence of very extensive hidden reserves amassed before World War II . . ." (New York Times, April 3, 1950). These vast holdings were employed between 1945 and 1948 to set up new factories in nine West German cities.

Foreign and domestic orders are plentiful and guarantee production for a long period of time. The Board of Directors announced that all former obligations to creditors would be met. The strong position of this electrical trust is reflected in stock exchange quotations of its shares which are rising steadily.

Commenting on the position of this company as well as most of German heavy industry, the New York Times said: "Despite the gigantic war losses, most German industrial companies rescued far more than was originally thought possible."

This is not a picture of a Germany which is weak and helpless. Fundamentally, the Germans are in a very strategic position economically, and they hope to forge ahead at the expense of other nations.. Integration under these conditions would be a bonanza for the Germans. When Chancellor Adenauer advocates integration, he is thinking of what advantage Germany can obtain from it. He said that much when he declared that it was not logical that the Germans should have to buy some steel for its reconstruction from France. No, indeed, this is not German logic which has it the other way around—namely that the French and other Western European countries should remain dependent upon the German steel trust as in the past.

This is the German idea of integration, and is diametrically opposed to the unity of Western Europe as conceived by those who want a better distribution of the productive forces of Europe, which would prevent any one nation from dominating the continent.

The power of Germany today has been hidden from public view. Most Americans are still probably under the illusion that Germany is "weak and helpless." But the real truth is coming to the surface. It was described by Mr. James Reston, one of the most able of the New York Times political analysts, on April 26: "It is now recognized in official quarters that the potential economic and military power of Western Germany is so great that it is likely to dominate any purely Western European economic or military organization."

This is the cold fact without the window dressing of the pro-German apologists. It tells what fate awaits those who nibble at the German bait. The Germans have a proverb: "Die groessten Kaelberwaehlen sich den Metzger selber" (The biggest calves select their own butcher.)

NOTE: The above article was written prior to the announcement by French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman of his proposal to pool the coal and steel industries of France and the Ruhr.

Since the information dealing with the Schuman plan is of a general nature, we shall withhold judgment until more details are available. However, there are certain points which have come to the surface which deserve immediate consideration.

For one thing, the attitude of the French people toward this plan is of vital importance. The American press has reported very little as yet on the French reaction. It should be noted that the Foreign Affairs Committee of the French Assembly split 17 to 17 on a test vote over the plan. It remained for the Chairman of the Committee to cast a deciding vote in favor of Schuman's proposal. If this vote is any reflection of French public opinion, it would show that the Schuman plan will meet resistance on the part of substantial sections of the French population—regardless of political ideology.

The fears of the French on this score were even admitted by Monsieur Schuman himself. As reported in The New York Times, Monsieur Schuman stated that because of the "revolutionary" nature of the plan it could come only on French initiative, and that "It would have been fatal if it even had been suspected that the plan originated anywhere but in France."

We know that there are very powerful cartel interests in France which have sought some kind of agreement with their counterparts in Germany. On the other hand, as mentioned in the above editorial and in a previous one, the Germans, too, have been pressing for their brand of integration for many months. Some of the leading Ruhr industrialists who were Hitler's staunchest supporters have been working quietly behind the scenes toward that end. Indeed, during the war, when the Germans occupied France, there was a sort of integration between the German Ruhr and French Lorraine.

Having closely observed the Germans and their activities since the end of the war, we are inclined to believe that the basic principle underlying this plan is of German vintage.

In the article "Whither Western Europe" published in No. 31 (Sept. 1944) of Prevent World War III, the German plan to acquire a substantial share in the Western European steel industry while giving France a share in the German steel industry, was outlined in some detail. In this connection, we should like to point to some comments made by an experienced student of world affairs, Mr. Walter Lippmann. While stating that the American Government should give support to the Schuman plan, Mr. Lippmann made the following comments: "In taking the decision to make the proposal, the French Government must have realized that this meant the revival of the political and economic influence of Germany in Europe. In any such equal industrial regime as the French are offering, the Germans are bound by their technological and administrative gifts and discipline to play a leading part."

He further admitted that "in a Franco-German partnership the Germans will acquire such independent power that they can have a foreign policy of their own." Mr. Lippmann's observations can only confirm our fears that the Allies will repeat the same stupidities which characterized our policies toward Germany after World War I. We will probably be compounding these blunders in view of Mr. Lippmann's own admission that the Schuman proposal will give the Germans a greater opportunity to evade security controls in doing business with the East.

As we stated, these are preliminary observations and must await more detailed information.

Russo-German Alliance would "loom gravely for the rest of the world"

In recent years, we have constantly drawn attention in the pages of Prevent World War III to the growing danger of a new Russo-German alliance. As far back as February, 1945, the Society for the Prevention of World War III issued a blunt warning against the so-called Free German Committee in Moscow. We strongly protested the strange machinations of these German generals and officers and warned that this Free German Committee, sponsored and coddled by the Soviets, was a dangerous omen of what lay in the future.

In 1947, we launched a series of articles in Prevent World War III exposing in detail the use being made by the Russians of former German generals and officers in the Eastern Zone of Germany. In our issue No. 23, January-February, 1948, we ran an article titled "Russia's Trojan Horse." At that time, after a thorough exposé of the facts we came to the conclusion that "there can no longer be any doubt that powerful schools of thought in Russia and Germany favor Russo-German rapprochement."

Since then, in practically every issue of Prevent World War III, we have warned of the steadily growing danger of a new Russo-German pact. We were the first, long before newspapers and magazines began to be interested, to recall the Treaty of Rapallo, and we were also the first to use the term "Rapalloism" to denote the new scheme of a Russo-German alliance that was being fostered.

OUR WARNINGS

Today, the imminent danger of a new Russo-German pact is being realized by almost every informed political observer. When we started to deal with this explosive subject, we were practically alone. It is therefore with a certain amount of satisfaction that we see how today's events bear out our warnings.

The May, 1950, issue of the American Mercury carries an article by Henry C. Wolfe titled "Germany—Time Bomb of Europe."

Writes Mr. Wolfe:

". . . Few Americans realize what is at stake in Germany, but the men in the Kremlin, masters of Realpolitik, do. Since they seized power in 1917, the Soviet leaders have understood the important role that Germany plays in their drive for world domination. They have looked hungrily at German industry, especially in the Ruhr. They have realized that if they had use of the Reich's advanced technology, central strategic position and organizing genius, they could quickly dominate Europe and strike out at other continents. Moreover, the Russians fear German military power, unless it is teamed up with their own. These were some of Stalin's reasons for making a deal with Hitler in 1939.

"As for the Germans, there has been strong pro-Russian sentiment in certain circles since the days of Bismarck. It is sentiment based on stark self-interest—based, in other words, on the premise that when Germans and Russians work together, the Germans prosper and wax powerful. According to pro-Russian Germans, when the Germans have fought the Russians, catastrophe has been the pay-off, and they have two world wars to prove it. They point to the first Rapallo treaty (1922), when the pariah Germans and Russians, meeting on the outskirts of the Allied conference in Genoa, circumvented Allied diplomacy by making a deal between themselves. This move was immensely popular in both Germany and Russia. . . ."

And Mr. Wolfe adds:

". . . Since the end of the war, Stalin has continued his courtship of the German people. He has cast himself in the role of champion of German unity, protector of the Germans against rapacious Western imperialism. Constantly stressing the tradition of Russo-German friendship and common interests, he has told the citizens of the eastern and western zones that Germans and Russians together have 'the largest potentialities in Europe to complete great actions of world significance.' A Russo-German alliance—a third Rapallo—would certainly be an act of world significance. . . ."

MOSCOW-BERLIN AXIS

Other political writers now express the same opinion. Demaree Bess, in a recent issue of The Saturday Evening Post, reported from Berlin that there was "a growing impression that . . . the same Soviet leaders who have made two previously mutually profitable deals with Germany are laying the groundwork for a third deal."

Every shred of evidence shows that the Soviets are relentlessly pursuing their policy in Germany with the definite goal of a third edition of a Moscow-Berlin axis. We have performed a careful job of research on the situation from European sources and herewith present our readers with the following documentation, not yet published by any American paper.

While the men of the Kremlin and their mouthpieces and stooges all over Europe and the rest of the world, as well as in the United States, continuously attack the United States for permitting Nazis in Western Germany, they usually portray the Soviet Zone as thoroughly denazified. The truth is indeed the contrary. Take, as an instance, the huge billboards which the Soviets have erected in the main sections of the Eastern part of Berlin. These billboards contain the following statement in German:

"The leaders of the East German government, which was created as a result of the friendly support of our Soviet allies, appeal to all politically persecuted members of the former National-Socialist movement to return to the German homeland (Heimat) and help rebuild the country from its political and economic ruins. Every German who is being persecuted politically in West German capitalist zones should come to us and he will be received as a friend and a brother."

"PERSECUTED" NAZIS — WELCOME BY SOVIETS

One has to read this proclamation twice to realize fully its outrageous insolence. Mark the invitation: "Every German who is being persecuted politically" in Western Germany is asked to come to the Russian Zone, where he will be received "as a friend and a brother." In other words, all the Nazi criminals who live in Western Germany and feel themselves "persecuted" there will be forgiven their past if they join the Communists in Eastern Germany!

Another sample of this double-faced policy of the Soviets is revealed by what is taking place over the dismantling of German industry. On the one hand, Soviet leaders have been accusing the United States and Great Britain of preserving the German industrial potential in the Ruhr. At the same time, the German Communists under the benevolent sponsorship of the Soviet authorities have been permitted to blast the Western Allies for dismantling German industry! In recent weeks practically every issue of the German Communist press has hysterically blasted Great Britain and the United States for daring to dismantle certain German factories. In screaming headlines the Communist press denounced the Western Allies for ruining German industry, and those saboteurs who tried to hinder Allied dismantling by sabotage were called "German patriots."

DOUBLE-FACED RUSSIAN POLICY

In this connection, it is interesting to note that completely in line with this significant Soviet policy a number of German engineers were recently given the high honor of the so-called Stalin Prize. It is quite significant that these engineers are not nonentities but men in rather important positions. They are Willi Scheid, chief construction officer for technical equipment of the Krupp-Grauson factories; Ewald Eitge, technical director of the Krupp-Grauson factory; Albert Bellwinkel, director of the Polysius factories, and Erich Pfroetzschner, director of the steel and rolling mills in Riesa.

The Taegliche Rundschau, official organ of the Soviet military authorities in Berlin, reported that "the bestowing of Stalin Prizes upon a group of German engineers will be considered a gesture of sympathy from the Soviet Union toward the progressive forces of the new democratic Germany. Once again the public has been given clear proof of the fact that German-Soviet friendship presents not something abstract but a reality of our days which benefits both people, the Germans as well as the Soviets."

In recent weeks the American press has given attention to the Soviet-sponsored mass demonstration by the so-called Free German Youth. According to the Swiss newspaper Der Bund of Bern and of the Sueddeutsche Zeitung of Munich, the Free German Communist Youth already has 2,000,000 members among the children and young people of the Eastern Zone. As many as 36,000 Youth Active groups and 13,000 youth so-called "production actives" are spread over the Eastern Zone. What the future role of this Free German Youth will be is best shown by a statement of its Saxonian chairman, Guenther Knauthahn. According to the Frankfurter Rundschau, Knauthahn, speaking at a meeting of the Free German Youth leadership, declared, "We have to foster in the thinking of our youth a deep hatred of the Western powers and at the same time unlimited love for the Soviet Union."

CARBON COPY OF HITLER YOUTH

Not only is the whole setup of the Free German Communist Youth a carbon copy of the Hitler Youth, but the whole atmosphere surrounding the marching German boys in their new blue shirts is an exact replica of German youth marching under Hitler. And of even greater significance is the fact that the Communist leaders deal with these marching German boys and girls exactly as Hitler dealt with his Nazi girls and boys.

To show their similarity, we present our readers with two excerpts from which they can draw their own conclusions. The text which follows at the left is from the Communist newspaper, Leipziger Volkszeitung of March 5, 1950—and the text at the right is from the Nazi newspaper, Muenchner Neueste Nachrichten of May 2, 1933:

"When the President arrived, he was greeted by the Young Pioneers and members of the Free German Youth with cheers, with a chorus and with gay songs. 'Not East, not West, not North, not South—only a United Germany blooms.' And 'We greet the friend of the youth, Wilhelm Pieck,' the Young Pioneers shouted to the President. He answered them, 'Be ready!' A mother lifted her child towards the President. He took it in his arms and chatted gaily with the surrounding people of Leipzig."

(Communist Leipziger Volkszeitung of March 5, 1950)

"Hitler Youth and Jungvolk who filled the streets in thick rows waited for hours for the Fuehrer. Again and again chorused Heils and the Horst Wessel were heard. Suddenly the band played the Badenweiler march song and the youth started to exult their Fuehrer. His car was surrounded and could advance only at a slow pace. Hitler shook all hands which were extended to him. Mothers lifted their children to his car; he spoke with them and with all young people who surrounded him enthusiastically."

(Nazi Muenchner Neueste Nachrichten of May 2, 1933)

"The 'Free German Youth' is a triumph of Communist creation," writes Tenold Sunde in a dispatch from Berlin to the N. Y. Daily News. "Picking up captured Nazi tools, the Russians have shaped the Nazi Jugend Plan into an instrument which actually rules their area of occupied Germany." The correspondent tells how "banners, drums, torches, fanfare and medals" are being used to enthuse the youth. And he adds: "Without a blush the Russians are even reviving the myth of the German superman. The line about the bright blue-eyed blonde Nordic race is being fed by the Reds to children on their porridge spoons."

THE NATIONAL FRONT

The Free German Youth is only one of the various Communist features copied from the Nazis. Another is the so-called National Front, which appeals to all Germans on the score of unity, notwithstanding their past Nazi affiliations. This National Front is a very clever scheme in which Marxism and Communism are deliberately played down while ultra-nationalism and the slogan of a strong united Germany, so dear to the hearts of all Germans, are played up. Perusing the German newspapers in the Soviet Zone, one finds that the slogans of the national front are being whipped up to the point of almost frantic hysteria.

Significantly enough, former German nationalists, generals and officers and Nazis, are being used by the Russians to stir up the propaganda for the national front. The present Foreign Minister of the Soviet Zone German government, Dertinger is being pushed more and more into the foreground for propaganda purposes of the national front. Landrum Bolling, reporting for the Overseas News Agency, recently emphasized that Dertinger is now appealing "to the Nationalists, the ex-Nazis, the unemployed generals, and discontented Germans across the whole political spectrum to sign up in a pro-Soviet national front."

And Landrum Bolling added:

"In one of his most vigorous appeals to his countrymen the other day, Dertinger promised that if the Germans would join in close friendship with the Soviet Union and the nations which 'rule one-third of the earth,' they would achieve 'greatness, prosperity and freedom.'"

In his dispatch, the correspondent of the Overseas News Agency recalled a conversation which he had with Dertinger at the beginning of 1947, when the present Foreign Minister outlined to him the Soviet strategy for winning Germany and particularly non-Communist Germans. This is what Dertinger then told Bolling:

"The Russians make this argument. They say that Germany had one great statesman, Bismarck, who understood power politics and how to insure the best interests of Germany. The heart of his foreign policy, they remind us, was close friendship with Russia. But Kaiser Wilhelm II stupidly dropped Bismarck and his policies, got involved in war with Russia and brought ruin to Germany. Then during the 1920's there was the Rapallo Agreement between the Soviet Union and Germany under which the two countries got together on many issues, and the Soviet Union helped Germany to rearm secretly. Then came Hitler who scrapped these policies, brought about another war with Russia and even worse ruin. Now, say the Russians, surely the Germans will not be so stupid again. They don't try to sell us Communism, but they insist that economically, politically and militarily Russia and Germany are natural partners and that historical necessity must bring us together."

(Cartoon by Fitzpatrick—Courtesy St. Louis Post Dispatch)

Dertinger, now a puppet of his Soviet masters, once belonged to the ultra-nationalist Stahlhelm movement of Hugenberg and in pre-Hitler days was a member of the Herrenclub and a close friend of Herr von Papen. Everything he says today can be considered an official statement of the Soviets with regard to Germany. In a recent speech in the House of Soviet Culture in Berlin, Dertinger said that the Soviet Union wanted to unify Germany and wanted to see the evacuation of "enemy interventionist troops." He emphasized that friendship with the Soviet Union must be the "cornerstone of German foreign policy."

Thus, a man who not so long ago was a leading member of a nationalistic and reactionary German party and during the Hitler regime played the Nazi card, is being used by the Russians as official spokesman for Soviet policies.

RUSSIAN-BUILT GERMAN ARMY

On the subject of developments leading toward the new Russo-German alliance, it should be recalled that in these pages of Prevent World War III we have long ago exposed the so-called People's Police in the Soviet Zone. These para-military forces, supposedly with police functions, were in our opinion nothing but a scheme for the re-militarization of Eastern Germany by a German Communist military force. All our previous revelations on the character of the so-called people's police are now being confirmed in the daily press. Joseph Alsop, writing to the New York Herald Tribune from Frankfurt, Germany, recently stated: "It is time to realize that this Russian-built German army of the future is no joke or newspaper rumor. The first para-military units appeared, within the larger mass of the ordinary East Zone police, over two years ago. In September, 1949, the para-military parts of the police were separated out, and placed under the command of the famous General Wilhelm Zaisser Gomez of Spanish Civil War fame. These units were then given a purely military character. By now these units 'of the main administration for training' already constitute a respectable militia." After discussing this setup, the New York Herald Tribune columnist adds that "the end result will be a German army of at least eight or ten divisions which should be ready not later than the spring of 1953."

Speaking of Major Bechler, present Minister of the Interior of Brandenburg, who plays an important role in the command of the people's police army, Joseph Alsop emphasizes that he "was once a member of the so-called national Bolshevism wing of the German general staff." And he adds that "in his person the old general staff is coming back to life." Our readers will recall that in our issue No. 23 of January-February, 1948, we were the first to expose the activities of Major Bechler.

HERR DR. OTTO STRASSER

Another scoop of Prevent World War III is now being confirmed by one of the nation's leading newspapers, The Christian Science Monitor. In our issue No. 31, Sept.-Oct., 1949, we revealed that Otto Strasser has started to flirt with the Russians and while advocating an outspokenly hateful attitude towards the Western Allies has cleverly started to endorse certain Russian policies toward Germany. We stated that according to our information "the Russians are said to have been in secret communication with Strasser for some time." And we added that "it would not be surprising if this dangerous ex-Nazi soon might appear in the Russian Zone." In its issue of April 12th, The Christian Science Monitor in a dispatch from Paris titled "Hitler Henchman seen as Kremlin Instrument," writes:

"Otto Strasser, important henchman in Adolf Hitler's climb to power, is now seen moving again into the European picture, this time as an instrument of the Kremlin.

"Despite his being exiled in Canada and not allowed to return to Germany, Dr. Strasser's proved skill as a revolutionary is causing concern among some Western European authorities. . . .

"In his advances to the Russians, as well as in his propaganda among the West Germans, he is said to stress the need for a Russo-German alliance.

"He is also said to extol the virtues of 'National Bolshevism,' which would not be surprising at all, since it was Hitler's refusal in the early 1930's to make good his previous socialistic promises that made Dr. Strasser go into opposition and found the 'Black Front.'

"The Russians seem ready to make all kinds of concessions to draw Dr. Strasser to their side. . . ."

ANOTHER RIBBENTROP-MOLOTOV DEAL?

For careful observers of the German political scene it is not at all surprising that not only a large number of German conservatives and reactionaries recently have started to court the Russians but that outspoken neo-Nazis also see their chance in a new Russo-German pact. The Washington Star, in a recent editorial dealing with resurgent Nazism in Germany, stated that "a conspiracy among certain anti-democratic political elements (is) waiting for the day when they will be able to rearm a new unified Reich and ally it with the Kremlin in another Ribbentrop-Molotov deal, but a deal that will stick."

The same fear was expressed in a recent statement by Senator Guy M. Gillette of Iowa. Speaking of the resurgence of anti-democratic elements in Germany, he stated: "Woven like a black thread through these reports is repeated evidence that some of these elements reemerging in Western Germany have a program of collaboration with the Soviet Union, looking to the day when the Allies withdraw from their occupation of Germany and an independent German state, dominated by enemies of democracy—whether National Bolshevists, Strasser Black Front Nazis, followers of the Haushofer geopolitical school or some other neo-Nazi movement—can proceed to ally itself in a new and fearsome totalitarian Axis with Soviet Russia. . . ."

All these facts prove that the propaganda for a new Russo-German deal is definitely making headway. No doubt, the slogans of the Soviet-sponsored National Front appeal to a great number of former Nazis and to Neo-Nazis, and, in particular, the aggressive propaganda barrage for unification of the Fatherland, for the end of the occupation, and for an early peace treaty.

"HATE AMERICA" CAMPAIGN

Another feature that must enormously please the Neo-Nazis is the almost unbelievable degree to which the Soviets are whipping up anti-American hate propaganda in Germany. It is significant that Ernest Leiser of the Overseas News Agency in a recent dispatch from Berlin stated that the new "Hate America" campaign, "unmatched even by the Nazis in the fury and frequency of its invective, is being waged today by the organizers of Communist propaganda throughout Eastern Germany and in Berlin."

Here is what Ernest Leiser stated:

"(The theme of the "Hate America" campaign) is a simple and insulting one: tell the corrupt Americans to leave the Fatherland and go home. Behind the theme is an ugly threat: if the 'Amis' (Americans) do not comply voluntarily with this demand, the 'might of the workers' will force compliance.

"The new campaign has been brought home most immediately to United States personnel in Berlin by a series of recent incidents. On American cars, on streets or walls in front of American billets, the legend 'Go Home' has been scrawled. Through the mails have come pamphlets tersely making the same demand, some illustrated by a cartoon of a tough German worker shoving aside a 'dissolute' American GI."

A straight line leads from the frantic call for unification of the Fatherland to the hate propaganda against the U. S.; from the Free German Committee in Moscow to the wooing of the Nazi elements by the Russians; from Stalin's famous statement that "the Germans and the Russians have the largest potentialities in Europe to complete great actions of significance," to the promises of a bright outlook if the German joins the Soviet Union.

All these factors, gathered together and projected against the background of Soviet power-policies in Germany, can produce only this conclusion: powerful forces are at work for the establishment of a new Moscow-Berlin axis, and the signing of a new Russo-German alliance. Such an alliance, as Erwin D. Canham recently stated in The Christian Science Monitor, "would certainly loom gravely for the rest of the world." E. T.

"John J. McCloy is the latest gullible to gulp hook, line and swastika the idea of making Germany a full-fledged ally. And U. S. correspondents report that Nazi officers are so certain Germany will soon have an army—they have dusted off their boots for another goose-stepping spree.

"Apparently McCloy never read a historian's classic warning: 'Beware of the German General Staff mentality. They believe that the human race begins with the lieutenant!' "

Hitler's Generals Create a Dangerous Myth

Shall the German army be revived? How often this problem emerges, with its temptations and misgivings, to disconcert Allied policy! Recently it emerged again, when the West German Chancellor, Dr. Adenauer, turned for advice on precisely this subject to Gen. Kurt Manteuffel. General Manteuffel was a tank commander in Hitler's war and is now associated with right-wing nationalist associations of ex-officers. Such associations have often influenced German politics in the past, turning generals into politicians—as they turned Seeckt and Hindenburg, Ludendorff and Schleicher after a previous defeat.

Will it happen again? That such a possibility is thought of was reflected by the United States High Commissioner in Germany, John J. McCloy, in his address at Stuttgart, Germany, when he warned there will be allowed no German army or air force.

It is difficult to read the future, yet there are some interesting hints. In particular, in the last year, Germans have heard a great deal of history concerning the politics of the generals under and against Hitler. The tenor of this history is, of course, that many of the generals weren't really Nazis, that they were, indeed, anti-Nazi.

General Halder, Chief of General Staff from 1938 to 1942, has written a pamphlet on "Hitler as a War Leader" which is said to have sold 100,000 copies on publication; General Hoszbach, who achieved an accidental celebrity by signing the minutes of the famous conference of Nov. 5, 1937, when Hitler announced his full program of aggression, has written a book and a pamphlet on the subject; and now Gen. Hans Speidel, Rommel's chief of staff, has published an interesting account of Rommel's part in the conspiracy against Hitler. Perhaps it is worth while to examine this anti-Nazi myth and ask: Is it history or propaganda?

Not that it is entirely new. In the last days of the war Hitler often used to maintain that the generals had betrayed him. Their minds "fossilized in obsolete traditions," they had resisted his nationalist and "proletarian" movement; they had resisted his strategical plans and sabotaged their tactical execution; they had conspired against his party and his person; and in the end he ascribed his ruin to them. By such statements he hoped to create, among future nationalists, a myth that his victorious radical party had not failed but had been "stabbed in the back" by cowardly conservative generals—just as in 1918 the victorious conservative generals had been "stabbed in the back" by cowardly radical politicians.

If nationalism revives in Germany, there may be a future in this myth. Meanwhile the generals are quite ready to accept it and convert it to their use. It is quite true, they say; they were anti-Nazi; their only regret is that they were unable to stab the party in the back more effectively, and sooner. If the rejection of Hitler by the Germans proves final, it may be this myth that will have the future.

Nor is it entirely mythological. British and American propaganda often represented Junkers and Nazis as being variants of the same form, and treated Nazism as a mere continuation of "Prussian militarism." In fact, they are very different, though the difference was often obscured in Germany as abroad. In recent German history there have been always two traditions struggling for predominance: the Prussian tradition, the tradition of the old General Staff, limited and practical in its aims, cold and rational in its methods, and politically conservative; and the nationalist tradition, the tradition of Southeast Germany, a tradition of unlimited claims, demanding unlimited conquest, mystical, Wagnerian, and—since Hitler—politically radical.

In the period of Hitler's rise to power the generals, thinking that they could control and use him, concealed the opposition of their aims, and so they can hardly blame foreigners for not having detected it. Later, when Hitler controlled and used them, they remembered it, and opposed him. Now that they are building up their claims as consistent anti-Nazis, they discreetly slide over the former period. Their books dwell exclusively on the latter. Let us glance at these books.

First of all, they have certain remarkable common features. All are clear and practical in their style and method. All are conservative in their political outlook, looking back to the Prussian heroes Clausewitz and Frederick the Great for military and political examples. All regard the army (in spite of their own politics in 1932-34) as a nonpolitical corporation concerned only with efficiency and the welfare of its members. All consider Hitler's crimes to be, in politics, his "politicization" of the army after 1937; in morals, his lack of responsibility for the welfare of his men (Hoszbach's pamphlet is actually entitled "On Military Responsibility"); and in strategy, his obstinacy in holding on to indefensible or useless fortresses instead of economizing effort and resources.

Altogether these three books can be regarded as witnesses to the traditional "Prussian" doctrine—in spite of the fact that they set out to justify three generals of whom one, Beck, was a Rhinelander; the second, Halder, is a Bavarian, and the third, Rommel, was a Swabian.

Such is the general character of these books; but if we are to test the theory they advance, we must look at them more closely, and a closer examination reveals certain interesting differences.

First let us look at Hoszbach. Hoszbach's hero is General Beck, who was Chief of General Staff until 1938. In the Beck period the leaders of the German armed forces had a policy which they were convinced was a rational and practical policy —a policy which they expected Hitler to support. Briefly, they wanted to expand the armed forces so as to insure that Germany would no longer be at the mercy of foreign intervention on trivial pretexts; but this expansion was to be both gradual and limited, to insure first, that professional standards should not be swamped, and second, that impractical plans of unlimited conquest should not be devised.

Unfortunately these conditions were not observed. By various maneuvers Hitler "politicized" the army; by over-rapid expansion he destroyed its traditions and professional continuity; then he announced an unpractical policy of unlimited conquest. The army leaders had not anticipated such a policy, and Beck, who was an honest and courageous man, promptly resigned and became, for the next six years, a consistent, indefatigable anti-Nazi conspirator. On the failure of his plot to murder Hitler in July, 1944, he committed suicide.

Had all the generals been Beck, they might indeed claim to have been consistently anti-Nazi. Unfortunately there was only one Beck. On his resignation he was succeeded by Halder.

Halder's pamphlet covers the period of his power, 1938-42. He is concerned with Hitler as a commander. He examines in detail the functions and characteristics of a good commander, asks whether Hitler can qualify for the title, and answers emphatically, no. Hitler, he allows, was an effective war leader, animating and driving the whole military machine, but he lacked the character of a great commander and his principles of strategy were positively disastrous—so disastrous, indeed, that after the enumeration of his successive blunders we are left wondering how Halder was able to serve him so long. He served him until 1942; then he was dismissed, and after the plot of July, 1944, joined other more consistent opponents of the regime in the concentration camp.

Finally we have Rommel. When Halder fell, Rommel was still at the height of his fame, puffed to the whole world as the great Nazi general; it is therefore rather surprising to find him, too, now featuring as an anti-Nazi hero, a general in the old Prussian tradition of Clausewitz. Still, there is no doubt of the facts, which were known from other sources even before Speidel's book gave them in detail.

By the beginning of 1944 Rommel was already in touch with the opposition. When he was entrusted with the defense of Western Europe against invasion he knew that his task was impossible, and said so. If the Allies landed, he said, and were not thrown back into the sea in the first forty-eight hours, all was over, for there was no operational reserve. Unfortunately he was quite unable to convey this view to Hitler. Hitler received Rommel and Rundstedt at Margival in France a fortnight after D-Day, and again twelve days later in Berchtesgaden; but it was no good. Hitler kept them waiting, would not see them alone, refused to accept responsibility, ordered useless fortresses to be held at all costs, promised miraculous new V-weapons, and talked irrelevantly of such other miracles as the death of the Czarina which had extricated Frederick the Great from his similar predicament. Rommel replied by committing himself more deeply to the opposition.

Finally on July 15 he sent Hitler what Dr. Speidel calls an ultimatum—in fact simply an analysis of a hopeless military position ending with the words, "I must beg you immediately to draw the political consequences from this situation." When he had sent it he said to a friend, "I have given him his last chance. If he does not respond, we must act." Two days later Rommel's staff-car was wrecked by raiding British aircraft on a road in Normandy and Rommel disappeared into a hospital. Three days after that Stauffenberg made his attempt on Hitler's life.

When Rommel recovered, all was over. The plot had failed, Rommel's name had been mentioned, and the convalescent field marshal was visited by two loyal generals who invited him out for a drive. Before going, Rommel said to his wife: "In a quarter of an hour I shall be dead. I have had an order from Hitler either to take poison or to face the People's Court." Then he stepped into the car. After a short drive the two generals arrived at a hospital in Ulm and delivered the dead body of the field marshal. He had succumbed to a sudden heart attack, they said, but there was to be no autopsy—everything had already been fixed in Berlin, including a magnificent state funeral and a pompous monumental tombstone for the great soldier "whose heart" (as Rundstedt sycophantically declared) "belonged to the Fuehrer."

Such is the content of these three books. As far as facts are concerned, I am satisfied that it is true. But what about the theory—the theory that the generals as a class were sympathetically opposed to Hitler? The very evidence adduced to support it in fact demolishes it entirely. It is quite true that there is a Prussian tradition incompatible with Nazism—indeed, opposite to it. It is quite true that Beck represented this tradition and that others afterward appealed to it. But the theory that "the generals" represented that tradition is quite untenable. If they had done so they would have resigned with Beck. In fact, as the careers of Halder and Rommel show, they betrayed it.

By 1938 the facts were clear—the Prussian tradition was defeated, Hitler had captured control of the army and was preparing to use it for nationalist adventures. At that point, when Beck logically resigned, Halder undertook to serve Hitler's ambitions, and when Halder went (not by resignation but by dismissal) it was because he disagreed not with Hitler's politics, but with his strategy. Beck rejected Nazism when it was clear that he could not control it. Halder nowhere attacks Nazism, only Hitler; and he attacks Hitler not for his policy of conquest (after all, he accepted office after this had been clearly declared), but for his strategic methods.

The implication of Hoszbach's book is that "the generals" would never have launched Hitler's disastrous war of conquest; the implication of Halder's is that "the generals would have won even that war. Hoszbach implies that "the generals" opposed Hitler's program as wrong; Halder that Hitler, by refusing the cooperation of "the generals," bungled a program which, if successful, would have been right. These two implications neatly cancel each other out.

And what of Rommel? Speidel suggests that if Rommel had been at his post the opposition would have succeeded in destroying Hitler and making peace. He gives no evidence for such a view, and there is good evidence against it. By 1944 most of the generals—even Kluge and Fromm, whose vacillation wrecked the chances of the conspiracy, even Rundstedt, who afterward presided over the Court of Honor which condemned the plotters—opposed Hitler's military strategy, and Rommel can claim no special merit for sharing their views.

Where the generals failed was in political sense, and there is nothing to suggest that Rommel was politically any more determined than the rest. Indeed, the evidence suggests that he had less, not more, political sense. Besides, when and why did Rommel go into opposition? Almost unawares Speidel lets it out. "After El Alamein he first spoke against Hitler's dreams of world conquest." Comment is unnecessary. It was not a difference of political principle that made Rommel a conspirator—it was military defeat.

In fact it was the same with all the generals. Few indeed had any positive political principles. Logically they should have gone into opposition in 1938, like Beck; in fact they hung on, individually surrendering to their new masters. Sometimes they salved their consciences with patriotic slogans, sometimes they remembered their economic needs, sometimes they reflected that perhaps Hitler was reverting to "Prussian" traditions after all, sometimes they maintained that it would

Neo-Nazis Continue to Appeal to the Kremlin

Who is behind Bruno Fricke and his campaign for a new Russo-German alliance? What role does Otto Strasser play in this blackmail campaign?

". . . we will not hesitate for one moment to conclude an alliance with Stalin for the defense of the Fatherland and our people."

". . . The one-sided emphasis of our (the German) attachment to the Occident and of our common cultural and religious achievements has led to the false conclusions that we (Germans) have surrendered for better or for worse to the West. This is not at all the case and it must be said clearly and distinctly!"

In No. 33 of Prevent World War III (January-February, 1950) we presented an article titled "Neo-Nazis Appeal to the Kremlin" in which we drew attention to an "Open Letter to Stalin" published by the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung of Chicago on November 17, 1949. This official organ of the German-American Citizen's League of Illinois is printed partly in English, partly in German and is generally recognized as one of the foremost pro-German mouthpieces in this country.

This "Open Letter to Stalin," which was published under a screaming headline across six columns of the front page, was nothing but an offer of the hand of friendship to Stalin and Soviet Russia. It was an insolent insult to the United States ("We national Germans do not want to have anything to do with the Yankees, with their capitalistic exploitation and their political arrogance. . . .") and an offer to ally forces with Soviet Russia against the Western world. The Open Letter was signed by one Bruno Fricke with no clue to the town or city of its origin. The tone of the letter indicated that it might have been written in Germany by a former Nazi because the very first paragraph stated that the writer was "speaking here as a representative of a great part of my volksgenossen."

In exposing this sensational "Open Letter to Stalin" in Prevent World War III, we were very well aware of the significance of the document and the dangerous repercussions of what may well be considered a trial balloon. We are very glad indeed that our scoop was picked up by newspapers in the United States and in Europe. For instance, the latest report of the "International Committee for the Study of European Questions," whose headquarters are in London and which counts among its directors such well known political personages as Lord Vansittart, Lord Brabazon, Paul Reynaud, Maurice Schuman, etc., quoted extensively from our exposé of the "Open Letter to Stalin" of the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung.

A large number of leading European newspapers mentioned the "Open Letter to Stalin"; The New York Times in its issue of April 2 in a front-page dispatch from London referred to the "Open Letter to Stalin" and to the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung. The Christian Science Monitor of April 12th also ran a front-page dispatch from Paris mentioning the "Open Letter to Stalin" and the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung.

WHO IS BRUNO FRICKE?

When we first published this exposé in Prevent World War III, we knew little about Bruno Fricke, the author of the Open Letter. We have since investigated his identity and now are able to present the following highly interesting information: For more than twenty years Bruno Fricke has been a close collaborator of Otto Strasser. He wrote the preface to the German edition of Strasser's book, Hitler and I, which appeared in 1940 in Buenos Aires. Fricke for a long time was the Argentine representative of Strasser and was chief of Strasser's Free German movement in Argentina. (The organization has since been disbanded.) It is said that Fricke once was a member of the ill-famed Free Corps Rossbach, one of the murderous political gangs which mushroomed in Germany after the First World War.

Carefully comparing the text and wording of Bruno Fricke's "Open Letter to Stalin" with the writings of Otto Strasser, one draws the conclusion that Fricke's writing has very strange similarities with that of Strasser. As a matter of fact, a large number of phrases and expressions are almost identical. For example, both Fricke and Strasser call Adenauer's government the "Hacha government." Both use standard phrases like from "Beuthen to the Saar. . . ."

Another significant fact is that the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung of Chicago, which published the "Open Letter to Stalin," prints articles by Otto Strasser in practically every issue. It seems therefore be disgraceful to oppose the Government in the hour of defeat, sometimes that it would be imprudent to oppose it in the hour of victory.

In the end it was not intellectual consistency but the fact of defeat that brought them all temporarily together.

A more positive legend may yet grow out of these vindications of "the generals" in politics. Nevertheless, I do not think that it will be very significant. Not because it is untrue —for legends, in politics, can often be more effective than truth—but because the persons behind it are in reality unpolitical and divided. Whatever they say now, they were never a party and their politics were ineffective. Their writings now are an apologia for the past, not a program for the future.

almost certain that nobody but Otto Strasser is the instigator of Fricke's "Open Letter to Stalin."

All the pieces of the puzzle fall into place when one recalls that various sources report that Otto Strasser has recently been in secret contact with the Soviets. Having been an oldtime Nazi who broke with Hitler only for personal reasons, Strasser has always been considered an exponent of what is generally called National Bolshevism.

CONTACTS WITH OTTO STRASSER

It seems that the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung maintains close contact with Strasser. It not only prints his articles, but the issue of March 2, 1950, prominently featured on the front page Strasser's appeal to President Truman, written from his present residence in Bridgetown, Nova Scotia, Canada, asking for permission to return to Germany. It would seem that Strasser is using the German-language Chicago newspaper as a platform from which to launch his trial balloons.

In the meantime, Bruno Fricke has written a second article, a kind of follow-up of his "Open Letter to Stalin." This article, too, was published by the Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung, in its issue of April 27. It was titled "Possibilities of German Foreign Policy." In this second article, Fricke refers openly to Otto Strasser's writings. The first part of his article deals in general terms with German-French relations and the European federation. It is an exact replica of the ideas usually expressed by Strasser. What interests us more, however, is the second part of Fricke's article, which is a blatant confirmation of the ideas advanced in the "Open Letter to Stalin."

First, Fricke deplores that the policies of Western Europe for some time now are being made in Washington and that the European nations, including England, have fallen into "almost hopeless dependency upon the United States." Then Fricke adds the following statement:

"Therefore a direct understanding of Germany with North America would remain a political possibility; but, in view of the aversion of the leading circles in New York against such an understanding it is almost out of the question." Then Fricke goes on to tell his readers the nonsense that Bernard Baruch(!), who is pictured as a representative of New York High Finance, looks with great hatred upon the reconstruction of Germany and—"would rather come to terms with Moscow on the spheres of influence in the world than give Germany and Europe even the smallest chance"(!!)

"TOGETHER WITH MOSCOW"

Bruno Fricke then goes on to "explain" why he wrote his "Open Letter to Stalin." Taking the line that he is acting only in the interests of Germany, he tried to "explain" that the Germans have the very same right to ally themselves with Moscow to gain their liberty as the Western allies had when they made a similar alliance with Moscow against Hitler!

Here is a part of Fricke's article literally translated:

STRASSER ADVOCATES "ARMED NEUTRALITY"

As we go to press, our attention is directed to an article by Otto Strasser titled "Europe's Best Chance — Neutrality," published by the Swiss weekly, Die Wochen Zeitung, of Zurich. In this article Otto Strasser bluntly asks, "Does it make any sense for Germany to become the buffer-state for the Western Allies?"

The new line laid down by Strasser coincides with the one advocated by a large number of German politicians and generals—namely, that it would be foolish for the Germans to fight with the Western Allies. Writes Otto Strasser:

"Whatever the men of Bonn might say, a majority of the German people is against participation in a war; the German people are 95 per cent opposed to the role of foreign legionnaires in the interests of the Western Powers! If German officers and men once again take up arms it will be only for the unity and liberty of Germany 'from Aachen to Beuthen, from the Memel to the Saar,' for a Germany that belongs as an equal partner to the West."

In view of the situation, states Otto Strasser, the best solution for Germany would be an "armed neutrality towards Washington as well as toward Moscow!"

Here you have it stated clearly: Germany is to maintain armed neutrality towards the West as well as towards the East, which means that Germany is to be rearmed, but will not participate with either side in a coming war. The conclusion to be drawn is that Germany would arm and be as strong as possible, remain neutral, and in the final and decisive stages of a war could throw herself on the side of the victor. The idea thus sketched is simply that Germany is to wait watchfully and look out only for her own interest. This interest calls for Germany to take a so-called "neutral" position in order to be strong enough to play a decisive role after the two main belligerents have been bled white.

But Otto Strasser goes further: He advocates this policy not only for Germany but for the other Western European powers. He suggests that Germany, France and Spain form some kind of "defensive and offensive alliance" into which Italy, Portugal and the Benelux countries could later enter. This proposal seems to us to be a cloak for the main idea—namely, to suggest a definite line of policy for Germany—which would make Germany eventually a beneficiary of any major conflict.

"We have the same right as the Western world had when it made common cause with Moscow in fighting for the liberty of its peoples against Hitler's oppression. If the West does not grant us our liberty—we will and we want to fight together with Moscow for the liberty of our people against Western oppression. As soon as Stalin believes it opportune to cooperate with a free and sovereign German people (within the borders of 1938) and as soon as the necessary preconditions have been created, we will not hesitate one minute to conclude with him an alliance for the defense of our Fatherland and our people. The one-sided emphasis of our attachment to the Occident and of our common cultural and religious achievements has led to the false conclusions that we Germans have surrendered for bet-

An Unpleasant Task

Webster defines a contradiction as the "status or fact of contradicting each other; logical incompatibility." Judging from the testimony presented to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by Mr. Robert M. Hanes, chief of the ECA mission in Germany, American aims in Germany may properly be characterized as logically incompatible. Yet additional millions have been requested to support this conglomeration of inconsistencies which come under the heading of American policy in Germany.

The American people have suffered defeat in China and billions of the taxpayers' money have been squandered due to the fact that our so-called experts tried to combine the possible with the impossible. Must we now be subjected to a Chinese fiasco in Germany? It is one thing to support a policy which, however incorrect it may be in the long run, is at least honest, purposeful, clear, and consistent. The human mind is far from infallible and allowances can be made for error in judgment. But to pursue actions which are mutually self-contradictory is not even a wrong policy, it is sheer bankruptcy.

We have no doubt that if the average taxpayer had the opportunity to study Mr. Hanes' testimony, he would be outraged at the thought that the ECA could appeal to Congress to support a hodge-podge of conflicting aims in Germany, which have already drained billions out of the United States Treasury. Since it is well-nigh impossible for most people to read and digest Mr. Hanes' testimony, we have decided to extract the most glaring of its contradictions.

1. Mr. Hanes from the outset insisted that German industrial production is still inadequate and inefficient "by American standards." He declared that German industrial production can and should be raised to "at least" 120% of 1936. On the other hand, Mr. Hanes told the Senators that it was the intention of the Allies to prevent Germany from regaining a war potential in her industries.

But the State Department, in one of its earlier publications on U. S. economic policy toward Germany, had this to say about the year 1936: "The reduction (in German productive capacity) from 1936 and 1938 levels will have less effect upon the German consumer . . . because the German economy in those years was heavily geared to war preparations and therefore achieved production totals far higher than would correspond to the standard of consumption actually enjoyed by German citizens" . . . Even in 1936 a great part of German imports was devoted to making armaments and accumulating war reserves."

Notwithstanding, Mr. Hanes urges a 120% increase over 1936, and yet he assures the Senate Committee that Germany's war potential is a thing which must and will be kept down by the Allies.

2. Mr. Hanes tried to convince the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations that the key to German recovery was production. "Above all," he declared, "production must be increased . . ." Mr. Hanes went on to say that Germany must be permitted to trade freely in the world markets and that everything should be done to break down trade barriers between other countries and Germany. In this connection, he told the Senators that the Germans are already producing all sorts of machine tools, printing presses, etc., for the world markets. But when Senator Fulbright observed that the amount being produced was not enough to pay for all of Germany's imports, Mr. Hanes said: "If they could sell it they could still not balance all of the payments; they would not be able to sell what they produce." Senator Fulbright then asked Mr. Hanes if he did not see "any increased tendency to limitation of production on our part, on these sales abroad." Mr. Hanes replied, "I think you also have to take into consideration the safety factor there. I think there would be great repercussions in our country if we let the Germans go full ahead and manufacture steel on any sort of basis and aluminum too."

Thus we have it straight from Mr. Hanes that the key to German recovery is all out production, and on the other hand that all out German production would not only fail to obtain markets to balance existing deficits, but would produce severe repercussions in the United States; therefore, German production must be limited. . . . The confusion continues. . . .

3. Mr. Hanes told the Senate Committee that "we have spent billions of dollars to eradicate Nazism from the world." But when asked whether our Allies still considered Germany to be a danger, he said, "I think they still fear Germany, sir." When one of the Senators inquired whether Mr. Hanes personally believed that Germany constituted a threat to the security of Western Europe, Mr. Hanes answered, "Yes, I think the Ger- ter or for worse to the West. This is not at all the case and it has to be said clearly and distinctly!

"More than ever, and all the more because other supports totter, we will have to rely upon our people and our Fatherland and we all have to think and to act solely as its interest requires!

"A good old proverb says 'Who pays the price can take the bride home!' "

COMMON CAUSE WITH STALIN

These paragraphs need no comment. They speak for themselves. They show what is going on at present in the minds of ex-Nazis, neo-Nazis and ultra-nationalistic and chauvinistic Germans. The ideas expressed in these lines by Bruno Fricke—or rather Otto Strasser—are the typical blackmail of the gangster. The Western Allies are told that they must give the Germans what the Germans want; and if they don't the Germans will not hesitate for a moment to make comon cause with Stalin and Soviet Russia against them!

Some people may say that Strasser, Fricke and their ilk do not speak for all the Germans. This may be true at the present. But we dare not minimize and underestimate the impending danger. Strasser, Fricke and their ilk may not yet speak for the Germans in general. But we do know from experience how easily the Germans are impressed by fanatical rabble-rousers and we know that the Germans can be sold on the idea of this kind of National Bolshevism.

We therefore think that the United States authorities, together with the Canadian officials, ought to keep a careful watch on the activities of Strasser, Fricke and their clique.

mans are a threat."

Now if we have spent billions of dollars to eradicate Nazism, it would seem that the threat of Germany would no longer be a problem to the security of the United States or of Western Europe. But if the threat still remains, then what did those billions of dollars do and where did they go? Mr. Hanes, of course, made no attempt to reconcile these irreconcilables.

4. Mr. Hanes, however, continued to stick to the point that Germany "has a very particular place in the Marshall Plan." He said, "Germany is the crux of the European problem. In order to solve the German as well as the European problem, Western Germany must be tied as closely as possible to Western Europe and must not only be permitted but encouraged to buy and sell in the international markets."

When Senator Lodge asked Mr. Hanes if there was a competitive economy in Germany or whether it was still a "cartel or monopoly proposition," Mr. Hanes retorted: "the cartels are still operating."

No one will deny the need for expansion of trade among nations, but everyone knows that the most deadly enemy of an expanding world market and free trade is the German cartel network. Just how the ECA proposes to weld together the German cartel and American concepts of free trade is something which remains a mystery.

5. The solicitude that the ECA shows for German economic interests is overwhelming. Mr. Hanes told the Senate Committee that "the ECA mission is confident . . . that the near future will see other European nations buying more from Germany which could arrest the existing trend and indeed lead to the reestablishment of a German export surplus with Western Europe." This was his answer to the problem of balancing Germany's exports and imports, thereby relieving the American taxpayers from dumping additional billions of dollars into Germany to meet the deficit.

It is understandable that Mr. Hanes should want to see German trade flourish. After all, this is supposed to be one of ECA's major responsibilities and it would be a credit to it if this were achieved. But at whose expense?

If the key to the solution of Germany's dollar deficit lies in the reestablishment of a German export surplus with Western Europe, who will make up the deficit of the Western European countries which are also dollar starved? Where are these countries going to get the hard cash to satisfy German economic recovery? Everybody knows where these countries have obtained it in the past. If Mr. Hanes' hopes come true, then the United States will be pouring additional billions into Western Europe so as to relieve Germany's dollar deficit. It does not take a student of economics to see that this is a policy of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

As early as January 13, 1949, News From France, published by the French Embassy in the United States, made the following observation: "The present policy of the United States—British military authorities in Germany supported by the American administration of the Marshall Plan—tends to give priority to the recovery of German industry, causes France to fear that in the near future Western Germany, relieved of the need to pay reparations and again in possession of her industrial power, will be in a position to become arbiter of the economic recovery of Western Europe and politically to set East against West and the Allies against each other, according to circumstances, thus nullifying the efforts of the peace-loving nations for the stabilization of the Continent." The fears of our Allies are not at all mollified by ECA's particular concern for German economic interests.

WHERE IS MARSHAL KESSELRING?

According to a copyrighted story on the front page of the Swiss weekly, Die Wochen Zeitung of Zurich (April 26), Nazi Air Marshal Kesselring, who was sentenced to death as a war criminal and whose sentence was later commuted to life-imprisonment, has escaped from Germany and is presently in Spain. According to the Swiss paper, a Britisher, living in Switzerland who recently returned from Madrid, states that he has definitely seen Kesselring in Spain.

"It is not the Nazis I am afraid of this time, it is their progenitors, the three-quarters Nazis, the nice respectable people like (Alfred) Hugenberg who made Hitler. They are all over the country, with their little private circles, making staffs for a political army to come. But this time there are no metaphysics, no philosophy, no ideology, no program. This time they will come as 'practical' men, people who know how to manage things and put them in order."

(From a speech by Carlo Schmid, Socialist leader in Western Germany)

6. Speaking about dollar imports into Germany, Senator Lodge asked Mr. Hanes why the Germans could not obtain some of their cotton and wheat from non-dollar areas. To this Mr. Hanes replied: "Frankly, they have free dollars from the United States. . . ."

Senator Lodge rightfully observed, "that is not giving the American taxpayer a break."

Senator Lodge really hit the nail on the head, and so did Mr. Hanes. The reason American taxpayers have been obliged to hand over billions to the Germans since the end of the war lies in the very fact that the Germans have been assured of these handouts year after year no matter how little they do to earn their own bread and butter. There is no incentive on their part to earn their own way, when Uncle Sam stands ready to provide them with every little thing they need. That is why the American taxpayers are not getting a break.

We could go on discussing ECA's policies on Germany, but we think the above gems are sufficient to show that what is called American policy in Germany today is nothing more than a maze of contradictions and inconsistencies which the American taxpayers have subsidized to an estimated amount of close to $6,000,000,000 since V-Day. In other words, out of the $24,000,000,000 which the American people have given to the world since the end of the war, the Germans have received about 25 percent. This is the result of what is now called America's policy in Germany.

Only when the Germans are taken off the backs of the American taxpayers and told to work out their own destiny, will we have a real policy and will it work.

DEMOCRATIZING GERMANY

From an article by Joseph Mire in the "ADA World":

"In 1935, a certain Dr. Hans Globke published in Munich a commentary on the new German racial laws. These laws, Dr. Globke explained approvingly, 'mean a renunciation of the liberalistic idea of the equality of human beings. . . . A nation can flourish only if the leadership is entrusted to the elite. . . . Only those of German blood can be citizens.' For the unfortunate and unhappy victims of Nazi Germany's racial legislation, Dr. Globke had this comforting thought: 'They should have chosen their parents more carefully.'

"Today, this same Dr. Globke is head of the personnel office for German government of Western Germany. . . ."

GERMAN DUMPING

Michael L. Hoffman in a dispatch to "The New York Times" from The Hague:

"The Netherlanders have a strong suspicion that German manufacturers are dumping industrial products in the export markets.

"The Government is keeping a close eye on the evidence coming in from Netherland and other business agencies concerning German prices. It gets an increasing number of reports that German companies are offering prices 30, 40 and even 50 per cent below their competitors under circumstances in which the Germans could not possibly have that much cost advantage. . . ."

The "Frankfurter Rundschau," a vigorous and independent newspaper, carried a Hamburg dispatch at the top of its front page, under a bold headline: "Anti-Semitic Demonstrations in Harlan Trial"; "Onlookers Threaten Woman Witness and Reporter." It told in meticulous detail of an outburst in the trial of Veit Harlan, Nazi producer of the Hitler-time propaganda film, "Jew Suess," for crimes against humanity. More than 100 spectators at the trial broke into an uproar during a verbal attack on Harlan by a half-Jewish witness. After the hearing ended, they threatened and insulted the witness outside the court, shouting, "Jewish pig! What are you doing here in Germany? We don't want you. Go away!"

IMPERTINENCE . . .

The ONA reports from Germany that "it is safe to say that impertinence and irresponsibility from top German officials themselves finally 'got under Mr. McCloy's skin.'" That was clearly shown when McCloy became frankly angry when Wuerttemberg-Baden's Minister, President Reinhold Maier, contemptuously defied the Americans in stating that "We (Germans) want nothing more to do with school"—meaning Allied instruction!

"TOO FEW JEWS WERE KILLED"

From a newspaper dispatch datelined Munich:

"Police in the Bavarian town of Groebenzell have seized some 50 posters declaring that Too Few Jews Have Been Killed, it was reported here today.

"The local police investigation, begun after the intervention of Bavarian Commissioner for Persecutees Philip Auerbach, has revealed that the town's mayor, ex-Nazi Richard Sturm, is implicated in the affair. . . ."

ADENAUER'S TRUE FACE

From a dispatch by Ernest Leiser to the Overseas News Agency:

". . . Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, according to a number of his own advisers, is absolutely determined to press for a relaxation of United States, British and French controls over German Federal policy, especially foreign policy. To achieve that end . . . he has demonstrated his readiness to denounce the Allies, hint at German defection from the Western community, hint at resignation. He has shown a cold anger at Allied restrictions and a defiance of Allied disapproval of his actions to achieve wider sovereignty. . . ."

WILLFUL SLANDER

From an AP dispatch from Frankfurt, Germany, published in the "Chicago Tribune":

"The German weekly, 'Gerichtszeitung,' was suspended . . . for one month by the Allied high commission. The announcement said the weekly printed a 'completely unsubstantiated' report of 'alleged atrocities committed against German prisoners of war in France during 1945-46.' The article 'must be regarded as a willful slander which can only serve to prejudice the prestige and security of the Allied powers,' it added. . . ."

SMEARS AND LIES

This is how the editorial writer of the infamous "Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger-Zeitung" of Chicago who signs himself Politicus blasts our French Allies:

". . . There is another country which joined the war against Germany, and which country uses, as an excuse of her steal of German soil, that Germany made war on her three times since 1870. That this is a false lie is known by anybody who knows history. The war of 1870-71 was brought on by Napoleon, the French kaiser, who needed a war to strengthen his wobbly throne. In the first as well as the second world war, France had no reason for warring against Germany. Her joining the others resulted only from a desire to gain something at Germany's expense — something which France has done thru the centuries. She stole Alsace-Lorraine from Germany when the latter country was too weak to resist powerful France, and she has acted that way ever since. Luck, so far, has been with her. In 1871, Germany proved to be a very mild victor and permitted France to rise again swiftly. . . ."

ATTACKS AGAINST AMERICANS

From a dispatch by Ernest Leiser from Frankfurt to the Overseas News Agency:

"A noticeable increase in physical attacks on United States personnel throughout the United States occupation zone by Germans has been recorded by U. S. Military Police officials. . . .

"It was, in fact, only after the numbness of defeat had long worn off and the Germans were growing again in prosperity and self-assertion—both fostered by the United States—that any attacks on American military and civilian personnel become noticeable. . . .

"In recent months, the number of 'incidents' of this kind recorded by Army Criminal Investigation agents has mounted noticeably. Scarcely a day passes without some report of assault somewhere in the United States zone. . . ."

SOVIET DUPLICITY

From a Berlin dispatch in the German newspaper, "Rhein Neckar-Zeitung" of Heidelberg:

"The chief of the Politburo of the SED, Socialist Unity Party, in Berlin, Herr Dahlem, stated at a meeting that the Communist-sponsored National Front should also comprise the right-wing radical groups in Western Germany. In his opinion, all former German generals in the Soviet Zone should—and he emphasized that this was the particular wish of Moscow—try to establish a 'fruitful cooperation with the Nationalist groups in Western Germany.' He added that for this purpose Moscow is ready to put Westmark money of any amount at their disposal. Significantly, at this meeting of the Politburo of the SED the former Free German Committee Generals Lattmann, Wulz, Korfes and Ulex participated."

NAZI CRIMINALS ACQUITTED

From Munich, Germany, it is reported:

"A German civil court acquitted Col. Oswald Schaeffer, former chief of the Gestapo in Munich of charges of crimes against humanity. Also cleared with Col. Schaeffer was his assistant, Dr. Richard Lebkuechner. Both were released immediately.

"The validity of the Allied occupation statute providing for the punishment of persons guilty of crimes against humanity is currently being challenged by German attorneys for four Nazis convicted on this charge. The defense has carried the case to the highest German court in the British zone, arguing that the occupation status is invalid since the appearance of the West German Constitution. The case has aroused great interest. . . ."

THE NEW GERMAN ARMY

Kathleen McLaughlin in a dispatch to "The New York Times" from Berlin:

"Two youthful members of the so-called 'people's police' of the Soviet zone were found guilty in the Lichterfelde Military Government Court of being members of a para-military unit.

"The defendants, Wilhelm Roloff and Heinz Erich Nocht, were arrested in the Neukoeln section of the United States sector of Berlin. With six companions, all in 'people's police' uniforms, they were riding in a truck in which were found an assault rifle and ten pistols plus ammunition. . . .

"During night training the 'people's police' carried such weapons as carbines, light machineguns, heavy machineguns, and grenade throwers, Herr Roloff said.

"Herr Nocht said that in his circle of acquaintances there was generally known to be at least thirty-six 'alert' units. The total strength of each unit is between 800 and 1,000 men, he declared. . . .

"The instructors are German and Russian officers."

ANTI-ALLIED HATE BOOK

Dr. Austin J. App's anti-Allied smear book, "History's Most Terrifying Peace," which represents an outward apology for Nazi crimes, has been translated into German by E. J. Reichenberger and is supposed to be released shortly by an Austrian publishing house. As reported in the German-language newspaper, "Nord Amerika" of Philadelphia, advance orders should be addressed to the Veritas Verlag, Munich 9, Postbox. The question arises why the Allied occupation authorities should permit the publication in Germany of such a pro-Nazi biased, anti-Allied hate book.

"A systematic attempt to glorify the military men who served Hitler is under way in Germany with a 'Rommel Myth' as its main emphasis. . . . No less than six prominent publications—including the British-supervised newspaper, Die Welt — have been running series of articles on the exploits of the late Nazi Field Marshal Erwin Rommel. . . .

"The leading flier in Hermann Goering's Luftwaffe, former Maj. Gen. Hans Ulrich Rudel, is being similarly and extravagantly described in two leading magazines, 'Die Strasse' and 'Der Stern.' The latter, narrating his exploits in shooting down Allied airmen, asks editorially if 'this is not the kind of man we need to help reconstruct Germany.' It then proceeds to tell proudly of the part he is playing today in building up the Argentine Air Force, along with his brother officers.

"Then, in recent weeks, there has been a rash of articles glorifying the 'Iron Chancellor' of imperial days, Bismarck. A public-opinion poll which listed the Prussian militarist as the greatest man Germany has produced has been followed by a series of newspaper and magazine profiles.

"On the other hand, a number of publications of the 'new press' — that which has sprung up since the end of licensing—have ventured as close to the borderline of outright neo-Nazism or militarism as they dared.

"Perhaps the most blatant of such new publications in its appeals to authoritarianism has been the Deutsche Reichzeitung, newspaper of the near-Nazi 'Socialist Reichs Party.' Run by Gerhard Krueger, onetime assistant editor of the Nazi organ Voelkischer Beobachter, it calls for a 'united Socialist' Reich on the Nazi pattern, but 'without its excesses.' "

(Ernest Leiser in a dispatch to ONA)

LIKE FATHER, LIKE SON

From an AP dispatch from Frankfort:

"Anti-Jewish posters appeared in the Frankfort suburb of Offenbach today. At the same time investigators found signs of Nazism in the recent desecration of a Jewish cemetery in Frankfort.

"Police blamed small boys for this previous incident. Today police reported to United States officials that the boys' fathers were members of the Nazi party for many years."

NAZI PROPAGANDISTS

"The Veterans of Foreign Wars have protested that the Justice Dept. has allowed five German nationals, who worked for the Nazi Radio Berlin throughout the war, to remain in this country and take jobs, contrary to U. S. immigration laws. . . .

"The VFW declared that the Germans have stayed here, long after expiration of their temporary visas, to work for a recording company which is doing 'special work' for the Justice Dept. As a result, one veteran employed by the company was fired.

"The five Germans were brought here in 1949 to testify in the treason trials of Mildred Gillars ('Axis Sally') and Herbert J. Burgman.

"The Germans are Mary Ann Heilbecker, Ilsa Hoffman, Runi Noback, Paul Noback, and Elizabeth Schulz. Their testimony at the treason trials was to identify the defendants as having made broadcasts, records of which were presented as evidence. . . ."

"WE WILL NEVER PAY IT BACK"

Jack Raymond in the N. Y. Times:

"An elite state under Prussian leadership modeled after Mussolini's corporate state and existing in a Europe unified through war if necessary—is the goal of the Socialist Reich party, Dr. Fritz Dorls, its leader, explained in an interview. . . .

"Dr. Dorls is a member of the Bundestag. He holds the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in History. He was a non-commisisoned officer in the Wehrmacht. And, he emphasized, 'I was a Nazi party member from 1929 to the very end—to the very end!' . . .

"Appealing to youth, the party offers the magic words, 'Socialist' and 'Reich,' in its title, and a bona fied Nazi hero—Maj. Gen. Otto Ernst Remer, the man who is said to have foiled the July 20, 1944, plot against Hitler—among its leaders. . . .

"The credo of Dr. Dorls is 'action.'

"His slant on history is that Hitler sought to unify Europe. Even if that meant war, it was a better concept than 'the criminal chaos caused by Roosevelt,' he said. . . .

" 'The development of the cold war must inevitably lead to the hot war,' he continued. 'However, at the critical point, the Americans must get out of Europe, the Russians too.'

" 'However, German neutralization is not enough. A German Reich is required, and to it must belong all those peoples with the natural right to be Germans. One cannot wipe out the history of a thousand years. This may mean at first the boundaries of 1938, but the Sudetenlanders should be given an opportunity to decide in a plebiscite.

" 'As for the present situation, so long as there is chaos there is no political conception. The Russians have that, having established order on their side. The Americans have none. All the money pumped in by the Marshall Plan is wasted. It results in nothing. We will never pay it back!' . . ."

"FUNNEL FOR WAR MATERIALS"

From an AP dispatch from Frankfurt, Germany:

"Western officials said today that West Germany had become a funnel for war materials smuggled into Communist satellite states.

"Soviet Russia is believed masterminding the war shipments through deals with private firms and international gangs. The war goods are bought in some West European countries and in West Germany, the officials asserted.

"Allied regulations strictly forbid shipments of war materials or strategic items to the Eastern countries except under license. But authorities recently have confiscated airplane parts, bomb cases, ammunition carriers and other war materials en route illegally to the East. . . ."

A COMIC OPERA

From a dispatch by Michael James from Stuttgart, Germany to the New York Times:

"A one-year sentence, another of eight months and an acquittal brought the denazification scandal trial in Stuttgart to an inconclusive end. It is quite likely that the Office of the High Commissioner will force a retrial on the ground that the hearings were improperly conducted. . . .

"The trial grew out of charges made last winter that the denazification proceedings in the state of Wuerttemberg-Baden were corrupt. . . .

"Eventually, formal indictments were prepared against Heinz May, former chief prosecutor of the state's denazification court, August Meyer, a lawyer and alleged general 'fixer,' and Richard Kessler, one of the court's past presidents. The charge was criminal bribery.

"The court sentenced Herr May to one year, Herr Meyer to eight months and acquitted Herr Kessler. . . . United States officials do feel that the trial was virtually a comic opera. . . .

"In an open letter published in a local paper, Ernst Mayer, a member of the Bundestag, charged Major General Charles P. Gross, U. S. Commissioner for Wuerttemberg-Baden, with considering Germans as sheep that easily could be led hither and yon.

"General Gross' reply was curt:

" 'I erred,' he said. 'The Germans are not sheep. They will not be led to democracy.' . . ."

FROM A NEWSPAPER dispatch from Vienna, Austria:

The Vienna Jewish community received a letter stating that Nazi groups in Austria "will not rest until the last Jew is hanged."

The letter was signed, "S.S. Organization," the former Nazi Elite group. It was accompanied with original photos showing the execution of Polish Jews by Nazi units.

On Wooing the Germans

by
Max Lerner

The beginning of wisdom, in thinking about the current phase of the German problem, is to understand that things are not what they seem and the dreariest skim milk often masquerades as cream.

In foreign policy, said Machiavelli, there is the method of force and the method of fraud—the way of the lion and the way of the fox. "Those that have been best able to imitate the fox," he wrote, "have succeeded best. But it is necessary to be able to disguise this character well, and to be a great feigner and dissembler; and men are so simple and so ready to obey present necessities, that one who deceives will always find those who allow themselves to be deceived."

The truth of this dissection of the anatomy of fraud by the great Florentine is being pounded home to us by every dispatch from Europe about the German problem.

Take for example, the Bidault proposal for a European coal-and-steel pool. On its face this looks like a progressive development, a recognition that nations cannot live by themselves and that Europe must become a going concern economically before its efforts at political union can have any real meaning.

The pretense that the coal-steel pool is open to all European nations is a veil so transparent that even a bump-and-grind artist of the burlesque circuit wouldn't dare drape herself in it. Ostensibly it means that even the Iron Curtain countries will be allowed to take part. But no East-European country will risk changing from a satellite of Russia to a satellite of the Ruhr. If there is to be genuine economic peace between West and East Europe, let it start through the trade-resumption which Gunnar Myrdal is now urging in his visit to Moscow.

The second lump is the fact of German industrial power. The coal-steel pool proposal is being formally made by the French. Actually there is a "happy coincidence" (the phrase is Dr. Adenauer's) between it and Adenauer's own earlier talk of a French-German union.

Why should not the Germans delight in it? The industrial power of the Ruhr is the biggest fact in European economic life. In any kind of pool it will stand out as the strongest unit. Hitler's dream of establishing a thousand-year hegemony over Europe was a military dream, but it had an economic base. The Nazi military dream is suspended, but the economic dream goes marching on.

This is the cancer of the coal-steel pool idea. Its result is bound to be the re-assertion of German industrial power (in alliance with American financial power) over Western Europe. It is also the cancer of most of the schemes for "integrating" Germany into some West-European plan. The question always is: What will be integrated into what? Will German power be integrated into Western Europe, or will Western Europe be integrated into German power?

Finally there is the question of class controls inside the proposed pool. Outwardly the idea seems to be to have "international" controls. But for several years there has been a paper scheme for international control of the heavy industry of the Ruhr, and the fact is that the paper scheme has never moved off the paper. Inevitably the representatives of each country will represent the actual economic power-groups.

In Germany the control of steel and coal is still in the hands of the cartel-barons. All the milk-and-water American decartelization-plans have not changed that. German dominance in the new international pool would therefore mean the dominance of the German cartelists.

There are also French industry-and-finance groups who have for several years been striving behind the diplomatic scenes to achieve a French-German union. By joint action with their German brothers they would now with international blessing not only increase their take but also their own power inside France, and thus the power of reaction.

Thus the wooing of the Germans moves into another phase. The way of the fox is very clever, but sometimes it ends in foxholes.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir:

"During the last few months I have come across your worthy journal, Prevent World War III, and I am writing this communication to acknowledge the significance and the importance of your publication, especially in resisting the rebirth of a strong imperialistic Germany that would threaten global catastrophe. . . .

"I wish to express my gratitude and appreciation for your magazine, and I should like to become a sponsor of your society. . . ."

DAVID NAIMARK
Detroit, Michigan

Dear Sir:

"I have to thank you for your publication No. 31 for September-October, 1949, which has been forwarded on to me from my previous address in Germany.

"As I am most interested in your work, I will be much obliged if you will kindly take note of my present address. . . ."

H. C. HIGGINSON
London, England

Dear Sir:

"I recently came across a copy of your publication and was very much interested in the very many facts it contained. Up to now I was of the opinion that people in the USA did not know what was going on in Germany, for if they did know I am sure they would never lend their support to drag democracy through the mud, like it is being done. It is a very grave mistake that too many fellow men and women do not see an ever growing threat in the Germany of today. In trying to build up Germany these persons are assisting a return of those Germans who through their acts brought Germany to ruin and starvation. Germans like von Schroeder, Hugenberg, Willmy and Pferdmenges (who has just been appointed a delegate of the CDU to the Bundestag) are not only the brains behind Parliament, they are an ever-growing threat to the democratic development in Western Germany. Most Germans have never heard of the last named men; they have therefore no idea what power these men wield and possess. . . .

"I have been here for almost four years. The longer I remain in Germany, the more convinced I become that Germany with its different political parties who pretend to be democratic will never become a truly democratic nation. In any case, if Germany does not show further effort to become democratic it does not deserve a place amongst the other nations. In Germany there will never be a truly democratic spirit because it is not in the interest of certain leaders here. Perhaps in a few decades the German people will turn to democracy, but not as long as any uniformed civilian can arouse the masses against any minority, or the plain policemen exert their small powers and act as Gods and not as servants of the people. . . ."

O. W.
Heidelberg, Germany

Dear Sir:

"As a veteran of the recent war I have a more than academic interest in the problems and issues dealt with by groups such as yours.

"The present drift of events in both occupied Germany and Japan are properly a subject of concern to thinking people, if not that of a curiously indifferent press and allegedly responsible organs of our government.

"It is to be hoped that your society will keep these areas and their shadowy desperado elements whom so large a part of this world can thank for its lamentable condition, subjected to the full glare of publicity, a task seemingly beyond the competence of the accepted media of public enlightenment. . . ."

AUSTIN MURRAY
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir:

"The policy of your publication should have the wholehearted support of the American people. Your ideals and principles are those of a true liberal.

"In my opinion and the opinion of others the State Department, the industrialists, and the military leaders of our policy in Germany are creating in that country, a Frankenstein which will some day descend upon its creators and destroy civilization as we know it today. In its place will be substituted the militaristic and nationalistic spirit of Germany.

"The American people must be aroused to the policy which is being fostered for the benefit of a few rapacious industrialists in America and Germany. We must stop the architects of a Third World War.

"Only through educating the American people as to the true policy and ultimate goal of the American officials in Germany can the prevention of a Third World War succeed."

HERBERT FRIEDMAN
Appleton, Wisconsin

Dear Sir:

"I have been receiving your literature for over a year now and think you are definitely on the right track with your fear of rising German nationalism. I work in a Melbourne newspaper office and others here read your magazine when I've finished with it and agree that it is very timely."

L. A. HUTCHINSON

Dear Sir:

"You have been writing a great deal about what happens in Nazi Deutschland. From the little I see, some elements would like the USA to soon become an Anglo-Saxon-Germanic Deutschland. I believe this country should have a proper defense setup, but it goes too far when they kiss the posteriors of Nazis just to spite the Russians. . . ."

MARY D.
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir:

". . . I have now left Germany after having spent a most unusually interesting three years. During that time I was in executive charge of all disarmament operations in Schleswig Holstein both in industrial and latterly service aspects. My work also took me to the Russian, French and American Zones of occupation and afforded an unusual opportunity to study the upsurge of military action in Germany and their methods of expressing themselves in this sense.

"The overwhelming impression I have brought back with me is one of complete lack of comprehension of their responsibility toward the last war with its malpractices which they carried out. I am convinced that the history of the years after the 1914 to 1918 war are repeating themselves with remarkable faithfulness and the outlook as far as Germany's relations with the rest of Europe are concerned, is one full of foreboding.

"I am grateful to you for your publication and would appreciate more of the excellent reprints and leaflets which I would like to hand out to friends. . . ."

Formerly managing editor of the Beverly Hills, California, Bulletin, a semiweekly publication, I came to Europe some 17 months ago, working as a journalist and teacher in Sweden for one year. Since arriving in Berlin in August, I have developed an intense interest in what I see here in Germany . . . regrowth of neo-Nazi, anti-democratic ideas . . . Frankfurt Am Main, Germany

Dear Sir:

"As one of those who actively participated in the Nurnberg Trial against Alfred Krupp and others, I wish to submit the following observations on the occasion of the recent death of Dr. Gustav Krupp. Prominent among the atrocity stories spread with a view to smearing the American post armistice record is the scurrilous allegation that Alfred Krupp was not indicted or convicted in Nurnberg for his individual guilt, but as scapegoat, as it were, of his father, Gustav. The source of such gross misrepresentations of fact is usually to be found in circles antagonistic to this country. It is so much more regrettable that some of them are gullibly taken over by writers whose honest intentions and good faith it is not desired to challenge in spite of a sometimes shocking degree of negligence in critical evaluation of second-hand stories. Freda Utley, a British born American citizen, in her 'The High Cost of Vengeance' (p. 179) among other things states: 'The fact that Alfred Krupp was indicted and

Why?

WHY were Col. Oswald Schaefer, former Gestapo chief, and his assistant, Richard Lebkuechner, acquitted by a German court despite the fact that they had personally murdered twenty European slave laborers?

WHY is Lydia Joan McBride, the Berlin-born Los Angeles girl who served a four-year sentence for helping a German war prisoner escape, being paroled?

WHY have the American papers failed to report the speech of Adolph von Thadden, member of the Bundestag and Deputy of the Deutsche Reichspartei, who at a recent meeting in Leer, Lower Saxony, stated, "Whatever will be said against the Third Reich, it is certain that something had been achieved; it would be sheer stupidity to deny what was good, only because these things were created by people who are nowadays out of favor?"

WHY is the U. S. High Commissioner in Germany not checking the activities of former SA leader and old-time Nazi Capt. Walter Stennes, who after his recent return from China resides now in Bonn where, according to reports, he plans the formation of a new "Frei Corps"?

WHY has the BONN government seen fit to permit 14 former Nazis among the 31 senior members of the new embryo foreign service?

WHY has the U. S. High Commission in Germany permitted the press in Western Germany to launch a campaign against the "inhuman" and "brutal" conduct of U. S. soldiers garrisoned in the American Zone?

WHY don't we learn who is behind the "Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung" and its recent editorial campaign for a direct agreement between Germany and Russia?

WHY aren't we given the names of those Western German industrialists who, according to members of the staff of John J. McCloy, have in recent weeks shown a great deal of interest in developing or restoring trade contacts with the East?

WHY do 94 of the 106 newspapers permitted by the U. S. authorities in Western Germany have the same name they had under the Third Reich, although in France and other Western European countries the names of those papers which cooperated with the Nazis had to be changed?

WHY did the "New York Staats-Zeitung," in commenting on Professor George N. Shuster's nomination as U. S. Commissioner for Bavaria, call his book, "Strong Man Rules," an anti-Hitler book despite the fact that it contained parts which were full of admiration for the late Fuehrer?

WHY is the U. S. government not making some decisive move to counter-balance the fantastic "Hate-America" campaign waged by the Russians against the United States, which according to Ernest Leiser is "unmatched even by the Nazis in the fury and frequency of its invective"?

WHY have the American papers failed to report that a number of high-ranking German engineers and directors of the Krupp Works and other steel plants in Eastern Germany were given the Stalin Prize for their achievements?

WHY did the "Deutsch-Amerikanische Buerger Zeitung" of Chicago call the Soviet atom spy Klaus Fuchs a German Jew, despite the fact that the spy is the son of a Protestant minister?

". . . Recently I passed a half hour with John J. McCloy, our High Commissioner for Germany. He frankly admitted he was not an expert on Germany but he said he thought the greatest dangers to the fledgling Bonn republic came from the extreme right and the extreme left.

"I suggested to him that they might soon be lumped together.

"Short-sightedly, the big industrialists, the unemployed Wehrmacht generals and the disgruntled nationalists feel that they would be the dominant partners in any Soviet-German entente. . . ."

sentenced for his father's crimes makes these trials seem designed to punish a class, not individual guilt.'

"It is true that in the first Nurnberg Trial (against Hermann Goering and others) Gustav Krupp (the father) was originally one of the defendants but could not be tried on account of his physical unfitness for trial. It is also true that members of the prosecution, including the American one, but not including the British one, attempted to substitute Alfred Krupp (the son) as a defendant which attempt, however, proved abortive since the International Military Tribunal did not allow this substitution. It is finally true that after the termination of that first trial, Alfred Krupp became the main defendant in one of the twelve so-called subsequent Nurnberg trials. From these facts, there is a far cry to the conclusion that the son was indicted for the guilt of his father.

"As a matter of fact, neither the attempt in the first trial to substitute Alfred as a defendant nor his indictment in the subsequent trial was in the least based upon that scapegoat idea. Rather, the purpose was to make him responsible for his individual guilt in connection with facts part of which had warranted the previous indictment of his father. It must be pointed out that Gustav Krupp, in view of his ill health, had long before the armistice withdrawn from any active influence upon the management of the Krupp firm whose sole owner and boss Alfred had become as early as December, 1943. Even before, Alfred had climbed up to a top position in the management of the theretofore existing Krupp corporation. It is for his individual responsibility concerning crimes committed during the periods of his either ownership or participation in the top management of the firm that Alfred was indicted and convicted in the subsequent trial and would have been taken to account in the first trial, had the tribunal allowed the proposed substitution.

"It has rightly been said: 'A man convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still.' Neo-nationalistic German circles will continue to feed on the atrocity story of the son serving as scapegoat for his father rather than to admit its being exploded by the true facts. There is, however, no need for anybody in the U. S. to fall victim to such hostile propaganda. The record of the Krupp trial speaks for itself and should be examined before publication of statements which are belied by it."

Dear Sir:

"Everyone who is interested in maintaining the peace must commend you for your vigorous protest in the German dismantling issue.

"It seems to us, former German people, who not only went through the Nazi barbarism but are familiar with the policies of deceit and mendacity of former German governments toward the victors of World War I, that the American politicians didn't learn anything about this matter regarding the security of Europe and the world. It is a bad sign that Nazi-friends in this country, in Congress and press (O'Donnell, etc.), seem to have strong influence with certain Government circles and on their policies regarding the German problem. Nobody can be in doubt about the outcome of the attitude of the present American policy toward Germany. And therefore it is to be hoped that also your voice will be loud enough to be heard in Washington. . . ."

Neo-Naziism: Unfinished Business

By ERNEST S. PISKO, Special Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

To remind him of unfinished business of the previous war, Xerxes, King of Persia, had a "remembrance slave." The Roman Senate, for the same purpose, had Marcus Porcius Cato. And we have the Society for the Prevention of World War III.

Xerxes' slave had to tell his master after every meal, "Sire, remember the Athenians."

Cato, whenever he spoke in the Senate, concluded his remarks by saying: "And, besides, I hold that Carthage must be destroyed."

The Society for the Prevention of World War III sounds the warning every second month: "Watch what the Nazis are doing." In its bimonthly magazine the society is keeping track of the doings of former Nazis in Germany and of the rise of new potentially Nazi-like movements there.

The March-April issue of the magazine carried a tabulation of the neo-Nazi parties that presently "are mushrooming all over West Germany."

10 Parties Listed

The table, reprinted from the Stuttgarter Nachrichten, gives the names of 10 "Neo-Nazi Parties of Today," together with the date of foundation, name of founders, and the regions where they are active. It further contains data on the number of parliamentary seats of the various parties, the names of their periodical publications, cross-connections with like-minded personalities or organizations, and splinter groups.

Perhaps the most important part of the table is its last five rows giving information about the respective policy programs—both foreign and domestic—and the aims of the parties concerning form of government and rearmament.

Only three of the parties have been in existence for more than a year. They are the German Party (1947), German Rights Party (1946), and Katakombe Scheinwerfer (Catacomb Searchlight), an illegal organization apparently dating back to 1948. The other seven were founded between March, 1949, and last January.

Cooperation Shunned

Four of the parties are represented in the Bonn Parliament—the German Party with 17 delegates out of a total of 402, the German Reichspartei with 4, and the German Rights Party and Socialist Reichspartei with 1 each.

With two exceptions, there are no indications of any efforts for close cooperation between these 10 groups. On the contrary, it seems that each of the party heads has a strongly developed "Führer" complex and therefore looks askance at merger proposals.

The two exceptions are Karl Steinfeld's Sammlung zur Tat (Rally for Action) and the Bund für Deutschlands Erneuerung (League for Germany's Comeback).

The south German Rally for Action seems the mildest of all the neo-Nazi groups. It has a middle-of-the-road economic program, is against reestablishment of the German Army, and attempts to sell its authoritarian rather than totalitarian blueprints to all discontented parties.

It is different with the League for Germany's Comeback. This organization was founded half a year ago as "Circle of the Friends of Otto Strasser," the Nazi rebel of the early 1930's, who is now an exile in Canada.

For quite some time he has been making every effort to be allowed to return to Germany. So far he has failed, and has had to limit himself to publication of a paper in Canada and exercise of remote control over his deputy, Kurt Spengler, and his numerous followers in Germany.

Dr. Strasser's program is a dynamic piece of popular music, with catchy passages for nationalistic brass, radical socialist woodwinds, and sentimental strings. Obviously, on his orders the league has not only established contacts with all the other neo-Nazi groups in Germany, but also has a finger in the Austrian Nazi pie. If Dr. Strasser returns to Germany, a merger of the "Friends of Strasser" with the friends of Hitler is in the books, and it would not be surprising to see them join eventually with the friends of Stalin.

Danger Seen in Führer Idea

This—a Soviet-Nazi alliance—and not the neo-Nazi groups by themselves is the real danger. It is a danger which the western occupation powers can hold off and even suppress for some time, but cannot eliminate.

None but the Germans themselves can tear out the roots of naziism. The fact that some 4,000,000 of them still adhere to the Führer principle, favor the black-red-white of the Nazi flag, and believe in racial superiority and government by concentration camps proves nothing one way or another.

There are probably 10 times as many Germans who sincerely would like to see the break with the past made permanent. They are for the most part less articulate and less bold than the unreformed Nazis. But at present they are the majority—the ruling majority.

Still, we must not forget the neo-Nazis. That is why it is useful to give the publications of the Society for the Prevention of World War III a more than perfunctory reading—and file them for reference just in case.

Towards Collective Security

by
C. Monteith Gilpin

The historic address of Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, before the United Nations General Assembly on September 20, 1950, will undoubtedly receive the most careful consideration of the member nations. Mr. Acheson presented a clear picture of the present crisis in world affairs and minced no words in describing the policies of the Soviet Union, as constituting a major barrier to world peace.

The Korean conflict increases the import of Secretary Acheson's speech and especially his recommendations to prevent the outbreak of "new Koreas" in other parts of the world. Toward increasing the effectiveness of the United Nations action against aggression, the Secretary of State made the following proposals:

1. "A provision for the calling of an emergency session of the General Assembly upon 24 hours notice, if the Security Council is prevented from acting upon a breach of peace or an act of aggression.
2. "The establishment by the General Assembly of a security patrol, a peace patrol, to provide immediate and independent observation and report from any area in which international conflict threatens, upon the invitation or with the consent of the state visited.
3. "A plan under which each member nation would designate within its national armed forces a United Nations unit or units, to be especially trained and equipped and continuously maintained in readiness for prompt service on behalf of the United Nations.
4. "The establishment by the General Assembly of a committee to study and report on means which the United Nations might use their collective actions—including the use of armed forces to carry on the purposes and principles of the charter."

This program gives clear expression to the determination of the United States to truly make the United Nations the all-embracing force for peace and security which it was originally intended to be. It reflects the faith of the American people in the capabilities of the United Nations to enforce international law and maintain order. Finally, it shows that the United States has discarded the illusion of isolationism and is willing to commit its resources on behalf of world-wide collective security.

For hundreds of years men have dreamed of a system of security which would prevent the recurrence of wars. Collective action to maintain peace is therefore an old concept. The fact, however, that the world's most powerful nation has now announced that it stands foursquare behind this great ideal as an effective guarantee for peace and security is of historical significance.

Only those who are afraid of peace will challenge a system of world-wide collective security based on the Charter of the United Nations. As emphasized by the Secretary of State, this system would be buttressed by military units from all nations subscribing to the Charter. Such an array of spiritual and material forces is the best deterrent to future aggression. The Society for the Prevention of World War III regards the Secretary's proposals as a decisive step in the direction of peace and security.

It is our considered judgment that Mr. Acheson's recommendations to the United Nations have profound political and military significance. They have a direct bearing on the future defenses of Western Europe. At the recent meeting of the three Foreign Ministers in New York, the United States proposed a remilitarized Germany which ostensibly would be integrated into an all Western European army. This recommendation was later examined by the North Atlantic Council and in its communique of September 26, the Council indicated that it would consider the "utilization of German manpower and resources . . ." Therefore the question of remilitarizing Germany is no longer a matter of unofficial speculation. It has reached the highest level of inter-governmental negotiations.

Those who have advocated the remilitarization of Western Germany have based their arguments to a large extent on the fact that in Europe the Russians possess overwhelming land power which cannot be effectively checked with the available military forces in the West. Underlying this thesis is the assumption that the day of a genuine world-wide system of collective security is gone and that the West must look to its own reserves for protection. But if this premise is true then how seriously will the nations of the world take the recommendations of Mr. Acheson for the adoption of a world-wide system of collective security?

Ironically, there has not been a moment in history as at present, when there is such solid unanimity among a majority of the member states of the United Nations to pool their resources for the purpose of upholding the Charter and maintaining world peace. Collective security as advocated by the Secretary of State is therefore not only a great ideal but can be realized in our lifetime. To continue to press for the rearming of the Germans under these circumstances would play into the hands of our opponents who could accuse us of sheer hypocrisy.

Military forces alone cannot always maintain peace. Backed however by the united voice of the world organized under the Charter of the United Nations, the very existence of such military units would isolate any would-be aggressor and, if war broke out, pre-determine the ultimate defeat of those who provoked it.

Consequently, it is our conviction that the Secretary of State's recommendations for collective security cannot be realized when at the same time plans go forth to rearm the Germans outside of the United Nations. The world is faced with a choice—either there is a world wide system of collective security or a system of special blocs of opposing nations. The establishment of opposing blocs goes counter to the very spirit of the Charter, and, in the long run, is not conducive to the preservation of peace. The rearming of the Germans would help split the world into opposing camps; thereby shattering man's hope for effective collective action as proposed by the United States.

In this connection mention should be made of the fact that in the communique of the three Foreign Ministers, it is officially declared that "they will treat any attack upon the federal republic or Berlin from any quarters as an attack upon themselves." In Korea the United States received world-wide support because we acted in accordance with the Charter. This fact is of decisive importance and to disregard it in the case of Germany is to deliberately squander the advantages of working through the United Nations.

Of course, the Allies have always regarded an attack on Western Germany as tantamount to an attack on themselves. What makes it dangerous at this time is not only that it is in contradiction to the Secretary of State's concept of collective security but that it will fan the fires of German nationalism. Only the other day a prominent member of the German government publicly declared that the Germans would seek by every possible means to regain those territories which they lost under Allied agreements. We do not want to make any prejudgments as to the final boundaries of Germany's Eastern or Western borders. Yet by handing the Germans a blank check, so to speak, the United States and its allies may find themselves pulling Germany's chestnuts out of the fire. The peoples of the West want military security, but they do not want to fight Germany's battles.

We fully appreciate the difficulties facing the West in organizing the defenses of Western Europe. But at the same time who can fail to understand the reluctance of the French and British to accede to American wishes for the recreation of German armed forces? Having suffered under the heel of the German boot for decades it can hardly be expected that the peoples of the West would be willing to jump from the frying pan into the fire.

The problem of the defense of Western Europe should be part and parcel of Secretary Acheson's concept of collective security. This would obviate the need for German armed forces and place emphasis on the necessity to establish a strong international army under the direction of the United Nations itself. Such a program for the defense of Western Europe and other parts of the world would immensely strengthen American leadership. It would allay the fears and suspicions of our Western allies regarding the ultimate aims of the Germans and regarding our intentions in Germany. Finally, this program would reduce international tensions which would undoubtedly deepen if Germany should be rearmed.

We have said in the past that a rearmed Germany would never be a reliable bulwark of Western civilization. This conviction has not been weakened. On the contrary, the maneuvers and intrigue of the German military, the growth of neo-Nazism, the double-dealing of West German industrialists with the Soviets, all these facts show that the Germans cannot be trusted with so great a task. As we see it then, the road to the defense of Western Europe is through the program for collective security as outlined by the Secretary of State. We fervently hope that his recommendation will find the warm support of the member nations who are now aware that peace and security are indivisible and that a threat to one is a threat to all.

A PROBLEM OF SEMANTICS

Recently a Washington newspaper published a striking cartoon showing a Soviet-made tank rolling over the body of a South Korean soldier. A grinning officer leaned from the tank holding a scroll before his agonized victim saying: "By the way, have you signed our petition to outlaw the atomic bomb?"

The officer in the cartoon was referring to the so-called Stockholm "peace" offensive which the Kremlin had launched a few months ago. This ingeniously worded petition to outlaw atomic weapons, which avoids any reference to aggression generally, appealed to the most human sentiments for peace while it cleverly camouflaged its true objective. Thus, millions of people in Europe and tens of thousands of people in the United States were duped into signing this Moscow-inspired "peace" petition, which debunked itself on the very instant the Soviet-supported aggression was launched in Korea. In Europe particularly many of those who signed the petition did so in the belief that it might be a sincere effort by Soviet Russia to achieve peace. But as soon as the Communists advanced below the 38th Parallel in Korea, they realized it for what it was—another empty propaganda gesture of the Kremlin.

In short, the Korean aggression exploded into thin air the hypocritical "peace" campaign. It showed even the most naive wishful thinkers what the Soviets are really up to when they talk of "peace." Indeed, the word "peace" belongs in the growing lexicon of words which have been taken over by the Soviets and turned upside down in their meaning. To be sure, it is not the only word which the Soviets and their stooges have camouflaged for their own purposes.

Take, too, the word "democracy." The Communists, well aware of what this word means to millions all over the globe, have appropriated the word and perverted its meaning to denote a blasphemy of democracy. They call their satellites "people's democracies" and offensively proclaim to the world that their's is the "real," the "true" and the "only democracy."

Besides adopting and abusing words like "democracy," "peace" and so on, for their own malevolent use, the Soviets have hammered through their propaganda machine obvious lies about "American imperialism," "Wall Street aggression," etc. According to this line, it was not the North Korean, Soviet-trained, and Soviet-advised army which crossed the 38th Parallel, but the "American imperialists." Perhaps the best answer to this was given by Sir Gladwyn Jebb, head of the British delegation to the United Nations, at the Security Council when he said: "Are we really to believe that the boys from Iowa or Colorado who are now fighting in foxholes near Chingju, doing their best to defend democracy as they know it, and longing for the day when they will get back to Denver or Sioux City, are we really to believe that these people are out like Genghis Kahn, to enslave the world? Show me anyone of these United States soldiers who would rather reign in outer Mongolia than go back to Seattle, and I will gladly concede your point about 'imperialist' America. Until then, no! I prefer to rely not on Marx but on the judgment of my own eyes and ears."

While the rulers in the Kremlin annex non-Soviet territories, they shout about American imperialism; while they have a standing army of 170 divisions, they accuse the United States of being militaristic; while they ask people to sign their "peace" petition, they launch the Korean aggression. . . . And while right-thinking people all over the world fervently want to prevent another war, the Communists take over the title of this magazine, Prevent World War III, for their own ends.

This magazine, Prevent World War III, founded and published since May, 1944, by the Society for the Prevention of World War III, has always called a spade a spade and taken a stand against every variety of totalitarianism. In the pages of Prevent World War III our readers can find documentation on the danger which Fascist, Communist and Nazi groups represent to the welfare of the people of the United States and to the welfare and freedom of peace-loving peoples everywhere.

Now, the American Communists are using the name of our magazine! Recently the Daily Worker published a special edition entitled "Prevent World War III." This "Daily Worker-Prevent World War III" edition is compounded of the usual Communist rabble-rousing and hate-mongering drivel. In this particular case, the "Daily Worker-Prevent World War III" edition carried a message signed by three top Communist leaders stating: "Not a cent, not a gun, not a plane for Wall Street's puppet regime in Korea, Formosa, Vietnam. . . ."

Lest there be any confusion, we would point out that from the very first day of the Soviet aggression in Korea, the Society for the Prevention of World War III, in a press release, made its position clear in endorsing President Truman's and the United Nations' action. Today more than ever we feel that the President's courageous decision, and the momentous step taken by the United Nations, were the only possible answer to the challenge of Communist aggression. Today, we know that our firm action in Korea has given new hope to millions of oppressed all over the world, and we also know that our decision and our military success has shocked the masters of the Kremlin.

The decisive role played by the United States and its heroic soldiers in upholding the charter of the United Nations has been recognized by the overwhelming majority of the member nations. The speed with which our government has mobilized men and resources to enforce the charter will give encouragement and hope that the victories in Korea will not be in vain and that from out of the ruins of that war-torn peninsula, democracy will have a new birth of freedom. In this connection we think it appropriate to quote a passage from President Truman's speech of September 1, 1950, which clearly states further the aspirations of the United States in Korea:

"We want peace and we shall achieve it. Our men are fighting for peace today in Korea. We are working for peace constantly in the United Nations and in all the capitals of the world. Our workers, our farmers, our businessmen, all our vast resources, are helping now to create the strength which will make peace secure.

"We want peace not only for its own sake but because we want all the peoples of the world, including our-

THE OLD GAME

"History may soon repeat itself on the return of tens of millions of dollars worth of confiscated enemy property to Germans.

"That happened after World War I, and the stage is being quietly set in Congress for a repeat performance . . .

"Many of the Germans were Hitlerites.

"Amount of the prize the foreign-financed lobby is after is more than $60,000,000. The lobby is a lot nearer to grabbing this off than is publicly realized.

"The Senate has already passed a bill authorizing the recapture of these juicy plums. The measure was put through early in July—when the nation's shocked attention was focused on the tragic reverses in Korea. At the time, when greatly outnumbered and outgunned American soldiers were dying in desperate battles to stem the Communist invaders, the Nazi-financed lobby did its work . . .

"It was a strictly bi-partisan job.

"Author of the legislation was Senator James O. Eastland (D.-Miss.), a militant racist. Working hand-in-glove with him was Sen. Hugh Butler (R.-Neb.) consistent isolationist and leading foe of statehood for Hawaii.

"Note: The lobby includes some of the biggest law firms in the country. They stand to make millions in fees if they put this deal through . . ."

selves, to be free to devote their full energies to making their lives richer and happier. We shall give what help we can to make this universal human wish come true.

"We invite all the nations of the world, without exception to join with us in this great work."

The Society for the Prevention of World War III wholeheartedly endorses this statement by the President of the United States.

Yes, we want peace, a real and a true peace. And we still hope that World War III can be prevented, the masters of the Kremlin willing. But at the same time we feel that in order to enforce a genuine peace, the United States as the champion of the free world, despite the screams of the Communists and their stooges about "American imperialism," "Wall Street aggression" and "capitalist warmongers" has to be mighty and not weak, for the armed might of the United States of America constitutes the best hope of freedom-loving men throughout the world.

TOWARDS A NEW REICHSWEHR

". . . In the minds of the conservative nationalists of Bonn, no doubt, the emergence of an armed gendarmerie, now granted by the Foreign Ministers, is only the first step on the road to military sovereignty. It is a short step, however, and the Western Powers can probably take it without undue danger to themselves or to the peace of Europe. The proposal to raise large German units as part of a 'European army,' however, is quite another matter: given the quality of German military leadership, this would be not a step but a stride, and a long stride, towards the new Reichswehr that the Foreign Ministers say they do not want. Those in the West who support this proposal seem to forget that a European army presupposes a European government and parliament—a supra-national authority of which none exists today in more than embryonic form. Who is to direct this army? What representative assembly of the peoples of Europe will control it? If both sides of the House of Commons were of the opinion that Britain could not safely delegate her sovereignty over steel production, how can any realistic politician dare consider delegating sovereignty in the infinitely more decisive matter of the British armed forces? . . ."

EXPEDIENCY vs. COMMON SENSE

The New York Times of September 6, 1950, carried three stories dealing with Germany which require no comment. The first dispatch deals with a press interview with the American High Commissioner, John J. McCloy, who recently returned to the United States for consultation. In discussing the general economic, political, and social conditions in Western Germany, Mr. McCloy told the press that he favored some form of German military force in Western Germany. In addition, he advocated that the Germans "should be given a greater voice in foreign affairs."

Mr. McCloy is our most authoritative voice in Germany. We assume, of course, that when he advocates policies or changes in policies, he speaks on the basis of compelling facts. From his remark made to the press, it would appear that the Germans have come of age, so to speak, that they have purged themselves of the ideology of Nazism and are ready to take their stand with the democratic cause. This would be the hope of freedom-loving peoples who are seeking additional reliable Allies to ward off future threats of aggression.

However, alongside of Mr. McCloy's interview, an article from Frankfurt, Germany, tells the reader that "the ratio of Germans in the United States Zone who thought Nazism was a good idea badly carried out increased from 52% in 1947 to 59% in 1949." These findings are the result of a survey conducted by the Office of the United States High Commissioner. The Times reports that this survey shows that "the majority of Western Germans do not look upon 'National Socialism' (Nazism) as a political ideology in disrepute. . . ."

We realize that poll-taking can be a misleading method in judging the sentiment of a people. However, in the same issue of the Times, another dispatch is published reporting that the Schleswig-Holstein Parliament elected Dr. Walter Bartram, a Christian Democrat, as Minister President. The Times declares that "German political observers said Dr. Bartram was the first ex-member of the Nazi Party to become Minister President of a West German State since the war."

It would seem difficult to reconcile Mr. McCloy's proposal for German rearmament and the reestablishment of a German diplomatic staff which is based on the proposition that the Germans are prepared to take their place in the camp of democracy, with the survey taken in his zone of occupation and the election of a Nazi to a top political post.

In this connection, Dr. Walter Bartram, the new Minister President, was not the only Nazi to be placed in a high position in Schleswig-Holstein. Mr. Ernest Leiser, writing for the Overseas News Agency, September 18, reports that the Deputy Minister President is Waldemar Kraft, a former major in the SS and a member of the Nazi party since 1943. The Minister of Labor, Social Welfare and Refugees, Hans-Adolf Asbach, joined the Nazi party in 1933 and was a member of Hitler's storm troopers as early as 1934. Hermann Andersen, Minister of Reconstruction and Economics became a Nazi in 1937 and was also a member of the SS. Otto Wittenburg, Minister of Food, Agriculture and Justice, had also joined the Nazi party, in 1937. It is noteworthy that all these former Nazis were named to their present posts by a coalition of non-Nazi parties including the party of Chancellor Adenauer.

Democracy was never defended by its enemies, nor will it ever be. The United States has poured billions of dollars into Germany for the express purpose of rehabilitating the German economy and reorienting the Germans along democratic lines. How far have these programs succeeded since 1945? Judging from the U. S. survey, it would appear that the Nazi virus has not only succeeded in staying alive, but is spreading. The election of a Nazi to a key post in German political life (and he is not the only Nazi in a high political position) is a very precise barometor of how much needs to be done even at this late date to inculcate the democratic spirit among the German people.

Mr. McCloy's advocacy of rearming the Germans and recreating their diplomatic organizations seems therefore to be putting the cart before the horse. Democracy must first be in the hearts of a people before they can be entrusted with the great responsibility of defending it. To place guns in the hands of a people whose totalitarian beliefs remain deep rooted and very much alive is tantamount to injecting a fifth column in the very center of the Freedom Camp. A drowning man may grab at anything afloat but if he reaches out for a shark, then he has hastened his own demise.

We do not deny that the times call for action, but policies born out of desperation may boomerang. Will our leaders fall prey to this trap or will they strive to keep pure our democratic alliances which, in the last analysis, constitute our only reliable bulwark against all brands of totalitarianism.

THE VOICE OF A VICTIMIZED PEOPLE

"Israel Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett today bitterly attacked 'appeasement' of Germany as 'sowing the seeds of new aggression and horror' in his opening address to the U. N. General Assembly . . .

"With Germany's 'revolting record intact, her guilt unexpiated and her heart unchanged,' Mr. Sharett said the new appeasement 'outrages the sacred memory of countless martyrs, betrays the sacrifices sustained in the overthrow of Nazism and sows the seed of new aggression and horror. The danger is now imminent,' he added, 'that the only real beneficiary of the present world crisis will be the very country which by brutal violence provoked the last war.

" 'Having exterminated the bulk of European Jewry and reduced its surviving remnants in Germany itself to an insignificant number,' Mr. Sharett said in his address, which referred to both East and West Germany, 'the Nazis now vent their rage on the dead by desecration of cemeteries and destruction of tombstones.' Such things, he said, pointed up the 'unreformed and unrepenting wickedness of the new apostles of the resurgent Nazi doctrine.' "

(From a report in the J. T. A. Daily News Bulletin)

STRICTLY BUSINESS . . .

Writing in a recent issue of the New Leader, Gunther Stuhlmann, in an article significantly titled, "Germany's Red Rabbits," calls attention to the "selfseeking West German businessmen, eager for economic 'cooperation' with Soviet Germany" who are "doing Stalin's work where Communist agents fail."

The latest Kremlin operative in its continuing campaign to soften up the Bonn Republic, is, according to the writer in the New Leader, a rabbit.

"He is a harmless-looking creature, meek and unaggressive, and he swings a brief-case by his side. He is, in short, the conservative businessman who listens to tempting Communist propositions for trade with the East Zone. Neither a Communist nor a fellow traveler, he allows his desire for profit and his nationalistic yearning for German unity to make him as effective a Moscow agent as if he were."

It all started a few months ago, when Dr. Andreas Hermes, a former official of the Weimar Republic declared that Western Germany should cooperate not only with the Soviet Zone, but with Eastern Germany in general, since only through economic unification could Germany become a major political factor again. This Dr. Hermes belongs to the group of German conservatives who have, for some time, been agitating in the so-called Nauheim Circle for "neutralization" of Germany. These groups of conservative Germans are basically russophile and hope for a new Russo-German pact. Significantly, immediately after Hermes' pronouncements, Ernst Nieckisch, one of the top Soviet propagandists, helped found a "Society for Trade with the East" in Hamburg, a group which was immediately joined by 90 leading Hamburg manufacturers.

Ever since, many German industrialists, while professing to be "anti-Communist," accelerated their courtship of the Reds. The New Yorker recently published an article by its correspondent "Genet" describing as follows the present situation in Western Germany: "Some of these (German) industrialists believe that if Russia were to win, they and Germany as a whole, as valuable individuals and a valuable nation, would be given favorable terms, under which they could do colossal big business with the Soviets; they visualize a vast super-production mating of the greatest demand and the greatest answering efficiency."

Along these lines, the German businessmen have now started to advertise in Communist newspapers! It is almost unbelievable, but a fact, that in the past weeks a great number of Ruhr industrialists have seen fit to advertise their products in the Red press of Western Germany. Don Cook of the New York Herald Tribune writing from Duesseldorf had this to say: "It is difficult to believe that a Communist newspaper is a really effective advertising medium for industrial equipment for engineering firms and the conclusion that the owners of these companies are trying to buy insurance in case of trouble in Europe is an obvious one."

Here is a list of those enterprises which have placed advertisements in Freies Volk, the leading Communist paper in Western Germany. This list has been published by the Tagesspiegel of Berlin, one of the best democratic newspapers in Germany:

Scheffels und Wolf in Hagen-Bergschmiede;
Remscheider Saegen und Werkzeugfabrik;
Walzwerk und Fassonschmiede Wuppermann in Leverkusen;
Kremer, Sondermann Co. in Wuppertal-Kronenberg;
Robert Frohn in Remscheid;
Dema, H. Meyer und Co, Werkzeugfabrik Duesseldorf;
Loewe und Jaegers, Roehrengrosshandlung in Duisburg;
Rhein-Ruhr-Stahl GmbH in Duesseldorf;
Bosch Gotthardtshuette O. Bryer GmbH in Eeidenau;
Viktoriagabeln C. G. Funkel Sohn in Hagen;
Metallwaren und Stahlwerke R. und H. Plate, Augustenthal;
Peters Luxemburg in Duesseldorf.

Hand in glove with this advertising campaign the German industries are said to be secretly sending large money contributions to the Communist Party in Western Germany. A member of the Bonn Parliament, Representative Ött, recently called attention to this scandal; he declared that he has proof that in various offices of the Communist Party in Western Germany a great number of industrialists and leading personalities of public life have sent considerable contributions.

Thus, the alleged anti-Communist German big businessmen are helping directly and indirectly to finance the Communist Party in Western Germany. When the scandal of the big business advertisements in the Communist papers in Western Germany broke, the Director of Germany's second big steel works, according to an AP dispatch from Bochum, Germany, gave the following "explanation": "We wanted to get rid of some pig iron which we could not process because of a shortage of mechanical facilities."

Whereupon British officials pooh-poohed this "explanation" and said:

"Those lads weren't trying to get rid of pig iron. They were just trying to play both ends against the middle. They wanted to avoid an embarrassing situation if Russia should come bursting in."

"On August 2, the American High Commissioner decided to reinforce the 'German labor service units' by increasing their numbers to 26,000 men, 16,000 of whom are to be Germans, and by arming them with rifles and by placing this auxiliary police force directly under the commander of the American forces in Europe. In its comment on this development, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung makes the following statement:

" 'The story begins with rifles, it continues with machine guns and nobody knows where it will end. The road travelled by the American government does not seem to have any definite direction. One can only hope that the American government has given serious thought to all the consequences that may result from it.' "

Who Will Hold the Reins?

More than six months have passed since the day when the French Foreign Minister, Robert Schuman, outlined his Plan to merge the coal and steel industries of Western Europe.

When the Plan was first announced the Society stated that it would withhold final judgment as to its merits until additional facts were available. Unfortunately the significance of the Schuman proposal is still shrouded by generalities and platitudes. In addition, negotiations proceed behind closed doors and it would therefore be premature to predict their final outcome.

Nevertheless, there have been many important comments with regard to the Schuman Plan which, while unofficial, deserve consideration, since they stem from trustworthy and reliable sources. We have assembled a collection of these commentaries but because of space we shall confine ourselves to what we believe are the most significant observations.

1. The Commercial and Financial Chronicle, a reliable journal dealing with financial problems both domestic and international, carried an article on the Schuman Plan by Dr. Melchior Palyi, an outstanding economist, in its June 8 issue. Dr. Palyi, who is a keen student of European economic affairs suggested that the Schuman Plan is "in reality a new version of the defunct international steel cartel—which the shrewd M. Loucheur promoted in the 1920's under pacifistic slogans . . ." Dr. Palyi, in this connection, declares that the plan portended "a more complete protection for the superprotectionists."

So far as the German attitude is concerned, he observes that the Germans are "anxious to submit" to this plan since "the cartel is a great advantage over her present station." Dr. Palyi expresses fear lest the Schuman Plan endanger the free enterprise system. Indeed, he goes so far as to raise the question whether "in due course all industries of France and Germany are to be cartelized." In his judgment, this would be a logical sequel to the Schuman Plan itself.

2. In his recent book, Faith, Purpose and Power, Mr. James P. Warburg notes that the Schuman Plan, as conceived, could be very dangerous, as it "might be perverted into the sort of Big Steel Combine attempted just before Hitler's rise to power by some of the Ruhr magnates and their French counterparts in the Acieries du Nord. It is perhaps to be noted with some reserve that M. Francois-Poncet, who was then French Ambassador to Germany and who is said to be closely affiliated with the French steel industry, is now the French High Commissioner in Germany; and that the German steel industry has been allowed to fall back into the hands of much the same group which controlled it before the war."

3. Mr. Warburg's misgivings are not an isolated instance. The British Government's refusal to accept the Schuman invitation to set up an organization to control the coal and steel industries of Western Europe was partially based on the fear that the Schuman Plan would develop along the lines described by Mr. Warburg. This is also expressed by the National Executive Committee of the British Labor Party, which presently controls the British Government. While the Laborites laud the general principles of the Schuman Plan, they express the following reservation: "There is no doubt at this moment that Europe's private industries fear overproduction and will try to organize restrictive cartels as in the past. They will seek to pervert the Schuman proposals for their own selfish and monopolistic ends. A coordinated perversion of this type would be far worse than our present uncoordinated competition. The European peoples must be on their guard."

4. The weekly magazine, Business Week, has published several articles on the Schuman proposals which also tell of the pitfalls which may develop in the execution of the plan. As early as May 20, Business Week wrote about the "danger that Schuman's pool would become nothing more than a thinly disguised cartel." Insofar as its effects on the French are concerned, Business Week prophesizes that the "scheme will mean some sacrifices for French industry." Among the sacrifices listed are: (a) "The shutdown of high cost French steel plants representing 20% to 30% of total capacity is certain. Marginal French coal mines which make up an even higher percentage of total capacity, will fold too." (b) "French metropolitan and colonial markets will be open to German competition." (c) "Politically dangerous unemployment will show up as the result of the closing of mines and plants." Indeed, Business Week claims that the Schuman Plan "gives the Saar back to Germany."

5. Reaction in Western Germany, according to Business Week, is far more favorable to the plan. "The industrialists of the Ruhr liked the Schuman proposal," reports this authoritative weekly, because it promises to scrap all limitations on their steel production and to do away with "drastic decartelization." In its July 22 issue, Business Week returned to this same theme and wrote that there were voices in Europe which believed that the Schuman Plan would develop into a coal and steel cartel. Once again the magazine reiterated its belief that the plan would develop unemployment in France and enable the Germans to recreate their industrial war potential "as a prelude to rearming."

It touches on another angle which has been hardly discussed and yet most certainly has great significance. "Military men," states Business Week, "are afraid that the pool will encourage neutrality thinking. . . . They feel that the Schuman Plan, by wasting energy on another futile European integration effort, would divert attention from the real need—effective Atlantic planning."

Thus it would seem that the Schuman Plan could not only become a danger to the development of healthy competition among the nations of Europe and afford the Germans with the opportunity to dominate their neighbors, but may also upset the security of the West.

6. The well-known journalist, David Lawrence, has intimated that the Schuman Plan is nothing but a glorified cartel. Writing in the New York Herald Tribune June 8, 1950, Mr. Lawrence said: "With great enthusiasm the United States Government has embraced the Franco-German proposal for a steel cartel."

He observes that this approval has been given by the United States "even though it does set up a super authority to supervise a private industry, doing, in effect, what the Nazis and the Italian Fascists did with their industrial cartels." Concluding his analysis, Mr. Lawrence writes: "Politically the move is all important in signifying Franco-German unity. But the old time Nazis in Germany and the Fascist businessmen in Italy must be smiling to themselves at the resurrection of their mode of controlling industrial production."

7. Another astute journalist, Mr. Theodore H. White, writing for the Overseas News Agency, said: "The Schuman Plan, drawn up by Frenchmen, seems to Frenchmen a magnanimous gesture to a treacherous enemy. But any recent traveler through Germany's Ruhr can report what the Germans will seek of the plan before they support it with native enthusiasm: they will insist that the Allies lift the 11 million 100 thousand ton limit on their steel production. And they will, above all, seek to make it a vehicle for raising investment funds for capital starved German industry." These German demands, Mr. White points out, "mean that the Schuman Plan cannot go through without the complete rewriting of all present accords and understanding on Germany."

8. In the June 2 issue of the Wall Street Journal, Mr. Warren H. Phillips, writing on the Schuman Plan, remarks: "On the political side there is the danger that Western Germany might come to dominate the steel pool. It almost certainly would if France and Germany were the major parties to the merger, and it might conceivably dominate it even if Britain joins the six-nation pool. The ties that bind Western Germany to the West are still very thin and undependable and she would still have to be wooed.

"In the last analysis Western Germany will go where her national interest dictates; this is perhaps a truism but it is one too often overlooked. There is always the ominous possibility that Germany might be able to dominate the proposed international coal-steel authority, then turn to making a 'deal' with the Russians when she has taken all the West has to offer."

9. Obviously, Mr. Phillips' conclusions bear directly on the future security of the West as much as they do on the healthy economic development of Western Europe. In a later dispatch, Mr. Phillips tells the reader that the old cartelists, French and German, are trying very hard to influence the course of the negotiations. He reveals that "hush hush talks have been held with French industrialists in Paris, by a top executive of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke, the big outfit which controlled 65% of Germany's pre-war steel capacity." Parenthetically, it should be pointed out that the Vereinigte Stahlwerke was the leading spirit in the development of the pre-war international steel cartel which Germany dominated. German politicians, reports Mr. Phillips, are sensitive to charges that the Ruhr cartelists are operating behind the scenes, and they have denied this. But these denials seem to be refuted by a later report in the New York Times on July 2 which revealed that Allied authorities seem to be concerned lest Germany's industrial war lords exert too great an influence on the negotiations.

"For example, they said that French officials here once specifically asked Chancellor Konrad Adenauer to refrain from appointing his close friend, Robert Pferdmenges, Cologne banker, to the Paris delegation. Now he is chairman of the economics group. Also named to the committee were Herman J. Abs, head of the Reconstruction Loan Corporation, who was a ranking official of the Deutsche Bank during the Nazi regime; Richard Merton, chairman of Metalgesellschaft; Henrich Kost, director of the Coal Management Board; Heinrich Dinkelbach, head of the Steel Trustees Association; Guenther Henle, director of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke; and Herman Reusch, director of the Gutehoffnungshuette Steel combine.

"Herr Kost was a member of the Nazi party. Herr Dinkelbach was a contributor to the Nazis, and two years ago the trade unions threatened to strike unless Herr Reusch were removed from appointment as head of a steel control group. He was removed by an Allied order."

10. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal of September 26, 1950, discusses the danger of cartel influences on the Schuman Plan, as previously reported by its correspondent, Mr. Warren Phillips. Commenting on the way the plan has developed up to date, the editorial declares: "All the arguments brought forward to support the broad powers for this international High Authority—planned production, ordered marketing and stable prices—are the arguments used by the makers and supporters of the German steel cartel."

It is clear from the above that while the Schuman Plan expresses a very profound desire on the part of the European peoples to unite for peace and prosperity, it can be perverted for ulterior motives.

Obviously the Germans have much to gain from the Plan since it would make them a full-fledged partner at the minimum. Indeed, Mr. Walter Lippmann wrote some time ago that Germany would most likely succeed in dominating the setup contemplated in the pooling of the resources of the Ruhr with those of other Western European countries.

11. The spectre of the renewed German mastery over her neighbors cannot be lightly dismissed. It is a factor which is examined by Mr. William Diebold, Jr. in his article, "Imponderables of the Schuman Plan" just published in the October issue of the authoritative quarterly review, Foreign Affairs. Mr. Diebold does not arrive at any hard and fast conclusions as to the amount of good or bad that will ultimately derive from the Plan itself, although he does admit that the plan "may provide the machinery by which Germany finally dominates France."

In another part of the article he returns to this point and recounts a statement made to the House of Commons by Mr. R. H. S. Crossman on this crucial matter. According to Mr. Diebold, Mr. Crossman stated: "A distinguished German diplomat over here said to me the other day: 'After all, we ran France for five years. We are not going to worry about the terms that are signed. We sign first and change after.' "

12. There is another aspect of the problem which is generally overlooked and yet is directly connected with the Schuman Plan itself. We refer to the steady growth of the French steel industry since the end of the war. "The Germans," reports Business Week of May 20, "are highly sensitive about France's post-war steel expansion." However, in addition to the growing strength of the French steel industry, there is the little-advertised fact that the French have developed a new process of coke-making which could release her from the bondage of Ruhr coal. In the past, the supreme bargaining point of the Germans lay in their possession of the rich Ruhr coal mines which turn out some of the finest coke in the world. Since coke is essential to steel, the French have always been dependent upon the Germans in this crucial matter. This economic subordination has been generally reflected in the political settlements between Germany and France since before World War II. Recently, however, the French developed a new process which, according to Business Week, "in some cases makes better coke than the imported German variety."

As was to be expected when the news of this new process was made public to the Germans, there was a great deal of alarm. The Germans instinctively felt that if the French were able to make themselves independent of Ruhr coal, they would also be able to check Germany's plans to become the dominating factor in Western European politics again. According to Business Week "some French officials are afraid that the process could raise such obstacles to Franco-German economic cooperation that the United States might oppose its industrial application on political grounds." We do not know how true this statement is, but if the new French process for coke-making is as efficient as Business Week reports, then it would be far more advantageous for the Germans to carry out this so-called amalgamation of Ruhr coal and Lorraine steel so as to preclude its industrial application on a larger scale. It is a known fact that many times in the past inventions have been suppressed for other than economic considerations. Is this part of the intention of the Schuman Plan?

Of course it may be said that in view of the fact that the French have made the first official proposal for the pooling of the steel and coal resources of Western Europe, there can be no question as to the bona fide character of the plan. Yet it is a known fact that German cartelists for the past several years have worked assiduously to bring about a Ruhr-Lorraine tieup.

It is also noteworthy that Mr. McCloy has been an early advocate of such a scheme. The Times of March 22, 1950, said that there was a movement afoot for the "establishment of an entirely new sort of economic and political statute for the industrial areas along the Rhine valley including those in the Ruhr and the Saar. It is known that such a project long has been entertained by Mr. McCloy but till the present he has had little success in selling it either to his own superiors or to the other occupying powers."

Thus even the origin of Schuman's proposals may be legitimately questioned.

Needless to say, the Schuman Plan, if and when put into operation, will render useless the work of the International Ruhr Authority which has been more or less a paper organization. As one Allied delegate declared in connection with the dissolution of the International Ruhr Authority, once the Schuman Plan is put into effect, "There is no point in administering the head of the horse when someone else is driving the whole animal." The horse in this metaphor pertains to the iron and steel industries of the West, which reminds us of a Spanish proverb: "When two are riding the same horse, one must hold the reins."

FRENCH FEARS

"The main French position runs something like this: it is nonsense to speak of German 'divisions' without talking of a German army. If the Germans are broken into smaller units they will not fight. If they are employed in divisions, their supply and dispositions must be coordinated. They must have liaison with each other and their Government. Hence they must have a staff. Hence they are an army as German as any in the past century; and the French insist that Germany's interest is not identical with that of the Allies.

"The great nightmare that caps all bad French dreams is that of a Russo-German alliance. This nightmare goes back to that century-old piece of treachery when the Prussian general York von Wartenbourg turned against Napoleon at the battle of Tauroggen to join Napoleon's Russian enemies.

"Posed on any front, the new German army will be exposed as much to Soviet offers as to Soviet attacks. And only the Soviets can offer the Germans what they most seek: unity and the lost territory in the East. The military men closest to German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer disquiet the French. Globke, Adenauer's chief of personnel, is an old East Prussian. Count von Schwinn, Adenauer's military adviser, and Gen. Manteuffel, the semi-official spokesman of the German officer corps, are likewise Prussians from East Germany. All three men, as human beings, must seek to repossess their ancestral homes. A Russian offer to liquidate Communist East Germany, to change the Polish frontier, or give back East Prussia, can give them what they want without fighting a war, simply at the cost of joining a new coalition automatically preponderant against the West.

"The French have other arguments which the public courtesies of diplomacy prevent them from making. The French generals are convinced that if war against Russia breaks out, it can be won only by mobilizing millions of partisans behind Russia's lines. The most valuable partisans will be Poles and Czechoslovaks. But Poles and Czechoslovaks will not rise and fight for the West if it includes a German army, because the Germans are more hated in these countries than the Russians.

"The French are also convinced that arming the Germans would be a legal breach of four-power agreements with the Russians and would give them a legitimate casus belli."

Arming Germany Is Grave Risk

by

Edgar Ansel Mowrer

Our American "success" in getting the foreign ministers of France and Great Britain to accept the principle of a large German contingent within the coming North Atlantic Army cannot wash out the nasty taste that this decision is going to leave in the mouths of many people everywhere.

There is a great distinction to be made between letting the Germans participate in the defense of their own territory and giving them, only five years after they ceased destroying mankind, quasi-independence.

The former is a logical result of the Soviet Communist bid for world dominion, hastened by Soviet secondary provocation all over the world and the reaction of the American Congress to the Korean outrage.

It was rendered inevitable by the reluctance of free peoples, including the American, to put cannon before butter and decide to defend themselves without German participation—whatever the cost.

It corresponds, moreover, to an instinctive American tendency to overestimate the Germans to take Germany "off the necks of the American taxpayer."

For all these reasons, the acceptance of West Germany into the comity of free nations is certain—as was proved by the recent concession to West German independence made by the three democratic high commissioners under the chairmanship of the Frenchman, Andre Francois-Poncet.

But between the decision to recreate a German armed contingent, and the readiness to put German forces on an equal footing with those of democratically more dependable nations there is, as I said before, a deep gap. It is one that should not be bridged.

Yet bridging it is precisely what American leaders here have been insisting upon in the secret negotiations of the last few days. Instead of saying, "yes, we need a German contingent but we shall begin to equip German forces only when all the other contingents have been organized and equipped (which would have been acceptable to all the nations of the North Atlantic Alliance)," technical-minded Americans, obtuse to political realities, have tried to bull through the idea of starting to organize German forces almost at once.

They have hidden their insistence under cheerful remarks that, "it may be a year before German military units are actually formed."

This is very sour fare for the other European peoples who are aware that it may be three years before their own contingents are fully equipped, particularly if the foreign ministers continue to postpone vital decisions.

Because the Germans are anti-Russian and anti-Communist, they are totally dependent upon the West so long as they remain weak—that is, without armed forces of their own. So long as Germany remains disarmed, though the Germans may scheme and wheedle and bluster, they will do as they are told by the West. But the more they regain independence and military strength, the less they will be disposed to follow American advice.

Instead, they will try to auction off their support between democracy and Communism. Since the latter can always promise more in the way of loot and power, the historical lesson has been:

A weak Germany is pro-Western, a strong Germany pro-Russian. This was as true of Prussia under Frederick the Great as of Germany under Bismarck and under Adolf Hitler in 1939. Where the Germans have departed from it, as under the Kaiser in 1914 and Hitler in 1941, they have paid the price in defeat. It is silly to imagine that the present German leaders have forgotten this lesson.

It would not only be silly, it would be criminal for the democratic leaders either to overlook or forget it. Keeping it in mind means, under present circumstances, allowing Germany to recover its lost strength and independence only to the extent that the Atlantic countries develop greater strength. This means remembering that for some years to come, the only safe rule is—Germany last. . . .

Ein Volk

What strange delusions influence the Powers
Who feverishly mobilize for peace;
Who speak of Germany as "theirs" and "ours,"
And rush to arm the Wehrmacht—as police!
What crowing folly born of frantic fear,
What triumph of experience over morals,
To post a German guard at our frontier,
And think he'll kill his kin to serve our quarrels!
What asses Russians are, what fools are we,
While nervous qualms our shallow scruples smother,
To plan a pattern of security
That counts on Germans to destroy each other.
Now East and West "their" Germany defend—
They find the ex-Storm Trooper nothing loath—
The German they rearm has gained his end,
He'll use their weapons for revenge on both.

Back Door Trading Between Ruhr Industrialists And the Iron Curtain Countries

by

Jean Pajus

How effective is our economic warfare against Soviet Russia in its efforts to cut off the flow of vital war materials? Mr. J. C. H. Bonbright, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, believes that it is "very effective." On September 15, 1950, the AP carried a dispatch quoting Mr. Bonbright as saying, "the U. S. had very effective agreements with Western European countries for halting exports of strategic materials to Russia."

Mr. Bonbright did not elaborate on this statement nor did he name the Western European countries involved in these agreements. It might be assumed, therefore, that he included Germany in these Western countries.

We have made a study of the German East West trade in war materials, and our findings prove that the Ruhr industrialists, often aided by German officials, have shipped millions of dollars worth of war goods to the Iron Curtain countries. Consequently, the Ruhr has become an arsenal for the benefit of Russia and her satellites.

The efforts made to date by the Allied authorities to plug the East West loopholes have failed. The German export control authorities in charge of plugging these holes have not carried out their mission. The records submitted by the German authorities are unreliable and confused, thus posing an almost impossible puzzle to solve. The democratic world is faced with a problem of serious import, as can be seen from the fact that according to the U. S. News and World Report (September 22, 1950) "the total West German shipments to the Soviet bloc areas now are running upward of 200 million dollars a year."

The U. S. News and World Report states that the German firms are motivated by commercial considerations, i.e., profit. Evidence adduced during the past year, however, which is set forth below, would indicate that most German firms are doing business with the communists for political reasons as well. The German industrialists have apparently decided to make a deal with Communist Russia because they are thinking in terms of another Treaty of Rapallo or of another Hitler-Stalin Pact.

This thinking seems to be prevalent also among intellectuals and other prominent people who believe that it is wise to conclude their third pact before a Third World War.

The German press has become alarmed about this trend of events. The Berlin Tagesspiegel (American Zone) on August 24, 1950, wrote a lengthy analysis of the nature of this East West trade captioned "the Temptation of Trade with the East." The very first paragraph begins as follows:

"Were it not for the fact that the cumulative value of East West trading represents in the final reckoning a danger to the security of entire nations, such trading might well be considered the private concern of the trading partners involved therein."

The Berlin paper reports that the total inter-zonal trade now being negotiated is expected to provide for an exchange of goods amounting to one billion Deutsche Marks. From the analysis made of this trade, the German expert arrives at the conclusion that the whole deal is unsavory and that there is much more to it than meets the eye. The writer expresses his ideas in the following language:

"In the main, interest in West/East trading is confined to firms well versed in the intricacies of trade with the East and with little respect for customs controllers and tax auditors. As one would expect, the ledgers kept by these firms are as neat and correct as their files, but they are 'open secrets' in Western German industry, freely discussed everywhere from Dortmund to Cologne, rumors which cannot be clearly proved, but which certainly contain a certain amount of truth, as they are circulated by people well informed on trade matters, market fluctuations, and the volume of industrial production. The Laender Ministries of Economics should follow up and investigate these rumors. They should categorically request certain firms to answer certain precise questions. These firms should be only too glad to have the opportunity of clearing themselves of the suspicion of aiding the expansion of the Communist armament potential—if they are able to do so."

Of particular interest is the fact that the leaders involved in this illicit trade are the old-line representatives of the German Iron and Steel Cartel who formerly worked with the Nazi Armament Ministry. As reported by the Tagesspiegel:

"The first of these firms is the Iron and Steel trading firm of Otto R. Krause recently given much publicity owing to its attempts to conclude direct trade negotiations with the U. S. S. R. The firm is owned by Willie H. Schlieker, formerly head of the Iron and Steel Department of Speers' Armament Ministry in the German National Socialistic Government. The co-proprietor of this firm is a certain F. P. Kirchfeld, formerly managing director of the firm of Ferrostall A. G. and member of the board of Gutehoffnungshuette, who invested capital in the new firm and in addition gave the firm the benefit of his good connections with the works of the Gutehoffnungshuette."

The paper then describes various transactions entered into by the firm of Otto Krause. It discusses one particular deal in which Otto Krause, at a time when the steel embargo was in full force in Western Germany, arranged a 10 million Deutsche Mark credit from funds banked in Switzerland which was used for large steel purchases from Western Germany to be delivered to the U. S. S. R. via West Berlin. Nor was Mr. Krause alone in this deal, since the Tagesspiegel named the following German cartels which supplied the firm of Krause with the embargoed steel products. These firms were:

Gutehoffnungshuette
Deutsche Edelstahlwerke
Phoenix A. G.
Rheinische Stahlwerke

The Edelstahlwerke deserves special mention since its representative, Dr. G. V. L. Loesch, came to the United States a year ago and did yeoman work, in collaboration with Senator Malone, to scuttle our reparations program.

Another deal discussed by the German writer is that of the Haselgruber firm. This firm, it appears, has supplied large consignments of boiler tubes, gas pipes, boring tubes, pipe scuffolding, copper cables, large quantities of copper, and insulated wires from a Western German cable works to Romania, Bulgaria, and other satellite countries, all with Soviet expert permits. The writer then makes the following comments:

"It would be interesting to learn what has become of this firm's large export dollar earnings and where the amounts in Westmark came from, which are paid to Western German and Western Berlin suppliers. It would also be interesting to know what the Bonn authorities have to say of this kind of export as the people of Western Germany have a right to demand detailed information. Public opinion in Western Germany is seriously alarmed by the extent of this type of trading, the implications of which are too grave for the competent authorities to gloss over."

American trade circles have already expressed consternation over this state of affairs.

On August 29, 1950, the Herald Tribune reported that plants in Western Germany financed by the aid of the Economic Cooperation Administration, were selling to Russian satellite nations machine tools which might be used in producing arms for North Korean forces. The charge was made by Mr. Tell Berna, general manager of the National Machine Tool Builders in Cleveland. The charges by Mr. Berna read as follows: "In Western Germany, where the revival of the machine tool industry is part and parcel of the recovery program financed by the American taxpayers' money, machine tools are being built for shipment to the satellite nations in the Russian orbit, under permit from the American military authorities. For example, in Offenbach, horizontal boring mills are being built for shipment to Poland and in Frankfurt way grinders are being built for shipment to Hungary. Machines of this type are of vital use in the production of war materials."

Mr. Berna stated that he had discussed this vital issue on numerous occasions with the Department of State, Department of Commerce, the National Security Resources Board, and various heads of the armed forces—without result. (Herald Tribune, August 30, 1950)

It is worthy of note that in recent times the State Department has held up the export of certain American built machine tools in Italy, France, and Sweden, on the theory that the products made on these machines might go to Russia. Yet so far nothing has been done to stop the export of machine tools from Germany to Russia or the Iron Curtain countries.

In connection with the export of strategic materials to the Iron Curtain countries, Commissioner John J. McCloy announced on August 19, 1950, that he "would crack down on German industrialists who were circumventing Allied security regulations and building up, for profit, communist industrial power." As quoted in the New York Times of August 20, 1950, Mr. McCloy said that the German industrialists "will be forced to cooperate with the West." Mr. McCloy added that "subterfuges by which industrialists had evaded Western Allied controls to ship strategic materials to Western Europe would be unmasked."

Ten days after this announcement, the High Commissioner's Public Relations Division issued a press release which began as follows:

"More than 350 former U. S. Army trucks consigned to Hungary, part of an order of 1,000, were stopped during the past week at the East Zone border rail check point of Schirnding by alert members of the 7751 ST Custom Unit, according to the Trade Control Branch of the HICOG Trade and Payments Division."

It appears that these trucks were sold by the Staatliche Erfassungs-Gesellschaft, the German agency authorized to sell army surplus goods to the Truck and Spare Motor Vehicles Ltd. of Frankfurt. The Frankfurt firm submitted licenses which it obtained from the German Economics Ministry. The consignee was the Hungarian firm of Mogurt, Budapest, and the licenses were approved by the German licensing agency without regard to existing Allied High Commission regulations restricting export of certain items to Eastern European countries. The German firm also stated that it had acquired some 9,000 of the surplus vehicles.

On August 18, 1950, the Wall Street Journal reported:

"In the last few days the American, British, French Control Group in Frankfurt has issued a confidential order bluntly cancelling the practically unlimited authority the German Federal Government was granted over export of ball bearings and synthetic rubber compounds three months ago. . . . Allied officials are angry at the Bonn Government. In the past 90 days it has permitted a flood of ball bearings, machinery, rubber compounds and metals to pour eastward to Russian controlled Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria . . .

"This is considered a bold violation of instructions issued when Allied controls were relaxed May 10th."

The Wall Street Journal goes on to quote a high Government official who stated the following:

"We had hoped the German Government would take this job off our hands and keep a tight control on eastern exports. This hope has not borne fruit."

When told of the Allied disappointment, the German officials asked:

"Why should we lose this business to the victorious Allies?"

The Wall Street Journal flatly stated that:

"The increase of Germany's east-bound exports of potential war materials—as they are classified by the Allies—has been astounding.

"In the first 21 days after the export control authority was handed over to the Germans, says a High Commission official, more ball bearings and rubber compounds were shipped to East Europe than in the entire previous months when the control was in Allied hands.

"According to the German Government's own figures, the shipment of ball bearings and roller bearings to five satellites during June increased ten-fold over the May exports from West Germany. The bulk of the June shipments went to Hungary. Hungary had gotten none at all in the previous 12 months, officials say."

The Wall Street Journal article also gives details about shipments of carbon black, barium compound, lead compound, sodium compound, and nickel compound, which went to Bulgaria, Romania and Czechoslovakia. A High Commission official is quoted:

"The German Government has indulged in skullduggery to conceal the size of some individual orders from the High Commission's prying eyes."

The reporter concludes his article by saying:

"The High Commission recently discovered one application for a very large shipment to the East had been broken down into several small applications and approved by the German Government."

These reports of German duplicity came at the heels of similar charges made in Britain in August by Winston Churchill, that one of the country's largest machine tool producers was filling Russian orders for tools that could be converted to armament manufacture. Although the British shipments of goods to the Eastern countries are being delivered under trade agreements made two and three years ago, efforts are being made by Britain to remedy the situation, and shipments of critical items, such as military equipment and jet planes, have been halted. Moreover, British businessmen themselves have complained to their government about agreements that forced them to do business with Russia.

The attitude of the British businessman and the Attlee Government would appear in strange contradistinction to that of the German firms and German Government. The latter attitude is evidenced in a series of reports going back to the spring of this year. At the outset, one of the most respected spokesmen for German big business, the conservative Frankfurter Zeitung, on April 1, 1950, had an editorial which declared the guiding principles of Germany's dealings with the East and West as follows:

"Germany was always the bridge between the East and the West. . . . The Allies are not able to come to an accord with the Russians. . . . What is then more natural than for us in view of the present pressures to say: If until now, within the framework of world events, the others were not able to make an intelligent agreement, then it is our duty finally to arouse ourselves in order to obtain at least an economic understanding. . . .

"In doing so we will not turn to the little bosses of the Eastern Zone but directly to the big boss in Moscow. There is where decisions are being made. It is true that according to the Occupation Statute foreign policy discussions must be conducted through the three High Commissioners. Therefore, we will have to take the road of private mediation and thus try to arrange economic agreements between Germany and Russia, which nobody can refuse us in view of the fact that our life is at stake. . . ."

The following dispatches speak for themselves:

1. On April 9, 1950, The New York Times quoted an AP dispatch as follows:

"Western Allies are about to crack down on a huge back-door trade between West German manufacturers and the Soviet Zone, American officials said. The trade involves the shipment of coal and iron from the Ruhr, food from Bavaria, and machinery from Wuerttemberg-Baden, these sources said."

2. On April 6, 1950, The New York Times carried an AP dispatch captioned, "War Goods Smuggled to East Via Germany." The dispatch began as follows:

"Western officials said today that West Germany had become a funnel for war materials smuggled into Communist satellite states. . . . War goods are bought in some Western European countries and in West Germany, the officials asserted. . . . Authorities recently have confiscated airplane parts, bomb cases, ammunition carriers, and other war materials en route illegally to the East.

"Allied officials say that only 2% of rail shipments and 10% of truck shipments from West Germany are inspected at the border. Custom officials on the German border were turned over to the German Government last year."

3. On April 13, Ernest Leiser of the Overseas News Agency wrote two dispatches entitled: "Berlin Smuggle," in which he reported:

"Substantial quantities of goods sent by the U. S. to Western Germany under the Marshall Plan are being smuggled illegally across the Zonal borders to the Soviet controlled East German states. A sweeping investigation is now under way to find ways to plug these leaks or to force the West German Republic to do so. Economic analysts have here estimated that as much as 20 to 30 million dollars worth of goods is now slipping from the Western Zones into East Germany without authorization annually or that as high as $5,000,000 may be Marshall Plan goods."

In the second dispatch also dated April 13th, Leiser discusses the private deals of the West German industrialists. Leiser says:

"There is good reason today to believe that a number of industrial magnates in the Ruhr are making a secret calculated effort to circumvent the Western Allied order limiting production of steel in the West German Federal Republic to 11,100,000 tons a year. Their method is as dubious politically as it is devious economically. The Ruhr industrialists are building up the steel producing capacity in Soviet controlled Eastern Germany by exporting the machines and machine tools needed to construct plants there. 'Their reward' is reportedly a secret accord which gives them a share of the increased capacity. . . . Economic intelligence has produced numerous and convincing reports of financial contracts between the Ruhr steel makers and the economic agencies of the communist run East German Government."

Leiser then goes on to describe the development of East Germany's steel industry and concludes that the growth of the East German steel industry was caused by the shipment of machines and tools from West Germany.

4. Under the heading "U. S. Seems Baffled on German Trade," Michael Hoffman wrote a lengthy article in the New York Times on April 17th in which he discusses Germany's demand for increased trade with the Iron-Curtain countries:

"In the face of insistent and almost arrogant German demands for a free hand in trading with the East based on rosy pictures of the prospects thereof, the American official line is to play down the importance of the whole issue."

Then Michael Hoffman gives the German thinking:

"One that you find here (Dusseldorf) in the Ruhr is simply to take off the controls and let German industry make the best deals it can with the East. This is based on the wholly unsupported assumption that such trade would be more than a one way street for the East to drain the West of steel, machinery, and tools. It also runs flatly counter to the Allied policy of controlling East West trade for security reasons.

"The German steel output last month was 1,182,000 tons, well over the theoretical monthly share of the annual steel quota laid down by the Allies. But the Allied steel control has started an independent check of the steel inventories because officials believe the Germans are falsifying the figures on deliveries. U. S. sources here believe the Germans are reporting as 'sold' steel that will not be sold for months and probably cannot be paid for."

Michael Hoffman concludes his article with the following statement:

"It might not be sound for West Germany and it might not be sound for West Europe to keep going here the kind of industrial pattern that makes heavy German steel exports to the East seem inevitable."

5. In the article entitled "A German-Russian Partnership?" by Walter Lippmann in the St. Louis Post Dispatch, March 8, 1950, Mr. Lippmann said:

"I have reason to know from my own inquiries in Bonn last October that some arrangement of this sort has already been explored. Stalin can also offer German industry tempting opportunities all the way from Poland to China—not merely opportunities, but well-nigh exclusive and protected privileges to play a leading part in the industrialization of this immense but economically backward area."

6. Under the heading "New German Drang Nach Osten," Irving Brown, the A. F. of L. representative, wrote an article in The New Leader, April 22, 1950, which begins as follows:

"The new German Drang Nach Osten is under way. This time the drive to the East extends to the very shores of the Pacific Ocean. For the Russians are now attempting to win the battle of the Ruhr via China and thus conquer all of Germany. In addition to the markets of Eastern Europe, Ruhr industrialists cannot but cast longing eyes on the great and vast areas of primitive under-developed China now resting in Communist hands."

7. On April 12, 1950, Ernest Leiser of the Overseas News Agency wrote:

"U. S. officials charge angrily today that a 'curtain of silence' has been lowered around the talks by which the West German Federal Republic is now seeking to conclude a new trade accord with the Soviet controlled Government of East Germany.

"The Germans, it appears, have been very secretive about their negotiations and when the Allied officials expressed their dissatisfaction with the German secrecy, the Germans in rebuttal insisted that they 'were under no obligations to present the agreement for U. S. inspection until it is signed, sealed, and delivered.' They accused the Americans of unwarranted interference 'in the limited area of sovereignty given us under the occupation statute.'"

8. In an article dated January 30, 1950, in Newsweek, its Washington bureau reported:

"Diplomatic reports from Moscow claim that during the current negotiations (between Mao Tze Tung and the Russians) the Russians have demanded and obtained Chinese agreements to a scheme under which the Soviets would have a complete monopoly over all trade between Germany and China. These reports stress the presence in Moscow of a strong German economic delegation and indicate that some members of the delegation may have taken part in the negotiations with Mao. The only previous indication that the Soviets might be toying with the idea occurred during the November steel industry conference in Dusseldorf when German technicians in the Soviet Zone emphasized the importance of China to Germany's steel industry.

"These reports stress that a Russian monopoly on trade with China could, under the guise of inter-zonal German trade, secure for Soviet occupied Manchuria, heavy industrial equipment from West Germany. Also the bait of Chinese orders could be used to win over the Western German industrialists to the Soviet side. Western Germany, the Ruhr especially, would find the prospect of trade with China alluring."

9. On March 28, 1950, the Suddeutsche Zeitung, Munich, wrote:

"Direct trade relations between the Federal Republic and Red China are absolutely possible. The Americans should think about strengthening the West German economy by encouraging direct German-Chinese trade."

10. On April 23, 1950, Drew Middleton discussed Germany's role in Europe. He said:

"It became apparent this week that when the Foreign Ministers of U. S. Great Britain, and France meet in London they will have to deal with German wishes and desires as well as those of their own countries."

As regards the attitude of the Ruhr industrialists, Middleton says:

"The first is that Western Germany is not going Communist under present conditions despite the yearning glances of Ruhr industrialists toward trade with the East or the intemperate speeches of politicians representing what the Germans call 'national Bolshevism.'"

11. The Overseas News Agency sent out a dispatch from Frankfurt dated April 7th by Ernest Leiser in which the latter tells about an inquiry made by John J. McCloy which shows:

"That Western industrialists have in recent weeks shown a great deal more interest in developing or restoring trade contacts with Communist-run Eastern Germany than before. . . . They are convinced that Western Europe and the Western Hemisphere cannot provide the Federal Republic with its needed export markets. Therefore, they seek to restore Grman trade with the East (both Soviet Germany and the satellite states) to the level of pre-war—some 35 to 40% of the German total."

12. On April 1, 1950, Jack Raymond reported from Frankfurt:

"Representatives of the East and West German Government have resumed negotiations for the lifting of the embargo on steel shipments from the Ruhr to the Soviet Zone."

Speaking about this East-West trade, Jack Raymond reported a Western Allied official as saying:

"He could not understand why the Western Germans wanted to sell to the East when they are not getting paid—unless they figure that they have nothing to lose anyway since the Economic Cooperation Administration keeps pouring in money. It is like increasing a loan to a borrower to maintain his interest in paying, the official added. The inevitable result is bankruptcy, not for the borrower, but for the lender."

13. On April 24, 1950, Ernest Leiser made the following comment about East-West trade:

"What is happening, U. S. investigators report, is that if the authorities in Eastern Germany have an alternative of buying goods from Western Germany or West Berlin for approximately equal prices, they invariably take those from Western Germany."

14. On April 12, 1950, Joseph Alsop, in the New York Herald Tribune, wrote a lengthy article about the extensive illegal trade going on between the East and West through Vienna:

"What is considerably more important, Vienna is also the main entrepot for trade between the Soviet empire and Western Europe. A good deal of this trade is of course carried on directly especially when there are advantages in this method. An order of 100,000 tons of steel rails for Red China has recently been used to turn the German industrialists in Dusseldorf against the Western Allies and to woo their support for Soviet connected German Rightist Parties. . . . The Dusseldorf leaders who still go regularly to the Soviet Zone will tell you that the East German industries received over 500,000 tons of steel—and steel of high quality too—from the Soviet Zone in the past year.

"Vienna is the first place the Soviet agent would go for ball bearings, radar equipment, servo-mechanisms, and other such vital contraptions. By devious methods, these supposed scarcity items can actually be secured here."

In another article dated March 27th from Frankfurt, Alsop reported:

"At a recent dinner in Dusseldorf this correspondent found that all of the 7 big industrialists at the table were being almost daily besieged with generous business offers and flattering soft words by East German emissaries of the Soviet High Command."

15. On May 19, 1950, Jack Raymond reported to The New York Times:

"Ruhr steel manufacturers have maintained continuing pressure for raising the embargo. They have recently issued statements attempting to tie up the steel ban—which they regard as Western Allied rather than German policy—with the Schuman proposal for pooling the West European steel and coal industries, particularly those of France and Germany. . . . Bonn officials are described as hesitant to resume steel exports to the East but they are under heavy pressure from steel manufacturers."

16. On May 16, 1950, Joseph Newman in the New York Herald Tribune discussed the latest Soviet decisions in Germany covering political and economic measures. Point 5 of these measures called for:

"Increased trade with West German businessmen who are to be encouraged to violate the Western restrictions on trade with the East and to believe that their economic future lies in the East."

Point 6 called for:

"More vigorous protests against dismantling of plants in West Germany and a stronger appeal to German nationalism."

17. On May 6, 1950, John MacCormack wrote a dispatch to the New York Times in which he reported that the U. S. officials were greatly concerned about the supervision of American exports in order to tighten the restrictions on East West trade.

"Austria has recently become the object of official attention in Washington because of the discovery that she has been a means of providing Russia and her satellites with strategic or semi-strategic materials. The latest example was a shipment of between two and three million dollars of seamless steel tubing—in the 1A category as a strategic material—and 30 tons of fittings from Soviet Germany to the Soviet Oil Administration here for use in extracting Austrian oil.

"The shipment apparently originated in Dusseldorf in the British Zone of Germany, was sent to France where a French export credit was supplied, and then transported down the Rhine. . . . Western Germany is said to be the real Achilles heel of American enforcement."

On that same subject, a UP dispatch dated June 4th to the New York Times revealed:

"Critical industrial items banned by the Allies for export to Russia are moving eastward from West Germany at a rate of from 10 to 20 tons a month, competent sources said today.

"Top men of three of the Ruhr's largest steel companies agree that the known traffic averaged from 10 to 20 thousand tons a month, and maybe considerably more. The items handled top the list of 'prohibited exports.'"

18. In a lengthy article titled "East Germany's Boom in Output Proves Major Soviet Asset" (Christian Science Monitor, May 4, 1950), Paul Wohl disclosed the rising strength of Eastern Germany. Analyzing the East-West steel trade, Wohl said:

"Under the Frankfurt agreement, West Germany was to deliver about 335,000 tons of iron and steel to East Germany between October 1949 and June 1950—mainly special and high quality steel for the operation of engineering industries at the reconstruction of chemical factories, etc. Most of this steel has been delivered.

"In addition, several hundred thousands tons of high quality Ruhr steel is reported to have reached East Germany through special channels, mainly by truck. At least 100,000 tons were imported from Austria which, with the Marshall Plan help, is building up an excessive steel capacity."

19. According to the Swiss daily, Tages Anzeiger of Zurich, the Russians offered an inducement to the West German industrial magnates to do business with China. The paper reported that a contract was offered to the Germans to deliver 100,000 tons of railway trucks to China. The British learned about it and intervened.

Vera Micheles Dean, writing in a recent issue of the Foreign Policy Bulletin (published by the Foreign Policy Association), frankly states:

"Russia might invite Western Germany, already looking about for export outlets, to provide technicians and machinery for the industrialization of China."

And she adds significantly:

"Such an invitation could not be lightly disregarded by any German Government, whether controlled by industrialists hostile to communism, or by Communists."

Another keen observer of the political scene, Marquis Childs, said in one of his columns from Berlin:

"(Leaders of the Free German Committee) are said to have gone to China where along with Russian observers they are attached to headquarters of Communist military leaders. According to one source, General Paulus himself is in Peiping. Back of all this speculation is the solid fact that the owners and managers of German industry want to find an outlet for their products and their skills in Eastern Europe and Asia."

20. Drew Middleton, in a dispatch to the New York Times from Frankfurt, reported:

"The embargo on shipment of steel to Eastern Germany, proclaimed by the Bonn Government, is not operating effectively and about 1,000 tons of steel a day are entering the Soviet Zone. . . .

"The major error of the tragicomedy of errors was the failure of the Bonn Government to suspend previously issued export licenses for steel to Eastern Germany when it had decided to impose the embargo.

"There were 'literally hundreds' of these licenses outstanding, according to a United States official, and their holders continued to ship steel as though nothing had happened.

"In the view of American observers, the Western powers with the best intentions relied on the Bonn Government to shut off a valuable German trade relationship with Eastern Germany. The Government did so, but forgot the existence of the outstanding export licenses, an error that allowed the powerful steel interests in northwest Germany to continue the business. . . ."

21. Mr. Leiser of the Overseas News Agency reported:

"The most reliable information available indicates an enormous jump during the past year in the steel output of the Soviet Zone of Germany. A year ago production was at a negligible 450,000 tons, far below that needed for the Zone. Today it has risen to a rate of more than 1,000,000 tons annually—still a small figure, but phenomenally higher than before. The target for 1950 is 1,350,000 tons and early in 1951 a plant is expected to be completed in Brandenburg which would raise total output to nearly 1,750,000 tons.

"A good deal of that increase, American economic analysts declare, can be attributed directly to the shipments which the industrialists of the Ruhr have sent to the Soviet Zone in the framework of a general trade agreement between the Federal Republic and East Germany. It has become obvious that these shipments have included not simply raw steel ingots or finished steel products as envisaged, but actually the machines and tools with which the East Germans can make steel. . . ."

In conclusion, the alarm felt by private trade circles has now found expression in Congress. A prominent Republican Congressman, Kingsland Macy, who for a number of years has been advocating that German scrap be brought to the United States where it has been so badly needed, has recently raised his voice again from the floor of the House of Representatives with regard to this matter. Congressman Macy's exposé in a speech from the floor August 16, 1950, shows the lengths to which the German industrialists have gone in their efforts to hamper our rearmament program.

In Congressman Macy's own words:

"I have never been able to understand the wisdom of leaving in western Germany a huge stockpile of just the kind of steel scrap we particularly need. Common sense should have dictated a greater use of homecoming empty bottoms resulting from carrying relief to western Europe for transferring this stockpile from a highly exposed position to a more protected and much more advantageously useful one in the United States of America."

At this point Mr. Macy read a UP dispatch:

"Frankfurt, August 15: Angry American steel-scrap dealers accused west German Government officials and industrialists today of sabotaging the United States rearmament program by slashing exports to America so they can sell more to Russian satellite countries.

"The Americans said the action was outright sabotage and will add millions of dollars to the present price tag on United States rearmament expenditures.

"The scrap dealers cabled a protest to high officials in Washington over the signature of D. J. Lewis, secretary of the Scrap Iron & Steel Import Corp., New York, largest United States dealer in scrap.

"'Soviet satellite countries,' the protest said, 'are obtaining the major part of the available scrap supply.' It said United States efforts to buy scrap were hamstrung by newly imposed West German Government regulations.

"The scrap dealers said they protested to U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, John J. McCloy, but that he said the restrictions were purely a German affair."

And while the Germans refuse to help us in our rearmament program, they apparently don't mind helping the Russians in their rearmament program. According to Congressman Macy:

"220,000 tons of high grade scrap have been moved to the Iron Curtain countries under trade agreements the West Germans agreed to honor."

EPILOGUE

Lest the democracies think that the economic collaboration between the Ruhr industrialists and the Iron Curtain countries is limited to foreign trade, they are due for another shock—if indeed that be possible in our times. This collaboration has now extended to the domestic field as well. The Ruhr industrialists have decided that the best way to advertise their wares is to insert large ads in the Freies Volk, the chief communist paper in Duesseldorf. Among the advertisers in the July 8, 1950, issue were the notorious combines, Guttehoffnungshuette and Demag. Don Cook of the St. Louis Post Dispatch, August 7, 1950, had this comment to make: "It is difficult to believe that a communist newspaper is a really effective advertising medium for industrial equipment for engineering firms, and the conclusion that the owners of these new companies are trying to buy insurance in case of trouble in Europe, is an obvious one."

A month later, September 7, 1950, the Neue Zeitung reported a press conference held by the United States Commissioner for Bavaria, Dr. George Shuster (Arthur H. Sulzberger of The New York Times was present), at which time it was revealed that in addition to advertising in the communist press, German industrialists have secretly sent large money contributions to the Communist Party in Western Germany. No comment.

A Letter to the U. N. On German Rearmament

Prevent World War III has endeavored to provide its readers with important information and data pertaining to major developments in Germany. As a continuation of this educational service, this magazine prints below the text of a letter to the Secretary General of the United Nations, in connection with current movements to rearm the Germans.

In this letter, the Society notes the efforts of the United Nations to prevent the Korean conflict from spreading to other parts of the world, and expresses the belief that the creation of Germany's war-making power would aggravate the present tensions and could lead to new outbreaks. Therefore, the Society suggests that the Secretary General recommend to the Security Council that the Secretariat be empowered to form a fact-finding committee to investigate the four zones of Germany on the specific problem of industrial rearmament and remilitarization.

His Excellency Trygve Lie August 4, 1950.
Secretary General of the United Nations

Excellency:

The stated purpose of the United Nations as regards Korea aims to prevent the conflict raging there from engulfing the rest of the world. With this in mind, may we respectfully suggest that current developments in Germany demand your immediate attention, as they threaten to aggravate the present crisis and lead directly to a third world war.

In the Eastern and Western Zones of Germany tension is mounting, as numerous reports in the press show that there are movements afoot to revive Germany's war arsenal and her military power. Whatever the motivations behind these movements, it is clear beyond a doubt that unless all the zones of Germany are kept demilitarized permanently, the United Nations objective to prevent new outbreaks will be vitiated. A race to rearm the Germans by the occupying powers will inevitably increase tensions to a point where the smallest incident could set off a new conflagration.

The peoples of the world, desiring peace and realizing the grave threat to their security from the rebirth of German military might, will undoubtedly welcome concerted action which would prevent the situation in Germany from getting out of hand. They look to the United Nations, not only to resolve the Korean war, but to check any developments that would sharpen the present crisis, and make world peace impossible.

Under Article 99 of the Charter of the United Nations: "The Secretary General may bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which, in his opinion, may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security." The Society for the Prevention of World War III deems developments in Germany as meriting your prompt action in accordance with Article 99 of the Charter. We respectfully urge that you act without delay on this crucial issue before it is too late.

Toward facilitating practical action by the Security Council we suggest:

A) That you recommend to it that the Secretariat be empowered to form a fact-finding committee to investigate the Four Zones of Germany on the specific problem of industrial rearmament and remilitarization.

B) As a fact-finding body such a committee would not be authorized to draw conclusions as to the policies pursued by each of the occupying powers in their respective zones of Germany.

C) The sole function of such a committee would be to collect all data pertaining to the industrial rearmament and remilitarization of Germany.

D) The report of this committee should then be submitted to the Security Council for further action.

In making this proposal, it is the considered judgment of the Society for the Prevention of World War III that an objective presentation of the facts as regards the remilitarization of Germany could be an effective barrier against whatever attempts are presently being made to revive Germany's war making capacity.

The peoples of the world are entitled to know the truth and their opinions in the long run are a far more trenchant corrective than is generally realized. We are supremely confident that your initiative to bring this vital matter to the attention of the Security Council will enhance your courageous efforts to establish world peace under the Charter of the United Nations.

Respectfully submitted,
Mark Van Doren, Chairman Herbert C. Pell, Vice-President

On the German Lobby

It was recently announced in the press that Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's rearmament wizard, had succeeded in having his book, Gold For Europe, translated into English.

In one sense, it is fortunate that Herr Schacht has been able to make his "study" available to English-speaking people. It should help many of us understand certain aspects of the German problem today, including the post-war plans of the Germans.

Herr Schacht, it will be recalled, was tried at Nuremberg for war crimes. Many people are still at a loss to understand why Herr Schacht escaped the gallows in view of his yeoman work in making it possible for Hitler to launch his wars of aggression.

Schacht's new book X-rays German thinking in high places. For example, one of his chapters is entitled: "The German Problem: Kernel of the World Crisis." Apparently defeat has not produced a sense of humility and modesty among the Germans. Schacht still echoes the Hitlerian notion that the world is nothing without Germany and that unless Germany is given her "rightful" place at the center of the universe, all is doomed. Schacht is quite frank about his scheme to place Germany on a special pedestal. According to Schacht, all that need be done is to return to Germany her lost colonies, fill her pockets with gold, and make other nations pay tribute in one form or another to German industrial might. Then, and only then, declares Schacht, can the world be saved.

Some people may say that this is only one German's opinion, but the truth of the matter is that Schacht's ideas are in reality the warp and woof of German policy today. That policy has been carried to the very shores of the United States by a well-financed German lobby.

The popularizing of the Schacht idea is a basic mission of the new German Consulate, Herr Hans Krekeler. Krekeler has had close ties with the Farben cartel in the past. As the nominal head of the German lobby in the United States he wastes no time in winning friends and influencing people.

Everyone knows that the Germans had an effective lobby in Washington prior to the war. Many astute observers declare that a case can be made for the charge that the lobby continued to operate even after Hitler declared war on the United States. Be that as it may, it dared to come out in the open several years ago when the German reparations issue was front page news. In the No. 29 issue of Prevent World War III, we discussed this development in an article entitled: "A New Lobby on the Hill." In that piece we brought out the fact that the German steel cartel had circulated a very expensive brochure among members of the 81st Congress, attacking the Allied reparations program. In another article: "Whither Western Europe," which appeared in the September-October issue of Prevent World War III, the author, Jean Pajus, revealed how the German steel interests had sent over G. V. L. Loesch, Managing Director of the Deutsche Edelstahlwerke, to convince Congressmen and Senators that the reparations program was "unjust."

In order to increase the effectiveness of the German lobby, the German cartel interests decided to employ the services of certain Americans. This was revealed on March 22, 1950, in the Brewery Worker, published by the International Union of United Brewery, Flour, Cereal, Soft Drink, and Distillery Workers of America. According to its correspondent:

"The House Lobby Investigating Committee has evidence that two of the most important figures in the conduct of this propaganda campaign against dismantling were lobbyists working from inside the Capitol."

The Brewery Worker reported that the Committee named as lobbyists John Crane and his wife, Joan.

The Brewery Worker states that John Crane has been an Administrative Assistant to Senator Malone while his wife, Joan, was employed for a while by Representative Katherine St. George. Though Senator Malone and Mrs. St. George have denied any knowledge of or responsibility for the "lobbying campaign" of the Cranes "both admitted hiring these 'inside lobbyists' and Mrs. St. George admitted paying the expenses of a trip last summer by Mrs. Crane to Germany during which she gathered much of the data she used to impress Senators with the desirability of stopping the dismantling program."

In connection with their activities, the Brewery Worker noted that neither John nor Joan Crane were "registered as a lobbyist or a foreign agent." Mrs. Crane's spadework for the Germans has been very effective and it is presently reported that she is lobbying for the German Steel Trust.

The Cranes made it a special point to visit Germany and gather material for smearing the reparations program. They succeeded in influencing many Senators who apparently were unaware of the background of the Cranes. The work of Mrs. Crane was lauded by leading German politicians and industrialists. On January 27, 1950, the Economic Press Digest from the Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany carried the following:

"The leading men of the steel industry met in Duisburg to celebrate the end of dismantling of the Thyssen works and to express their gratitude to Mrs. Joan Crane, an American, for her untiring work against dismantling. Dr. Adenauer thanked Mrs. Crane and those American circles who had helped to bring about an end to dismantling. The ovation given Mrs. Crane may be considered unique in the history of meetings of this kind. When she left the assembly, the ordinarily reserved West German industrialists rose to their feet and demonstrated their thanks and apreciation with a storm of applause." (Wirtschafts-u. Finanzzeitung.)

In view of the past successes of the German lobby in Washington, experienced observers anticipate that Herr Schacht's views will receive an influential audience. In this connection, The Brewery Worker posed a series of questions regarding the German lobby which have as yet gone unanswered:

"1. To what extent is such lobbying done by 'insiders' in Congress, either members of Congress or their representatives?

"2. Is this a loophole in the lobby registration law, or are such lobbyists required to register under the law as it stands?

"3. Who, if anyone, was paying the Cranes? Were they violating the foreign agents registration law?

"4. To what extent have liberals in this country been misled by a false front propaganda campaign conducted by German cartelists and Nazi sympathizers?"

Crossroad of Decision: German Rearmament

When Secretary of State Dean Acheson assumed office, the foundations of the North Atlantic Alliance had already been laid. General Marshall had negotiated in Paris the broad terms of the treaty with the British and the French; it was left to Acheson to carry the plan through to its diplomatic conclusion in Washington.

The military core of the North Atlantic Alliance lay in the establishment at Fontainebleau of a headquarters of the international General Staff which was to plan the defense of western Europe. The question arose promptly: what plan of defense should be followed in the event of war with the Soviet Union? For a while the impression prevailed in the popular press that if the Soviet troops pushed to the west they could not be stopped in Germany, so that the Allied plan would have to be based on defense of the Rhine.

But here was an obvious inconsistency in policy. Why, on the one hand, were we preparing to re-establish the industries of the Ruhr in all their economic majesty, if, in the event of war, we expected them to fall to the enemy? Little by little the mystery was dispelled. Hints of another strategy began to appear. An American senator dropped a word here, a British field marshal there, a French general elsewhere, until it became evident that deep inside the Alliance, like a pea in a pod, was the idea that the real plan was to defend the Ruhr; and that for this purpose Germany might have to be rearmed.

Large sections of the American and European press waxed enthusiastic over the prospect of re-creating a German Army, incorporating it into the military plans of the North Atlantic Alliance, and equipping it initially with supplies made available under America's Military Aid Program, eventually with German-made arms. Advocates of this course reasoned that the Soviets would eventually create an East German army to serve their purposes. Why should we not "beat them to the punch"? In fact, unverified reports of a strong East-German army (as distinguished from a police force) in the making began to circulate in Washington, while the Soviet press asserted that we had begun to train a secret army of West Germans. But leaders on both side were aware of the danger of adopting aggressive policies on the basis of such reports. The fact was that the struggle in Germany differed sharply in a fundamental respect from that in Korea, for example, where both the Soviets and ourselves openly trained hostile native armies on either side of the 38th parallel. A clash in Korea might be localized, or at least kept short of direct war between America and Russia. Not so in Germany. There sustained aggression by East Germans against West Germans, or vice versa, unquestionably meant the direct involvement of all the great powers. For either side to take the initiative in beginning the large-scale rearmament of Germans, in violation of pledges given, would be an act of great provocation and an incitement to world war.

Of this the Germans themselves were well aware. Some of them began to wonder publicly what the reaction in Moscow would be if the United States, backed by the British and French governments, were to begin to build up West German military strength beyond the police level. Might not the Soviets then feel impelled to launch a "preventive" war in their turn? Would they not see their only chance of success in striking before a West German army and production of munitions under a pro-American government should become strong enough to be a serious threat? Would German rearmament end by making Germany the battleground and the German people the chief victims of another world war?

While the possibility of German rearmament dawned on the public consciousness, relations between the United States and Russia remained fundamentally unchanged. The appointment of Acheson early in 1949 was matched by the Soviets with the replacement of Molotov as Foreign Minister by Andrei Vishinsky. The new ministers had the advantage of never having exchanged discourtesies up to that time, but if any betterment followed in the tone of world diplomacy, it was temporary and superficial; it did not extend to the underlying conditions of the struggle.

In that struggle the succession from Byrnes to Marshall to Acheson marked three fairly distinct stages. The essence of the heated debates between Byrnes and Molotov had been the organization of the liberated states of eastern Europe. There the Soviets had won. The bitter Marshall-Zhdanov fight had concentrated on Italy and France, where the United States had scored a victory. Now the focal point of the contest shifted to Germany; and if Acheson and Vishinsky were wielding rapiers rather than broadswords, and conforming better than their predecessors to the traditional rules of the duello, the weapons were none the less deadly.

II.

In the summer of 1949, when I was again in Europe, there was a great stirring and excitement over the question of reviving German military power. Responsible American journalists coming out of Germany in the late summer of that year reported that leading Germans were confident that rearmament was almost at hand. An important German steel manufacturer had said to an American correspondent that high United States army officers and many senators favored letting Germany establish an army of twenty-five divisions, and that this proposal was receiving favorable consideration in Washington. The manufacturer remarked enthusiastically, "With your atom bomb and our infantry, nothing could stop us!" A number of German deputies at Bonn had openly said to Americans that the German Government expected to be given participation in America's Military Aid Program; and they cited as evidence a recent statement by Senator George of Georgia urging German rearmament. Leaders of the German steel and chemical industries told American visitors that "it would be to America's interest to let Germany manufacture arms for western Europe"; and they claimed that this view was shared by important American officials and businessmen. It could not be gainsaid that arms manufacture might be a source of great profit for West German heavy industry; and with the long-range future of Germany uncertain, foreign investors as well as German owners were not unnaturally tempted by the chance of an immediate "killing" through rearmament.

It seemed to me strange that the Germans should spread such reports, which would certainly tend to create resistance to the idea of German rearmament in France and other countries. American and British journalists suggested an explanation—that the Germans were relying on the United States to take care of French opposition. Meanwhile, it was the strategy of the strong nationalistic elements in Germany to keep France in a state of tension. They believed that by preventing France and England from working together they would increase the influence of Germany on the continent and in American eyes. The Germans were acting on the assumption that America needed them, and would compel Europe to agree to their demands. That they were taking the outcome for granted was indicated by the fact that in a number of places in Germany groups of war veterans, wearing forestry uniforms and carrying wooden sticks in place of rifles, had begun to drill intensively every week end—a phenomenon which had been observed before in "defeated" Germany in the 1920s.

At this period the press was giving much publicity to the International Ruhr Authority. The hope was expressed that the newly established organization, with headquarters in Duesseldorf, would be able to exert real control over German production, and prevent the manufacture of illegal munitions. But this hope was swiftly dissipated. The Ruhr Authority, it developed, had been crippled at birth and by no less a force than the American State Department. The method used for this act of mayhem was the cutting away of funds. The organization was left with so weak a budget as to assure that it could have nothing but a weak policy. Lacking manpower and authority for firsthand investigation, it was compelled to rely on German sources for its data. Instructed to ignore minor violations, it had little recourse if the Germans wished to conceal major violations. To expect the Ruhr Authority to police German industry and to limit German munitions production was exceedingly optimistic, especially if the American and British governments should approve German rearmament.

The demonstrable facts were brought to official attention in Washington. It seemed inevitable that the French would presently react to the rumors seeping into Paris, and that President Truman would be called upon to comment. In fact, only a few weeks later he was asked about alarmist reports in the French press relating to German rearmament. There was no truth in the reports, the President accurately stated. About the same time, however, General Omar Bradley, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was subjected to questioning by reporters, and said that German rearmament was not being contemplated "at this time."

The idea was in the air. Debates in the West German Parliament brought violent attacks on Chancellor Adenauer by Socialists, who termed him "Chancellor of the Allies," because he advocated creation of a German Army "backed by German and American imperialism." Although Adenauer was compelled to drop his proposal, it seemed probable that it would only be a matter of time before it was revived in another form.

An English friend who had followed the issue carefully wrote me a letter which ended on a significant note. He said:

I hope your people realize that no single element of foreign policy would be more fraught with danger than the rearmament of Germany. In no way could our governments do more to assure another war and the total destruction of democracy in western Europe than by encouraging German rearmament. In no area could we work more directly for peace than by reinforcing our agreement with the Soviets to forego the rearming of Germany, both East and West. We stand at a crossroads of tremendous decision. The time is at hand when we must frankly face the question: is the purpose of our German policy the preservation of European democracy through peace or a short-lived revival of German industrial profits through war?

III.

The essential facts of the struggle were clear for all to see. The Soviet Union had imposed its socialized institutions on East Germany. We had opened the way for our "free enterprise" institutions on West Germany, not our democratic institutions, since it was idle to talk of German acceptance of democracy. To defend Soviet institutions ramifying into Prussia and Silesia, the Russians were said to be building up an East German army in the guise of a police force; to defend American institutions ramifying into the Ruhr and Bavaria, we were contemplating the rearmament of the west Germans.

In this competition we had the advantage of a traditional hostility against the Soviets on the part of most Germans, both in the east and the west. The Soviets, on the other hand, had the advantage of a strong impulse to socialism in the working masses of the German people. The labor unions in West Germany in particular were filled with resentment at the domination of their government by big business cartels re-established with American support.

Most Germans, east and west, deeply yearned for the re-establishment of a unified German state, free from foreign control. If and when such unification became feasible, it would certainly have to recognize the powerful urge to socialism both in the east, where socialist institutions were already established, and in the west, where the Socialist party was very strong. There was then a strong chance that the institutions of a unified and independent Germany, if and when it should come into being, would be closer to those of the Soviets than to the United States—that is to say, those institutions might well turn out to be authoritarian and socialistic.

It also had to be considered that the unification of Germany depended even more on the willingness of the Soviets to agree to it than on the Western Allies.

There was much talk of a possible "deal" between the Russians and the violently nationalistic right-wing groups whose power was steadily growing in Germany. A certain affinity for the extreme anti-democratic left showed itself in the speeches of the extreme anti-democratic right. They understood each other. Some of the most influential German industrialists, diplomats, and former military leaders were reliably reported to be in touch with Soviet officials in East Germany and ready to conspire with them to link Germany to Russia by military and economic ties, in order to achieve German freedom from foreign control.

Three main purposes underlay the flirtation between the right-wing Germans and the Soviets. First, they wanted a unified Germany, preferably extending to the 1937 boundaries, and including the Neisse River provinces which Russia had given to Poland. Second, they looked for a resumption of large-scale German-Soviet trade. Third, they sought a non-aggression pact, under the terms of which German sovereignty would be respected. These were aspirations close to the hearts of almost all Germans. In addition, many of them shared a strong desire to eliminate the large holdings of American and British financial groups in German industry.

Even if the potentially anti-American right-wing groups of the new Germany could be kept under control, another dangerous possibility confronted us. What would happen if, at some carefully chosen moment, the Soviet Union were to bid for the good will of the German socialists and offer the people of West Germany unification with East Germany in a "popular-front" government? When I discussed this question with west Europeans of half-a-dozen nations I was impressed by the similarity of their replies. They believed that large elements of the powerful Socialist party of West Germany might yet come under radical nationalistic leadership and turn toward the Soviets. This belief was based in part on the steady rise among German socialists of anti-democratic leaders who belonged to the school of radical Nazis "purged" by Hitler in 1934—men who favored nationalization of industry, and who in political practice were only a short distance removed from the Communists.

The purposes of such an anti-democratic left-wing coalition, should it emerge, would be largely identical with those of the extreme right, so far as concerned the unity and boundaries of Germany and friendly relations with Russia. The essential difference of aim between the two groups lay in the fact that the radical German socialists, like the Communists, would almost certainly advocate nationalization of heavy German industry—a measure opposed, of course, by the rightists.

This, then, was the consensus of opinion among informed Europeans: if the Soviets failed to come to terms with the nationalistic right wing in West Germany, they might succeed with the nationalistic left wing.

Facing this danger, the American Government had to anticipate the crisis that would arise if a nationalistic, anti-democratic coalition, of whatever political complexion, should achieve enough voting strength to reach out for dominance in West Germany, with a rapprochement with Russia as their goal. In such an event America, England, and France would certainly incline to override the results of election and maintain in power at Bonn a West German government shaped to their liking.

The natural Soviet countermove would then be to foment civil disturbances in Berlin and West Germany, ostensibly to protest against "undemocratic" Allied policy, but actually to compel troops of the Western Allies to use force against German civilians. This, of course, would be a circumstance calculated to tap the strong German nationalistic feeling for the benefit of the Soviets.

Carrying surmise another step, one could anticipate an effort by our government to relieve our occupation forces of the necessity of shooting German rioters by organizing a strong West German military force. At this stage armament of Communists in Germany by the Soviets and disorders in West Germany might easily produce a situation approximating civil war; and the direct involvement of the Western Allies and Russia in the internal German struggle would be highly probable.

We could not, of course, afford to stand by and let the Soviets rearm the East Germans to the point where an army of German Communists might try to overrun West Germany. Should they try to do so, we would almost certainly match and overmatch them, by rearming the West Germans. But unless and until the Soviets began to build up a powerful East German military force threatening West Germany, the rearmament of West Germany by ourselves might prove a decisive action in producing a third world war.

In sum, the situation stood as follows: if without provocation we rearmed West Germany, as part of the North Atlantic Alliance, we invited aggression by the Russians to forestall us. If we allowed nationalistic and anti-democratic elements to grow in numbers in West Germany, we might find ourselves compelled to establish a German army under a right-wing dictatorship—an action which would bring civil war and world war measurably closer.

IV.

The crisis of decision in the matter of German rearmament moved appreciably nearer in May of 1950, when France's Foreign Minister Robert Schuman put before Acheson and Bevin a proposal to merge the steel production of Germany, France, Belgium, and Luxemburg, and possibly England, under joint governmental supervision.

This idea was a brilliant adaptation to political reality of the French conviction that Germany could be made "safe" only by linking her western lands with France, England, and the Low Countries, through ties of mutual economic interest.

The German Government professed itself delighted, and American opinion was highly favorable. At a single stroke the Schuman Plan (said to have originated with the economist-statesman Jean Monnet and to have had the blessing of American authorities before its formal presentation) promised to achieve three desired ends:

1. Better relations between western Germany and France;

2. Practical action looking toward the economic integration of western Europe;

3. Removal of the last limitations on German steel production (thus reducing American costs in Germany) without shocking the political sensibilities of the French.

Immediately after Schuman made this proposal, the High Commissioners in Germany announced that the Bonn government would be permitted to determine the ownership of the Ruhr industries, thus virtually assuring the return of those industries to former owners who had been temporarily deprived of legal control.

There could be no doubt that the Schuman proposal, once put into effect, would give official sanction to the international steel cartel. Anti-cartelists heatedly protested on this account. Their argument was weakened, however, by the fact, known to most European economists and statesmen, that the cartel already existed. The only question was whether it was to be openly recognized and controlled, or permitted to operate in secret. The Schuman plan at least gave promise of providing for a degree of actual governmental regulation of the cartel. It was an interesting fact that the chief initial opposition to the Schuman plan in France came on the one hand from the French Communists and on the other from the association of French steel masters, the Comité des Forges. Some thought that the public objections of the latter were part of a political trick to confuse the real opponents of the plan. It may be, however, that the Comité des Forges actually feared the eventual reduction of its power, if formal governmental regulation of the steel cartel's operations was established.

Against the plan, too, were the German Socialists, headed by Kurt Schumacher, who saw it as a heavy blow to their hopes for eventual nationalization of the German steel industry. The British Socialist government was also perturbed, not only by the effect of the plan on its own proposal for nationalization of British steel plants, but also by the prospect of increased industrial competition from Germany.

In Washington, too, some dubious aspects of the plan were recognized. It seemed likely that under the conditions of the Schuman proposal West Germany's annual steel production, which officially stood at a rate of 11,000,000 tons in 1950, and was probably well in excess of that figure, would rise swiftly to 20,000,000 tons. Even allowing for Germany's increased internal demand for steel, especially for her housing program, there was reason to think that the new west European steel association, should it achieve substance, would shortly find a substantial steel surplus on its hands.

Strong pressure might be expected to turn part of that surplus over to German industry for use in the manufacture of arms. When, at about the same time that Schuman made his proposal, President Truman spoke of the possibility of reducing America's defense costs in the years ahead, some thought he contemplated the possibility of German arms production to relieve us in part of the necessity of producing arms for Europe under the Military Aid Program. Although there was no evidence that this thought was in the President's mind, it was certainly in the minds of influential military authorities in Washington. On the other hand, some high army officers were said to have held the opinion that at the first move to reconstitute West Germany as a center of military power Russia might move to occupy the Ruhr, and begin war at once, with German industry in her hands, rather than wait until Germany had become a potential aggressor against her.

It was certainly the part of wisdom to make sure that the Schuman plan would not turn into a short cut to war. If the plan meant a west European steel surplus, was it not at least possible to find non-military markets for that surplus? Two such markets suggested themselves. One was the American market. Our steel interests, operating their plants at full capacity, and eager to avoid expansion of facilities, faced a possible shortage of steel. Conceivably, under suitable conditions, large quantities of steel might be imported from Europe to make up any deficit appearing in the United States, to the benefit of the European trade position, and with the effect of reducing the economic drain on America through the Marshall Plan. Beyond this, part of the European steel surplus might be converted into non-military goods wanted by eastern Europe, to the stimulation of East-West trade, assuming, of course, that political tensions between the Soviets and America could be eased to the point where an enlargement of such commerce was feasible.

For those primarily concerned with preservation of world peace, the virtue or danger of the Schuman plan lay primarily in the answer to a simple question: would the European steel surplus under this plan be used for revival of German arms production or for an increase in peaceful East-West trade and European-American trade? The peace of the world might well depend on our ability to keep West Germany not only democratic in its governmental form, not only pro-American in its sentiment, but demilitarized, and dedicated to the interests of peace only. To achieve the delicate balance of forces necessary to these ends was an undertaking far more difficult than was generally realized by the American people or, for that matter, the American Congress. It is safe to say that, as the new decade unfolded, and as President Truman contemplated the problem of Germany, he knew that our decisions there, perhaps more than anywhere else, would dictate the success or failure of the postwar American foreign policy which had evolved under his direction, and the goal of which, as he saw it, was peace.

Nazi Industrialists Regain Hold On German Press

by
Dr. Frederick Wallach

THE TIMING

In the fall of 1949, a Restitution Court in Germany rendered a verdict which adjudged Robert Bosch, one of Hitler's leading armament industrialists, to be a victim of National Socialism and, therefore, entitled to restitution under Military Government Law No. 59. On July 17, 1950, there appeared a small notice on the front page of Stuttgart's leading newspaper, the Stuttgarter Zeitung, that its co-publisher, Franz Karl Maier, had left the paper, "on the basis of a mutual agreement."

Unfortunately, the American press did not carry these stories though they reflect a grave threat to the status of the independent German democratic press established under the protection of the Allies after the end of the war. It is significant that these reports came at a moment when Hitler's war arsenal, the Ruhr, is emerging from "the doldrums" and strenuous efforts are being made to remilitarize the former enemy as an "ally" of democracy.

Though it is acknowledged that in rearming the Germans the West is undertaking a "calculated risk," leading Allied officials are determined to go ahead regardless of the possible disastrous consequences to the security of the West. Needless to say, the job of selling the remilitarization of Germany to the peoples who have suffered under the Nazi occupation will not be easy. But in addition to "convincing" Germany's victims, it is now necessary to tackle German apathy on this question. This, too, will not be an easy task since the occupation authorities have been trying to make the Germans believe that militarism is their besetting sin. To generate a certain amount of enthusiasm among the Germans, it is obvious that all channels of public opinion will have to be mobilized. That is where the German press comes in.

The development of a free and independent democratic press in Germany has been one of the few triumphs of the Western Occupation of Germany. How long it will be able to exist in the face of remilitarization plans is now open to question. It is against this background that Nazi industrialists and former Hitler supporters are being provided with the opportunity to regain control of vast sections of the German press. This is true in spite of the fact that under press Law No. 5 the Allied High Commission is empowered to protect the integrity of the German press.

THE NAZI PRESS MONOPOLY

To understand what is now occurring, it is necessary to describe in brief the status of the Nazi press under the Nazi regime. The chief Nazi propagandist, Joseph Goebbels, regarded the press as a vital instrument for the molding of the minds of the Germans. When Hitler grabbed power in 1933, the radical press was suppressed almost immediately. As to the so-called "bourgeois" press, other methods were employed. These papers retained their names and the trimmings of independence. In reality they were owned by the Nazi party and transmitted Nazi propaganda though in a more moderate tone than the official Nazi press. Obviously this was designed to give the impression that the Nazis had not taken over the complete field of journalism. However, through Nazi holding companies, the so-called independent publishing houses of the "bourgeois" press were kept securely under the thumb of Hitler and his cohorts. To round out the picture of the Nazi press monopoly, it must be mentioned that even papers owned by individual Nazis were gobbled up by the press monopoly of the Nazi Party.

THE GERMAN PRESS UNDER THE ALLIES

The Allies were well aware of the transformation which had taken place with regard to the ownership of the German press under the Nazi regime. Thus Allied Law No. 2 not only abolished the National Socialist Party and its organizations, but "all other Nazi institutions used by the Party as tools." Article I, Paragraph 2, of the said law, expressly abolished the Franz Eher Verlag, the chief holding company under the Nazi press monopoly. Additional Allied regulations provided for the seizure of the properties and facilities of the so-called "bourgeois" press. These properties were placed under German trustees who, upon Allied orders, leased the principal facilities and equipment to the licensed press which was created by the Allies. However, since the licensing of the press in Western Germany is now abolished, the independent German democratic press depends for its continued existence on the rather limited length of their leases obtained from the trustees. The Allies are aware that if the printing facilities should ever fall in the hands of their former Nazi owners, the German democratic press would be destroyed. As mentioned above, the Allies possess sufficient power to prevent this disaster, but they have not intervened and apparently will not act. Indeed, the decision in the Bosch case opens a wedge through which former Hitler supporters among the German industrialists could regain title to the properties which had been originally seized by the Allies as Nazi owned.

HOW THE BOSCH PRESS CARTEL WAS TAKEN OVER BY THE NAZIS

It had been customary for German industrialists to own their own publishing houses so as to further their private interests. The Robert Bosch was no exception. The Bosch cartel had been created by Robert Bosch, a brother of the late Karl Bosch, the first German head of the notorious I. G. Farben Chemical Combine. The activities of the Bosch cartel were well known by U. S. officials in both world wars. The U. S. Government possessed sufficient evidence to show that Bosch had closely cooperated with the German General Staff. In both world wars, the United States Alien Property Custodian seized the American subsidiaries of Bosch on security grounds and on the basis that these subsidiaries owed their first allegiance to Germany.

As the power of the Bosch cartel grew under the Weimar Republic, its founder, Dr. Robert Bosch, decided to round out his economic dominion by exercising a decisive political influence in his home state of Wuerttemberg. In order to do so, he created, with the help of dummy corporations, a press cartel which virtually bossed public opinion in his state until the arrival of the Nazis. Aside from owning vast book-printing and book-binding establishments, Bosch owned the printing plant and offices now in use by the Stuttgarter Zeitung, the leading newspaper of Stuttgart today.

In February, 1936, Dr. Bosch sold his press holdings to the Nazis, receiving as a reward no less than 4 million RM. Dr. Bosch was obliged to transfer his newspaper interests to the Nazis because of the previously described Nazi press monopoly, which had even absorbed the papers of faithful adherence to the Nazi cause. As he was amply rewarded, Bosch did not complain.

It is interesting to note that no less a figure than Hermann Goering negotiated with Bosch concerning the transfer of his properties. While reluctant at first to deal with Nazi underlings, Bosch was willing to talk turkey with Goering and it is beyond any doubt that Hitler's right-hand man promised Bosch substantial armament orders as compensation for the sale of his press holdings.

BOSCH'S CONNECTIONS WITH THE NAZIS

Bosch received great honors from the Nazis as well as juicy armament orders. He had free access at all times to the Nazi bigshots, including Hitler. Indeed, Bosch remained a member of the Nazi Reichstag until his death (of natural causes). He received one of the highest honorary titles Hitler's third Reich could bestow, namely, that of "Pioneer of Labor."

The Bosch corporation was also declared to be an "exemplary Nazi firm," an honorary title which was to be tacked on to the name of the firm. This rare and coveted honor was granted only to those firms which had convinced the Nazis that they were organized 100% as prescribed by the Nazi Party. To be deemed 100% organized, a German industry would have to dismiss all "non-aryans," maintain strict adherence to the "leadership principle" and enact mandatory regulations for the wearing of Nazi uniforms by all employees, at Nazi meetings. In addition, a 100% organized firm would have to smash all union activities and force its workers to join up with Dr. Ley's (hanged in Nuremberg) Labor Front. Finally, such a firm would have to participate in all Party festivals and celebrations, contribute substantial funds for Nazi Party purposes and grant preferential positions to the favored sons of the Nazi Party. On October 17, 1941, Bosch was named the No. 1 of the "elite class" among the six leading Nazi industrialists by the Nazi Economic Minister Funk for his wholehearted cooperation and allegiance to the Nazi cause.

HOW THE BOSCH CARTEL PREPARED ITS RETURN TO PRESS POWER

When Dr. Robert Bosch died, the seven executors of his will, all Bosch stalwarts, were faced with an apparently impossible job, namely to restore the old Bosch Press Cartel. Article I of Allied Restitution Law No. 59 provided that only "opponents" of Hitler's Third Reich who lost their property for reasons of their opposition to the Nazis could hope to receive restitution.

Moreover, the General Claims Law of the American Zone of Occupation, while providing compensation for money damage inflicted on victims of Nazism, further stipulated that the granting of such compensation excluded anyone "who had supported the Nazi dictatorship." Therefore, the chances to obtain restitution for the Nazi armament profiteer Bosch, appeared slim. The picture became even bleaker when a restitution court in Greater Hesse decided that the so-called "bourgeois" press could not be considered an opponent of the Nazis. As Dr. Bosch's papers were originally part of this section of the German press, it seemed to be a foregone conclusion that the executors of the Bosch will would fail. Their fears, however, appear to be short-lived.

In view of the fact that the situation in Germany has been radically changing and that the United States favors militarization of the former enemy, the Bosch people concluded that all was not lost. Consequently, they resumed the fight to regain control over the press. There were many factors including the general situation which led the Bosch interests to believe that they would succeed.

The Bosch Cartel had strong connections in the United States. At the outbreak of World War I, the Bosch subsidiary in the United States managed to obtain the collaboration of influential Americans, including the banker, George Murnane and Mr. John Foster Dulles, senior partner in the firm of Sullivan and Cromwell. When hostilities ceased, the Bosch cartel escaped decartelization thanks to General Clay. In addition, a retired American General, Arthur Wilson, returned to Germany to protect the Bosch interests. Therefore, the executors of Bosch's Will were supremely confident that their friends abroad would continue to lend their support.

Furthermore, the Bosch cartel had other trump cards, especially among the leading German politicians. The President of the West German Republic, Theodor Heuss, who had voted the dictatorial powers which had established the Hitler dictatorship in 1933, was not only a friend of Robert Bosch, but his official biographer. In his book on Bosch, Heuss extolled the armament king as dove of peace and a sworn pacifist. Indeed, Heuss believed that Bosch was one of the greatest of German democrats.

The Bosch people also had friends in the top echelon of the Government of Wuerttemberg-Baden, including the Minister President, Rheinhold Maier. These politicians could be trusted as subsequent events proved. The fact that the former co-publisher of the Stuttgarter Zeitung, Franz Karl Maier, was the public prosecutor of Dr. Hjalmar Schacht and had also indicted in 1947, the Minister President of Wuerttemberg-Baden, Rheinhold Maier, as well as Heuss' predecessor as Minister for Education, Herr Simpendoerfer, were also factors that the Bosch interests took into account.

Rheinhold Maier and Simpendoerfer had voted for the Enabling Act in 1933 which gave Hitler dictatorial powers. Moreover, Rheinhold Maier, on that occasion, showered praise on Hitler. Thanks to U. S. Army Lt. Col. Fritz Oppenheimer, a former officer in the Kaiser's army who later became an aide to General Clay and helped to scuttle effective denazification of Germany, Franz Karl Maier was dismissed as the public prosecutor.

It is noteworthy that Minister President Rheinhold Maier had been a Minister of Commerce in one of the Bosch controlled cabinets during the Weimar Republic. One could hardly expect Rheinhold Maier to take a determined stand in defending the state of Wuerttemberg against any claims which the Bosch people would institute for the return of the Bosch Press cartel. These were some of the favorable circumstances which impelled the executors of the Bosch will to take action. Indeed, such action appeared urgent in view of the fact that the Stuttgarter Zeitung under Franz Karl Maier, was a thorn in the side of those elements in Germany who never lost faith in the ideals of Hitler.

JUSTICE IN GERMANY

The Bosch lawyers, therefore, prepared the case under the most favorable conditions. As stated, the President of the Bonn Government had written a biography which whitewashed Robert Bosch. Another book appeared, entitled "Press In Chains" which claimed on page 146 that the Bosch press did not belong to the so-called "bourgeois" press which had been bought up by the Nazis. It was further stated in the book that the Bosch press had supported the foreign policy of the Weimar Republic. Strangely, however, the authorship of this book is anonymous, but it was accepted as a piece of evidence in favor of Bosch!

Another piece of evidence which was used in the court proceedings was that presented by a so-called expert on the Nazi Holding Co., VERA—one Professor Herr D'Ester. VERA had been created by the Nazis to buy up that portion of the German bourgeois press (General Anzeiger Presse) which did not oppose the Nazis. Herr D'Ester alleged that VERA had also bought up some newspapers which opposed the Nazis. This was supposed to help the Bosch claim for restitution since VERA had purchased the Bosch press in 1936. Finally, Bosch's private secretary, one of the seven executors of his will, signed a statement that Bosch never wanted to hand over his Press Cartel to the Nazis. These were the exhibits which were used by the Bosch lawyers to clinch the case!

If the judges at the trial had been independent and honest, Bosch might have failed, notwithstanding all of the tricks employed by the Bosch lawyers. But this was too much to expect from the present status of the German judiciary. Two of the three judges were ex-judges of the Nazi regime, and it goes without saying that they knew on which side their bread was buttered. The court proceedings were a farce. The judges turned out to be mere tools of the Bosch interests. It is an outrage that they ever claimed to have jurisdiction over this case since the Bosch Press cartel had been domiciled in Munich. In rendering their verdict, the judges said that Bosch did not want the Nazi rearmament orders, and that "as a matter of fact" Bosch did not receive these fat orders, but rather the Bosch Corporation! As to the honorary titles of "Pioneer of Labor" and of "Nazi Exemplary Firm," the court found that "even anti-Nazis could receive such honors." Therefore, based on the so-called evidence of ex-Nazis, Hitler supporters, pro-Bosch politicians, and anonymous authors, the court concluded that Bosch was a great democrat and a staunch opponent of Hitlerism.

It is obvious of course that if Bosch had been a true opponent of the Nazis he would have been liquidated long before his natural death. His faithful cooperation with the Nazis is a matter of public record, but the court ignored the facts. Other facts concerning Bosch's close cooperation with the Nazis (his co-ownership in the Nazi espionage outfit Transocean News Agency in the United States, his blocking of the use of Bosch patents by the United States Navy and Funk's speech in Bosch's home) were not introduced into the record of the court proceedings.

VICTORY THROUGH BLACKMAIL

With this victory under their belt, the Bosch executors did not lose a minute. Having been assured that the Government of Wuerttemberg-Baden would not take any vigorous action in appealing the decision, they immediately approached the Stuttgarter Zeitung with an ultimatum. They informed the publishers that their lease of the printing facilities would not be renewed unless Bosch was able to dominate the policies of the paper. The publishers of the Stuttgarter Zeitung were told that if they did not "come across," they would be tied up in law suits aimed at taking over the printing facilities and other equipment. As an additional measure, the Bosch people warned the publishers of the Stuttgarter Zeitung that the defunct "Stuttgarter Neues Tagblatt," which had been originally published by Bosch, would be revived so as to undermine the circulation of the Stuttgarter Zeitung. These threats made an impression on two of the co-publishers who meekly submitted to the Bosch dictate. The third publisher, Franz Karl Maier, defied Bosch and sold his interests rather than knuckle down to the Nazi cartel.

At present the Stuttgarter Zeitung is published by the two remaining co-publishers since Bosch is clever enough to proceed with caution at this time. The Bosch interests know that it is better to keep this scandal from the public so as to maintain the impression in the minds of the people that the Stuttgarter Zeitung is still an independent paper. There can be no doubt, however, that when the appropriate time comes, Bosch will return triumphantly. In the meantime, the two co-publishers are taking their orders.

THE FUTURE

The victory of Bosch will have far-reaching implications. It clears the way for other industrial war lords and Hitler supporters to regain control of their newspapers. The fact that a substantial number of ex-Nazis have returned to the bench in the German courts should help legalize future coups. On the other hand, the prospect for the independent German democratic press is black indeed inasmuch as the greater part of the publishing facilities in West Germany were originally owned by Nazis and Hitler supporters.

As this development proceeds, the Allied High Commission maintains its "watch on the Rhine" from the Petersberg mountain where Chamberlain had once appeased the Nazis and prepared the infamy of Munich. The Germans must have possessed an ironic sense of humor when they offered Petersberg to the Allied High Commission. It is from this vantage point that the Allied High Commission continues to issue its monthly and weekly reports trying to reassure the world that the democratic press in Germany is a safe and a "going concern."

"Chancellor Adenauer and Dr. Schumacher have agreed that they will jointly fight the renaissance of another generals' regime. However, that danger emerges in Germany as soon as a German army is formed . . . If there should be a German army, then it would be the generals of such an army who, at a critical state, might make the decision for Germany on East or West . . ."

A Statement On German Rearmament

by
Mark Van Doren

In dealing with the Korean crisis the United Nations called for the cooperation of all governments to prevent the conflict from spreading to other parts of the world. Toward that end, the United States pledged its full support and the President has assured the American people that the action taken in Korea is designed to avert the catastrophe of a third world war.

Yet this dangerous moment, when world peace hangs in the balance, has been seized by German master-minds to evade the consequences of their aggressions, and to prepare the groundwork for resurgent German military might. Since the end of World War II the Germans have sought by every possible means to play off East against West. They have gone further by artfully fostering a climate of fear, suspicion, and instability among our Western Allies. The German strategy thrives on crises as the means to extract concession after concession, aiming at the eventual rebuilding of Germany's war-making power. The German militarists and their friends see in the Korean conflict the payoff for their long range plans to revive their arsenal for war.

The efforts of the United Nations to isolate the Korean conflict will be gravely impaired if Germany is permitted to produce war material and re-establish military forces. Since Germany has been a major bone of contention between the Russian and the Western democracies, it is inevitable that the recreation of German war potential and armed forces will provide the Russians with a legitimate pretext to further strengthen the military power of the Germans in the Soviet zone of occupation. This would touch off a race between East and West to rearm the Germans, thereby increasing tensions to a point where the smallest incident could set off a new conflagration.

It is stated that rearming the Germans is a military expediency; as if it were conceivable that a West German army would fight against an East German army! In the long run, however, it will hasten the disaffection of our most reliable friends in Europe, thus nullifying any possible short-term military advantages that may be gained. Indeed, even as a military policy, the strengthening of Germany's war potential may turn out to be a booby-trap for the West.

The free world must not fall prey to the delusion that present-day Germany is a reliable bulwark of democracy. The free world cannot effectively meet the Communist challenge by resorting to short-sighted military policies which ignore the nefarious record of the Germans and bypass those political and moral factors which will ultimately determine the fate of Western solidarity.

The United States must not permit itself to appear as the initiator of German rearmament at a moment when we are endeavoring to strengthen the moral, military, and political unity of the Western democracies. Psychologically, the United States would be committing a terrible blunder by remilitarizing the Germans, who only recently ravaged the lands and homes of our Western Allies. It would create bitter disillusionment among the victims of Nazi aggression and alienate them from our common cause. What better propaganda could anti-American elements possess than to place the onus of the remilitarization of Germany on the United States!

Western Europe has been assured time and again that German recovery did not mean German rearmament. In the Petersberg Agreement of November 25, 1949, the Bonn Government pledged: "its earnest determination to maintain the demilitarization of the Federal territory and to endeavor by all means in its power to prevent the recreation of armed forces of any kind. To this end the Federal Government will cooperate fully with the High Commission in the work of the Military Security Board." If we are not to break faith with Western Europe, this agreement must be respected in letter and spirit.

In the long run the United States will be in a far stronger position morally and politically, if it continues to press for an iron-clad agreement prohibiting the remilitarization of the Germans by any State. As the international organization responsible for the maintenance of world peace and security, the United Nations should be encouraged by our government to bring about such an agreement. This policy would be in complete harmony with the basic objective of the United Nations in Korea, namely to preserve world peace.

"... But the problem is not that simple. What if the Allies agree that Western Germans shall be armed and proceed to create a defense force? What if this force is trained and equipped with weapons and munitions? Could it be readily picked off in an armored attack from the East and turned against the Allies?

"Another concern is the old and proper one of France and the Low Countries. An armed Germany is a threat to Western Europe—or so it has been for decades. The Frenchman wants no more invasions by armed Germans. His position is wholly understandable. What Russia may do he does not know, but what Germans with guns have done every time they have had a chance, the Frenchman knows only too well ..."

(From an editorial in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch)

Two Indispensable Books

Two books have recently been published which in our opinion deserve the careful study of all serious students of international affairs.

One of these books was written by Mr. James Stewart Martin, former Chief of the Decartelization Branch of military government in Germany. Mr. Martin's book is entitled All Honorable Men and as the jacket of the book declares: It is "The story of the men on both sides of the Atlantic who successfully thwarted plans to dismantle the Nazi cartel system."

Mr. Martin speaks with experience, having helped organize, with members of the anti-Trust Division, the Economic Warfare Section of the Government during the war. In February, 1945, he was assigned, at the request of the War Department, first to the Finance Division of the United States Group Control Council and then to the Financial Branch G-5 Division of the Supreme Headquarters, Allied Expeditionary Force (SHAEF). Later he was appointed Director of the Division for the Investigation of Cartels and External Assets in the Office of Military Government, and subsequently he was reassigned as Chief of the Decartelization Branch with the status of Division Director, the civilian equivalent of a general officer rating in the army.

Thus Mr. Martin's background fully equipped him to tackle one of the most important missions in the American occupation of Germany. All Honorable Men is Mr. Martin's accounting of his work and is, in effect, a report to the American people. He does not write with bitterness nor is there any attempt to sensationalize. All Honorable Men deals with facts supported by careful documentation including names, places, and dates.

Though Mr. Martin has dwelt primarily on the German cartel problem, his story throws light on many other aspects of the German problem. In other words, many things which have occurred in Germany during the past five years which seem incomprehensible, are cleared up by a reading of All Honorable Men.

Mr. Martin discusses certain key personalities in military government, such as General Clay, General Draper, Col. Bernstein, Brig. Gen. Hugh Hester, Lawrence Wilkinson, Phillips Hawkins, Richardson Bronson, Alexander Sacks, and many other important figures. Yet in discussing these men, Mr. Martin is not interested in smears or backslapping. Rather does he try to place all of these individuals and their ideas in proper perspective. They all symbolize certain policies and certain programs. Some represented those forces in military government which courageously tried to carry out the original directives of our government. Others tried to block their fulfillment.

After the defeat of Germany, it was clear that unless the German cartel network was smashed and her war potential industries deconcentrated, there could be no genuine peace nor security. Mr. Martin was fully aware of the significance of his mission and tried to serve his country to the best of his ability. He gathered around him a group of tireless workers who were equally imbued with his determination to carry out the pledges of our Government.

However, Mr. Martin and his heroic crew of trust-busters were confronted with a powerful obstacle, namely the long years of intimate cartel tieups between the Germans and their counterparts in the United States, Britain and France. In short, Mr. Martin and his co-workers were pioneering in the literal sense of the word. They were entrusted to do something which had never been accomplished before in the history of modern industry, namely to smash the cartel setup of Germany and deconcentrate its industries. Perhaps it was the very novelty of this mission which partially explains its ultimate failure.

But in the long run it seems that this lack of success was due to factors beyond the control of Mr. Martin and the Decartelization Branch. On the one hand, Mr. Martin was confronted with the inner conspiracy of the cartelists. On the other, most folks back home had a naive-like trust in paper directives. They were unaware of the fact that it takes willing hands to carry out policies, and since Germany was far off the American people left it up to their representatives in Germany to do the job. They could not know what was transpiring from day to day in the offices of the military government, and so they were for the most part ignorant of the "subtle changes" which were taking place in our treatment of the cartels.

Caught between the cartelists on the one hand and the general apathy of the American people, Mr. Martin and his group were virtually isolated. Mr. Martin had no effective means to alert the people back home except for a handful of courageous newspaper correspondents who from time to time lifted the curtain of conspiracy. It goes without saying that the men of the cartels exploited this situation to the fullest, at a time when Mr. Martin and his organization worked tirelessly to smash I. G. Farben, the German steel trust, the ball bearing trust, etc. They were the gallant soldiers of peace but they were overpowered by vested interests and the dead hand of public indifference.

Thus All Honorable Men is in reality the story of a great tragedy—a tragedy because the resurgence of the German trusts and cartels may be the precursor of future disasters to the well-being and security of the American people and their Allies. It remains to be seen, too, whether economic enterprise and commercial stability can be assured under conditions where German cartels spread their tentacles in the world markets.

In dealing with the failure to decartelize Germany, Mr. Martin does not generalize. Indeed, he is very specific and goes into great pains to give the case histories of many of the subjects with which he deals. He recounts how original Allied policy was sabotaged continuously by those who were duty-bound to carry it out. Among the significant episodes he relates is one in connection with military government Law No. 56 which was designed to deconcentrate Germany's powerful industries.

The law had finally been promulgated after many setbacks due to the undermining activities of General Draper who was General Clay's economic adviser. But when the decartelization branch officials were all set to go to work on the basis of this law, they were told by Mr. Richardson Bronson, who had succeeded Mr. Martin as Chief of the Decartelization Branch, that they were "to go easy." Mr. Bronson declared that there was to be no deconcentration of German heavy industry and that the German vertical monopolies were to be preserved. As this was in direct contradiction to the spirit of Law No. 56 as well as General Clay's own position, the members of the Decartelization Branch decided to take this matter up with General Clay. They were confident that General Clay would support them against this gross distortion of Law No. 56. Their hopes were in vain. General Clay informed them that Bronson's views were his own. Speaking about the steel industries in Germany he declared that they must be big enough to "live" in competition with the steel industries of other countries. In addition he said that the German steel firms must operate at a profit so as to bring the owners a "reasonable rate of return on investment." Mr. Martin describes what took place after General Clay had finished his statement:

"At this juncture, Alex Sacks raised a point. The history of the Ruhr steel industry, which would long since have been bankrupt but for a large government subsidy, emphasized the absurdity of guaranteeing a 'reasonable rate of return on investment' to the industry in a competitive market. What right did the owners of these combines have to this kind of consideration? Suddenly General Clay cut in. His face clouded up. His fist banged on the table. 'I did not come here to be lectured on decartelization.' He looked around the table. In a controlled voice he finished off: 'I hope that no one feels he has to leave.' He paused. 'I hope that everyone will feel that he can remain and work under the policy as I have stated it. Good night, gentlemen!' He rose and left the room."

General Clay's reply was a signal victory for the cartelists and their tools in military government. It was a victory for General Draper whose banking firm, Dillon, Read, had played a major role in building up the German steel trust. It was a triumph for Lawrence Wilkinson, the Director of the Economic Division who had helped to preserve the German ball bearing cartel in defiance of American directives. More important, it was a victory for those very same forces which had unleashed two world wars within a generation.

The breakdown of the decartelization program was therefore not accidental. It was not due to insufficient personnel or impractical policies. Rather was it the result of deliberate planning. Thus, Mr. Martin notes, the American people have won a war but the fruits of that victory have been squandered.

Concluding his brilliant study Mr. Martin says:

"The moral of this is not that Germany is an inevitable menace, but that there are forces in our own country which can make Germany a menace. And, more importantly, they could create a menace of their own here at home, not through a deliberate plot to bring about a political catastrophe, but as a calm judgment of 'business necessity.' The men who would do this are not Nazis but businessmen; not criminals, but honorable men."

The second book was written by Mr. James P. Warburg. Mr. Warburg is one of our clear thinkers on American foreign policy whose voice deserves a much greater audience. His new book, Faith, Purpose and Power, is a plea for a positive policy in the conduct of our foreign relations.

Few will deny Mr. Warburg's contention that much of our policy is merely the negation of Russian designs. Mr. Warburg rightly declares that such a policy can only play into the hands of the Russians. He is convinced that only long range plans and not merely military expediency will achieve success for the interests of the United States. As he says:

"Nothing could make clearer the sincerity of our basic ambition—to live at peace in the world rather than to dominate it—than our avowed readiness to accept the supra-national authority of the United Nations, transformed by charter amendment into a federal government of the world."

Writing further he states:

"The second thing we need to do is to recognize—far more clearly than we have—that hunger, poverty, disease and ignorance anywhere in the world are a threat to our own peace and our own prosperity."

While the United States alone cannot "cure" this misery, Mr. Warburg writes,

"We can supply the moral and material forces to get the wheel of progress off dead center. We can and must place ourselves and our resources at the service of humanity, wherever our help is wanted and can effectively be given to those who are struggling to help themselves and their neighbors."

Part of his book is devoted to discussing in more detail these two basic concepts. But there are other portions of his book which are of immediate significance to the American people. We refer in particular to his discussion of the question of the remilitarization of Germany. Mr. Warburg opposes the rearming of the Germans on the following grounds:

(a) The rearming of the Germans would not strengthen Western Europe because it "would destroy the fighting morale of France" and "would not guarantee that a rearmed Germany would fight for the security of Western Europe." As a shrewd observer of French politics and French history, he knows full well the deep-seated fear of the French vis a vis the resurgence of a strong remilitarized Germany. He knows that such a development would give ample ammunition to the French Communists and would thereby create disunity among the French people.

As for the Germans, Mr. Warburg rightly suspects German willingness to side with the Allies. He poses a question which has yet gone unanswered:

"Why should a German army be expected to fight on the wrong side of the Rhine with German soldiers exposed to atomic attack and all of Germany in Russian hands?"

He shows that the Germans who are anxious for rearming are primarily those "who would fight with only one consideration in mind—namely to be on the winning side in the next war and thus to gain a position of power for a resurgent Germany."

(b) Mr. Warburg contends that a remilitarized Germany would destroy the hope of a "democratic Germany." He shows that even today democracy in Germany has far to go. To encourage militarism among the Germans, therefore, would destroy whatever gains have been made up to now. "Probably no single factor," writes Mr. Warburg, "could militate more strongly toward a complete regression of the German people into their former pattern than the rebirth of a German general staff and a German army. The Germans have never yet learned to create a State which possesses an army; they have always in the past, tended to create an army which possesses the State."

(c) Mr. Warburg demolishes the argument that Western Germany must be rearmed because the Russians are arming "their" Germans. Mr. Warburg shows that the number of Germans the Russians could arm would be insignificant in comparison to what the Russians themselves would need and could mobilize in a march to the Channel. He declares that the Russians are arming "their Germans" as a propaganda maneuver to withdraw their own troops from their East German puppet state. This is intended to put the Western Allies on the spot and encourage agitation for their withdrawal from West Germany. Obviously, as Mr. Warburg writes, the Western Allies do not want to withdraw their occupation troops. "But," he declares, "if we fall into the Russian trap—if we rearm 'our Germans' because the Russians have rearmed 'theirs'—we shall have created the very condition in which it will seem unreasonable for us not to withdraw our own forces. How stupid can we be?"

The present world crisis has encouraged rash and impetuous decisions. Many of those who advocate the rearming of Germany have undoubtedly been swept away by a rising emotional tide and fear, but effective policies in the long run can never be built on the quicksands of hysteria.

For those who want to listen to a dispassionate view of this crucial issue, we strongly recommend Faith, Purpose and Power.

(All Honorable Men, by James Stewart Martin, Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 1950.)

(Faith, Purpose and Power, by James P. Warburg, Farrar, Straus & Co., New York, 1950.)

"On August 22, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung published an article dealing with the organization of the Bruderschaft. The author of this article concludes with the following paragraph:

" 'The very first condition which Germany will demand for her participation in the defense of Europe will be the return of their former dignity to the German officers and soldiers, by reviewing the war crimes trials which have condemned their leaders, and by guaranteeing a decent livelihood to the former professional military leaders, including those who belonged to the SS.' "

(From L'Epoque)

ULTIMATUM?

"Gen. Hasso von Manteuffel, German World War II tank commander, . . . named the immediate release of all German war criminals as one condition of German participation in the defense of Western Europe.

"Addressing the Rhein-Ruhr Club, an association of West German industrialists, Manteuffel made clear that he does not favor German rearmament unless Germany is granted full sovereignty. Among 'preconditions' for West Germany's remilitarization he listed:

"1. Settlement of Germany's border problems in east and west under international law. This means, he said, that some west European countries will have 'to give up their territorial claims.' He did not elaborate.

"2. Freedom for Germany's shipbuilding and merchant marine.

"3. Guaranteeing the legal pension claims of professional soldiers.

"4. Immediate release of all German war criminals who would be sentenced only by German courts if they have violated German laws.

"Manteuffel demanded inclusion of German officers in the command of a future west European army.

"Former Col. Gen. Heinz Guderian echoed Manteuffel's views in a letter to the Munich newspaper 'Sueddeutsche Zeitung,' . . .

" 'Equal rights for Germany is a goal which is far more important than rearmament,' said Guderian."

PROFESSOR FRIEDRICH WILHELM FOERSTER

80th Anniversary

There are few personalities in recent times whose lives contain such rich experience as that of Professor Wilhelm Friedrich Foerster who reached his 80th year during the past summer. Prof. Foerster is a founder of the Society for the Prevention of World War III and a member of its Board of Directors. It is no accident of fate that the name of Prof. Foerster should be linked so intimately with the Society for the Prevention of World War III. Indeed, we would say that the Society is a concrete symbol of all that Prof. Foerster has stood for during the major portion of his adult lifetime.

Prof. Foerster was born in Germany of a family which exhibited two opposing lines of development. The first trend was steeped in Prussianism and militarism. In opposition to these war-like ideologies, one could find in Prof. Foerster's family life great spiritual power motivated by Humanism in the true sense of the word. Prof. Foerster chose the latter path after having absorbed through his father the philosophical ideals of Alexander von Humboldt, the great German philosopher.

As a youth, Prof. Foerster witnessed the growing Prussianization of Germany and foresaw that this development bode ill for the rest of mankind. He therefore took on a mission, a virtual one-man responsibility to warn the world of impending catastrophe unless mankind awakened and acted with determination. Prof. Foerster knew whereof he spoke. He studied deeply all aspects of German life as a social scientist and educator. Few Germans, indeed few people, attained such a thorough understanding of the forces which were catapulting Germany into war.

Wherever he travelled in Germany, Prof. Foerster spoke up against the rising tide of militarism. For this he was hounded and persecuted as a "traitor to the Fatherland." But Prof. Foerster's patriotism was made of sterner stuff and he never faltered despite the quickened tempo of German rearmament. His was one of the lonely voices in Germany which dared to challenge the sabre-rattling speeches of the Kaiser before World War I broke out. He was practically alone in his devastating exposes of the hollowness of German intellectuals who meekly bowed to the Prussian God of War.

Foerster was not a starry-eyed idealist. On the contrary, he was a keen and practical student of politics and sociology. He knew that Germany under Prussian leadership could never conquer the world. He realized that such plans were doomed and would only bring ruin and shame to his people. Therefore, he kept on his uncomprising fight to take Beethoven out of the trenches. But the unholy conspiracy of the German militarists and the so-called democratic politicians under the Weimar Republic could no longer tolerate dissent. Foerster was a marked man. In 1923 he had to flee for his life having been forewarned that the German militarists were plotting his death.

In exile, Prof. Foerster continued his work which had a two-fold purpose: first to arouse the world to the dangers of the Pan-German conspiracy, and secondly, to save his own people from infamy and disgrace. In 1926, when the great powers met in Geneva, Switzerland, to discuss disarmament, Foerster boldly revealed the plans of the German General Staff to secretly rearm behind the pacifistic mask of the German Foreign Minister, Stresemann. His warnings fell on deaf ears and in Germany his name was villified. Foerster was now Germany's "Benedict Arnold." But despite the calumnies and abuse and danger to his physical person, Prof. Foerster never deviated from his great purpose and ideals.

He foresaw the rise of Hitler and wrote brilliant expositions against the folly of appeasement. However, as in the past, Foerster's admonitions went unheeded.

The 50 years of Prof. Foerster's struggle have placed great burdens on him. But greater burdens have been placed on a world which refused to listen because it was willing to put an undeserved trust in Germany.

Prof. Foerster came to the United States in 1940, and it was no accident that he chose this country, for what he revealed in his testimony before the Kilgore Committee in 1946 had a direct bearing on the future security and well being of the American people. In discussing the German problem before the Kilgore Committee, Foerster quoted the Kaiser as stating during the first World War "three Punic wars will be needed to crush the Anglo-American powers." In addition, he quoted the German Geo-Politicians who claimed that "the first World War destroyed France as a first rate power. The second World War inflicted deadly wounds on the British Empire and the third World War will deal the death blow to the United States."

In one of his brilliant addresses before an American audience, Prof. Foerster recounted the story of the American journalist, Carlton Smith, who, at the outbreak of the second World War, visited the Geo-Political Institute of General Haushofer at Munich. Prof. Foerster told his audience that when the American journalist expressed astonishment at all the treasures of detailed information possessed by Hitler's leading geopolitical adviser, particularly about far-off America, Haushofer replied: "Young man, we think in terms of centuries. In case we should lose this war, you may be sure that from the first hour of armistice we shall prepare for the next war."

Prof. Foerster's talents have been recognized by all objective students on Germany. Since his arrival in the United States, Prof. Foerster has lectured in some of the major universities in the East. For several years he was the Director of the Germanic Library at Columbia University. This library contained one of the most complete collections of documents, pamphlets, and books dealing with all aspects of German life. Today Prof. Foerster is still at work writing and lecturing. His dynamic personality has never failed to inspire those who have come in contact with him.

Prof. Foerster's contributions in making the Society for the Prevention of World War III the foremost educational institution on Pan-Germanism, stems from his profound understanding of the long range plans of the German General Staff. Some months ago, Mr. Ernest Pisko, of the Christian Science Monitor, compared the Society for the Prevention of World War III to the "remembrance slave" of Xerxes, the King of Persia. This slave, according to Mr. Pisko, was to continually remind the King of Persia of "unfinished business of the previous war" when the King appeared relaxed and over-confident. We deeply appreciate the compliment paid to us by Mr. Pisko, but in reality that tribute is due to Prof. Friedrich Wilhelm Foerster. May his wisdom prevail in these troubled times.

Was the Decartelization Program Sabotaged?

As part of its educational activities, the Society for the Prevention of World War III has held conferences with former decartelization employees and has made a study of their findings, most of which have been published in books and magazine articles. The Profiles following represent the collective viewpoint and expression of these experts.

Profile No. 1: Richardson Bronson

Richardson Bronson became chief of the Decartelization Branch of Military Government in 1947. During the war he was an army colonel ferrying troops across to Europe.

He began his Military Government work as deputy I. G. Farben Control Officer in which position he was subordinate and responsible to James S. Martin, chief of Decartelization. Bronson had no training in anti-trust work, although he was a lawyer; and was very frank in stating to his subordinates that his background had been with big business and that his sympathies were there too.

Bronson became I. G. Farben Control Officer in which position he developed a plan for turning over the various units set up under I. G. Farben breakup plans to German trustees who would administer and run the properties until finally disposed of to new and independent owners. The series of "independent" units which Bronson set up were legal fictions, since they were in fact neither units nor independent. The scheme was a temporary stop-gap to take the pressure off the persistent demand for positive action.

Although Bronson was administratively responsible to Martin, in reality he took his orders from his superiors in the Economics Division, Lawrence Wilkinson, General William H. Draper, Jr., and eventually Phillips Hawkins. In common with his superiors, he was unalterably opposed to breaking up and deconcentrating German combines, and never concealed his antagonism to the program of the Decartelization Branch. While still subordinate to Martin, Bronson told Johnston Avery and Creighton Coleman, assistant chiefs of the branch, that he was glad he had nothing to do with decartelization since he had always been on the side of big business and did not believe in breaking up German combines.

The principle behind the establishment of "independent" units to replace the Farben combine was the policy that these units should not be bigger than were absolutely necessary to carry out efficient production. It would appear that this principle was not adhered to. Actually, the biggest plants of Farben were grouped into one unit under a single trustee. All of the plants in Hoechst, for example, were placed under one trustee and operated as a unit. The Hoechst complex constitutes one of the biggest pieces of Farben property. The aim was not efficient production, but to safeguard the interests of the former owners of Farben who, through their influence, both on the Americans and on the German trustees, were able to prevent any dismemberment of the cartel. The trustees of these units were trusted functionaries of the company, many of them former high Nazis, who were retained in their positions because of their alleged "know-how." These trustees knew how to cater to American occupation authorities in order to accomplish their aims of safeguarding their property from liquidation.

Bronson conducted long conferences with various officials in search of a formula which would circumvent the Allied Control Council Law 9 seizing I. G. Farben property. This concerned the method whereby ownership would be transferred to new owners. It was a convenient piece of juridical maneuvering to which Bronson offered no opposition. The whole history of the liquidation of Farben clearly shows that the top officials did very little to carry out U. S. policies. And this also applies to Bronson.

The net result of Bronson's tenure as I. G. Farben Control Officer was the gradual emergence of the old power of the Farben cartel, with production policies under nominal direction of the American officials, but actually in the hands of the same crowd which guided

REICH CARTELS STILL FLOURISHING

". . . The retiring chief of the U. S. Marshall Plan for Germany said today that the Western Allies have failed to break up the huge cartels that helped Hitler wage war.

"'The program of decartelizing and deconcentrating West German industry has not been successful so far,' Robert M. Hanes said in an interview. 'Practically no German industry has been decartelized or deconcentrated . . .

"'. . . Cartel-smashing has been attacked bitterly by West German industrial and governmental leaders, including Chancellor Adenauer.'"

(From UP, Frankfurt, October 14, 1950)

ANOTHER VERSION . . .

"It is a familiar lament in left-wing circles that the German cartels are at their supposedly sinister work again. But General Clay reports that the big German chemical combine, I. G. Farben, has been broken up into 52 independent operating units, that the so-called Big Six banks have been dissolved, and that former owners of the Ruhr coal, iron and steel plants have been excluded from the management of their properties. I can testify on the basis of a trip to the Ruhr in the summer of 1949 that a complete scrambling of property rights, leading to chaos, and a multiplication of foreign controls were far graver problems than any revival of cartels . . ."

(From "Germany: Another Korea?" by William Henry Chamberlain in The Freeman, October 16, 1950)

Farben throughout its nefarious history.

The turning over of the German chemical industry by John J. McCloy to the Germans was only the logical consequence of an existing state of fact.

The fact that former Nazis were back in control of Farben, was admitted by Bronson's colleague, Myron S. Maupin, who was appointed by Bronson to succeed him as Farben Control Officer when Bronson moved up to the position of decartelization chief.

Maupin was little concerned with the breaking up of the Farben empire. Testifying before the Ferguson committee, Maupin admitted that many of the present officials of Farben were former Nazis and justified their employment on the grounds that all he was interested in was production, and those Nazis knew how to produce.

With the announcement that the "independent" units of Farben would not be sold to the public as originally planned, the final step was taken by the American occupation in abandoning plans for the elimination of this source of resurgent economic power of the German cartels.

When Phillips Hawkins moved up from Assistant Chief to Chief of Decartelization, he picked Bronson to succeed him. Bronson and Hawkins were close personal friends—Bronson was best man at the latter's wedding—and the fact that Hawkins was the son-in-law of Draper, the Military Government Economic Adviser, was particularly attractive to Bronson.

Hawkins selected Bronson for the job of decartelization chief, because he could rely on Bronson to follow his orders and hew the line. As an administrator of the program, Bronson showed a lack of interest in breaking the cartels. The promises made to his staff to undertake any particular action were never kept. He always sought reasons for his lack of action. Bronson would call for the submission of proposals against a particular combine, but after receiving them would completely ignore them, while the staff would be involved in some internal reorganization or shifting of responsibility. A favorite technique for avoiding action would be the shifting of the responsibility for recommendations from one staff member to another. Projects such as the Bosch and Siemens deconcentration orders went through innumerable individuals, each obliged to review the data and come up with some new recommendation. Proposals for deconcentrating the Siemenswerke, the giant electrical trust, for example, were ready as far back as 1946. Yet more than two years later, Bronson assigned an entirely new set of individuals who did not know the material to undertake a new study of the combine.

Bronson never fought for any part of the decartelization program, and when he was publicly accused in March, 1948, by 19 members of his own staff of revising basic U. S. policy, he failed to justify his position. Nor did he try to defend U. S. policies before his superiors who used him to promulgate this arbitrary change of policy without any explanation whatsoever. Quite the contrary, Bronson told the staff to be "good soldiers" and obey their superiors. Martin, however, fought back and defended the United States interests.

Bronson's testimony before the Ferguson committee shows his true character. He affirmed to the committee the possibility of deconcentrating the Henschel locomotive combine although he himself earlier had informed the staff that Henschel was not to be deconcentrated.

Bronson's performance before the Ferguson committee is an example of the man's ability. As described by Francis Laurent, one of the assistant chiefs of the Branch, Bronson, "because of his poor memory and lack of understanding of the issues was not well qualified for the conduct of negotiations, and was unwilling to compensate for his shortcomings. While work on the Henschel case was in progress he undertook to conduct negotiations with his British opposite but did not ask the persons who were familiar with the case to accompany him. On two occasions he brought back reports of agreements which were at variance with reports which came to us from the British side. The resulting disagreements were extremely embarrassing."

In testifying before the Ferguson Committee, Bronson gave a misleading picture of the results of the work of the Decartelization Branch. Thus, in December, 1948, he told the Committee that the Decartelization program had reached a point "where it could go in either direction," that no fait accompli had been put over. He made these assertions in the face of known facts that back in March, 1948, General Clay had already jettisoned the whole decartelization program with his famous "rule of reason" theory under which heavy German industry was practically exempted from any decartelization action.

In a letter to the Ferguson Committee, dated March 31, 1949, Bronson attempted to defend his record and told the Committee that hearings on Bosch, the great auto accessory combine, were being finalized. The record of the Bosch case does not bear this out. Under orders of Clay, he had removed from the Bosch recommendations its vital parts dealing with the planned severance of the Eisemann Company which was Bosch's chief competitor before it was swallowed up by Bosch in 1924. Bronson ordered Eisemann to remain a part of the Bosch combine! In addition, Bronson, acting under Hawkins' instructions, changed other sections of the Bosch Determination order, particularly the patent and foreign subsidiaries parts. The net effect of these changes was to allow Bosch to retain control over its patents and to permit Bosch to reestablish itself as an international cartel.

In connection with Bosch's efforts to regain its international cartel position, Bronson, unofficially, conducted many private conversations with a General Wilson, who was acting as Bosch's representative in Germany, and who was the head of the International Products Trading Company which the Bosch combine established in Switzerland for the purpose of building up Bosch's foreign exchange, without the embarrassment of submitting their dealings to the scrutiny of Military Government. The contract signed with Bosch by the IPTC was executed with Bronson's approval after consultation with Hawkins. The Bosch-IPTC contract was a clear violation of Military Government Law 56 on decartelization. It is typical of Bronson's conduct that in discussing this deal between Bosch and Wilson before the Ferguson committee, Bronson expressed annoyance at Wilson for "barging" into his office at all times and "interfering" with the work of the Decartelization Branch. Notwithstanding the illegality of Bronson's action in pushing through the contract, notwithstanding all of the actions involved in watering down and making the Bosch decartelization ineffective, Bronson informed the Ferguson committee in March, 1949, that everything was getting along fine with regard to the decartelization of Bosch.

Bronson's role in furthering the contract between the International Products Trading Corporation and Bosch was prejudicial to U. S. interests.

In the case of the Siemenswerke, Bronson told the Committee that the whole Siemens question was being examined by the U. S.-U. K. Bipartite Board. He accused other witnesses before the Committee of not knowing the latest achievements of the Decartelization Branch.

He didn't tell the Committee that this was the nth time the deconcentration of Siemens, the electrical combine, was being considered and that nothing would come out of this consideration, for the simple reason that he knew that no action against Siemens would be undertaken.

In his statement to the Committee, Bronson pointed to the abolition of the business licensing laws of the German State Government as one of his major achievements, but he did not tell the Committee that the enforcement of the regulations abolishing licensing was practically non-existent and that the slight criticism levelled against the German officials was hardly calculated to force these officials to carry out the Military Government policy on licensing.

He pointed to the fact that the Germans were considering fair trade legislation. Such legislation has yet to be passed. Nowhere does Bronson point to the major failures of military occupation in carrying out the decartelization program. He says nothing about the Henschel case even though he himself had told the Committee several months earlier that some action on Henschel was contemplated.

Or take the case of the United Ball Bearing Works—the VKF combine. This was a Swedish affiliate of SKF and represented a virtual monopoly in Germany, with the exception of a small independent concern—Kugellager Fischer. Since the United Ball Bearing Works was a foreign-owned company, Military Government dismantled the Fischer plant as part of the reparations program, thus creating a complete monopoly for VKF.

The Decartelization staff, therefore, prepared a series of recommendations for deconcentrating VKF. Under pressure of the Economics Division headed by Wilkinson, all action on VKF was suspended and a solution was offered which consisted of having VKF turn over to Kugellager Fischer some of its obsolete machinery for the production of ball bearings. On specific instructions of Wilkinson, Bronson held off all action to deconcentrate VKF, although this firm would have remained a monopoly within the meaning of Law 56 even after the turning over of machines to Fischer. Subsequently, General Clay killed all action on VKF.

The same pattern of action can be discerned in relation to other combines. Bronson would tell his staff one thing and proceed to act in another way behind their backs.

Notwithstanding this record, Bronson had no compunction in telling Creighton Coleman, a member of the Decartelization Branch, that he knew more about decartelization than anyone else!

The above record speaks for itself. Let the reader judge for himself too.

Profile No. 2: Lawrence Wilkinson

Lawrence Wilkinson, who recently resigned from the firm of Dillon, Read & Co., belonged to that top inner circle of economic advisers who guided General Clay in the latter's decisions affecting the major United States economic objectives for occupied Germany.

Wilkinson, until his resignation in August, 1949, was top economic adviser for Military Government. Although neither a trained economist nor a lawyer, Wilkinson, an ex-army colonel, occupied in succession the positions of chief of the Industry and Commerce Branch, deputy chief of the Economics Division, chief of the Economics Division, and finally Economic Advisor to Clay. We still fail to understand what qualifications Wilkinson had for these exalted positions, especially since his main concern was not to upset the basic German economic pattern.

It is clear that having such all-consuming purpose as restoring German industrial recovery as his chief aim, Wilkinson would have little use for the work of the Decartelization Branch, and indeed, like his superior, General Draper, Wilkinson openly opposed the program of decartelization and, in fact, on every possible occasion he vetoed actions pending by the Decartelization Branch on the grounds of their interference with the objectives of Germany's industrial recovery. In effect, with Clay's backing, he exercised a virtual veto over the decartelization program even though Military Government Law 56 on decartelization made the carrying out of specific deconcentration actions mandatory.

Like other top officials of American Military Government who did not believe in the U. S. objectives and the basic purposes of the American mission in Germany, Wilkinson "believed" in preventing "excessive" concentration of German economic power but failed to find anything "excessive" about the existing concentrations. After General Clay instructed his subordinates to apply a so-called "rule of reason" in their decartelization work in March, 1948, Wilkinson's job, like that of his deputies, Hawkins and Bronson, became relatively easy. Any real efforts towards carrying out the decartelization program were simply branded inconsistent with the so-called "rule of reason."

When questioned by the Ferguson committee on his attitude towards decartelization, Wilkinson made the following statement which is typical of the thinking of the top layer of Clay's advisors:

"In numerous conversations with members of the Decartelization Branch and with other officials of military government, and never to the press nor to the Germans, I have expressed the fear that the blanket application of the anti-trust doctrines of the U. S. to the German economy would not only be futile but would also retard German economy. I call particular attention to the word 'blanket,' because I have never disputed the necessity of carrying out our Government's policy to destroy excessive concentration of economic power in Germany. . . . I have indicated my belief that the anti-trust policy which I fully support in the U. S., which is a rich country which can afford to waste raw materials and manpower and plant capacity, is not necessarily to be applied to a country in Germany's reduced economic circumstances, with any hope of ultimate success of the program. . . ."

The underlying assumptions of this argument are that decartelization would interfere with Germany's industrial recovery and that it was inconsistent with a better distribution of goods and services. These economic assertions are specious, to say the least, since the converse is actually true, namely that the abolition of monopolies would reduce prices, afford a better distribution of available goods and promote more incentive for increasing production on a democratic basis.

Wilkinson, in common with the other assorted fry who were defending the vested interests in German industry, sought to back up his actions by appealing to German history. Why disturb, he said, the pattern so familiar to the Germans—that is the pattern of combines, monopolies in allocation and distribution, exclusive trade agreements and the whole claptrap of the Hitlerian economic organization?

Wilkinson made no bones about his antagonism to a democratic reorientation of German economic life. He told the Ferguson committee that on many occasions he had imparted his views to his subordinates, Hawkins and Bronson, as well as to his chief, Draper, and on one occasion to General Clay himself. Thus the very men entrusted with carrying out the program of democratic reorganization of the German economy through decartelization and denazification were most articulate in their opposition.

As various members of the decartelization staff testified, proposals brought to Wilkinson, as head of the Economics Division, for action in specific cases, were met with indifference or outright antagonism.

Wilkinson claimed that he never sought to influence public opinion in the U. S. against the decartelization program. It is well known, however, that advance information on pending action against German firms were "leaked" to the German officials. For example, the pending action against the Bosch cartel was given to officials of the Bosch concern by one of Wilkinson's subordinates, George Erion, head of the Stuttgart Economics Office, months ahead of formal presentation.

As for talking to the press, the testimony of James S. Martin, who resigned in disgust as chief of decartelization in July 1947, is pertinent in this connection.

Martin told the Ferguson committee that "certain officers of Military Government, including General Draper, Colonel Wilkinson and a number of others in the Economics Division of Military Government made a studied effort, throughout the year and a half that I was head of the Decartelization Branch, to create the impression in the minds of the visitors from the United States that the purpose and effect of the decartelization program was to hamstring German economic recovery. . . ."

Elsewhere in his testimony, Martin stated: "On the very evening of my arrival back in Berlin, I was asked by the Economics Division to represent the Decartelization Branch at a briefing of a visiting group of American businessmen from the U. S. Chamber of Commerce. In my presence, General Draper and other members of the Economics Division, in a rapid succession of set speeches, made statements emphasizing the need for German economic recovery and intimating that the removal of Nazis from the ranks of industrial management and the threats of a decartelization program were retarding and hampering German recovery. . . . Finally, at a meeting with visiting editors from the United States, held in Economics Building on Oct. 9, 1946, Peter V. Martin (no relation to James S. Martin) Deputy Director of the Economics Division, introduced Colonel Wilkinson as chief of the Industry Branch to make a statement. Wilkinson once more parroted the theme that the denazification and the decartelization programs, which he frequently confused with one another, were responsible for delaying German economic recovery."

Wilkinson's opposition to decartelization expressed itself in various ways.

For some time, the Decartelization staff had sought to induce military government to approve of a law abolishing the issuing of licenses to new businesses. The power to hinder new enterprises from going into business was one of the most powerful weapons in the hands of the reactionary German governments and was vigorously used to prevent the spread of competitive enterprises. The position of Wilkinson was that if the Germans wanted to retain the licensing laws, why upset their mental habits? Nevertheless the German laws on business licensing were such a patent violation of economic freedom that military government was compelled to issue a regulation abolishing them. This was done over Wilkinson's dead body, so to speak. Wilkinson issued the following dictum with regard to business licensing:

"For the emergency (what emergency?), I think they are justifiable and have the support of the German people. To rescind them by military government order at this time could only lead to further chaos and confusion in the economy and in the minds of the German government officials."

Although Wilkinson and his subordinates did not succeed in keeping free enterprise off the books, they could and did indicate to the Germans that military government would not seriously seek to enforce it. This minor victory for economic freedom could thus be frustrated in view of the antagonism of men such as Wilkinson. Moreover, the Economics Division and the economic advisors of General Clay did not undertake any educational campaign to explain the necessity of free access to business opportunity as a form of the democratic way of life.

The manner in which Wilkinson regarded the efforts of the Decartelization staff is illustrated by his action on deconcentrating the Swedish affiliated VKF ball bearing plant.

A member of the Decartelization staff, Russell Bartels, testified as follows before the Ferguson Committee on Wilkinson's intervention in the plans of the Branch:

"When SKF (the Swedish parent company of VKF) found out what Mr. Olnick (another member of the staff) and I had recommended to the Branch with reference to the anti-friction bearing industry, the head of SKF called Mr. Wilkinson, then head of the Economics Division, and he entered into an agreement with SKF substantially to the effect that our recommendations would not be carried out. So far as I know Mr. Wilkinson entered into this agreement without consulting any member of the Decartelization Branch. . . ."

In a memorandum to Bronson, Wilkinson, in effect, ordered Bronson not to take any action against VKF under the Decartelization law in order not "to complicate the issues."

The action taken by Wilkinson with regard to deconcentrating VKF was later approved by General Clay, on the theory that the obsolete machines which VKF would give to its small competitor, Kugel Fischer, would create competition in the industry, and that, therefore, there was no need for further action against VKF.

As a matter of fact, this deal which Wilkinson consummated behind the back of the Decartelization Branch, as the price for calling off action against the Swedish-owned ball bearing trust, was never actually carried out, since VKF, having made the promise to deliver machines to Kugel Fischer, refused to deliver anything but an insignificant number of obsolete machines. This is a typical example of decartelization as interpreted by Wilkinson.

Wilkinson played an important part in making it possible for the Bosch international cartel to be re-established. He conducted many conversations with the American Major General Arthur Wilson, the "unofficial" representative of the Bosch firm, and helped the latter attain approval of the contract between Bosch and the "International Products Trading Corporation" which Wilson established in Switzerland to take care of Bosch's international interests.

Although the "political climate" did not change in Washington in 1948, as Wilkinson and the group of bankers' representatives running Military Government had hoped, Wilkinson's labors were well rewarded. On his return home, Wilkinson's old boss, Draper, took him into the firm of Dillon, Read, and General Clay, his top boss, has now made him Civil Defense Director for the State of New York.

Eyebrow-Lifting Department

REPRESENTING GERMAN INTERESTS

From a "New York Times" report of a speech by Chancellor Konrad Adenauer:

". . . Dr. Adenauer mentioned several times that the West German Republic lacked sovereignty and that this meant 'many difficulties and many a danger.' He added, however, that the 'cooperation' of the Western High Commissioners was good.

" 'In most instances we found that the High Commissioners were not only representatives of their respective countries but also representatives of German interests and I would like to take this opportunity to thank them,' the Chancellor added. . . ."

GERMAN MILITARISTS AT WORK

From an ONA report by Landrum Bolling:

". . . A former German admiral recently told a friend of mine that so long as the 'honor' of the German Navy remained besmirched and his brother officers, Admirals Doenitz and Raeder, languished in prison, he did not care even to discuss the problem of the defense of Western Europe. Many another German military leader takes the same stand on the war crimes trials as they affected the sacrosanct 'professional' men-of-arms.

"There are other German officers, however, who hold a much more opportunistic view of the situation. They are frankly offering themselves to the highest bidder and are maneuvering to get the best possible price for their return to active duty. Some have already made a deal with the Soviets and are happily whipping into shape the growing land, sea and air forces of East Germany's Red military machine. Others of special technical competence have been taken to Russia for work with Soviet military scientists. A number have made individual contracts with the British, French and American governments. Some, particularly Luftwaffe veterans, are said to have found a congenial home in the Argentine.

". . . From the writings of some of the more outspoken ex-officers it is clear that the German military don't think much of the way the Western powers have managed things or the way they are planning the defense of Western Europe. It goes without saying that a good many of them can think only in terms of a strong, independent remilitarized Germany, with Germans in the position of dominance in a new European coalition —whether oriented toward the East or toward the West.

". . . 'Na, Ja, now they need us!' is a common folk expression which has long since become utterly trite in German speech from overuse. It expresses the cynicism mixed with sardonic pleasure at another's discomfort which characterizes a widespread German attitude toward their conquerors. And as the embattled communist and non-communist worlds have wooed the Germans with ever increasing ardor, German appreciation of their military potential has risen. . . ."

STARTLING BUT FRIGHTENING

From "Report on our First Front—Europe," by Lester Markel in "The New York Times":

". . . Meanwhile you discover in Germany much hoarse whispering about the former army officers, rumors about secret organizations set up ostensibly for pension purposes but useful for other ends if the time should come.

". . . There are Germans who hold firmly that the only course for Germany is to renounce the past and its flirtations with Russia and become irrevocably a part of the West. But the majority seem to have chosen the way of opportunism; to pit the two opponents against each other, in order to gain concessions from each. Nevertheless, there seems no present alternative except to grant more self-rule to Germany.

". . . The recovery in Germany in the last two years is startling, and in a way frightening. The people are well fed, they walk with an assurance that is in vivid contrast with the dazed shambling of the early postwar years, the tempo and the atmosphere are wholly different.

". . . The German view of it is not so clear. A visit to Duesseldorf, capital of the Ruhr, provokes some suspicions. There you will meet the important industrialists, the successors of the steel and coal barons. These are shiny-pated, paunchy fellows, who look much like von Stroheim. They move freely in and out of the Soviet zone, on mysterious missions, and indicate that, if Germany and Russia should join forces again, they are smart enough to run the show. To many of them the Schuman Plan is a means of lifting the steel quota and a step toward a revival of the prewar cartels. . . ."

S.S. COMEBACK?

From "L'Observateur," Paris:

"Any unilateral treaty with the Western powers would deal a fatal blow to the cause of German unity which can only be obtained by walking the tight rope between the East and the West. This thought led General Speidel, who was appointed by Adenauer to run the Federal Office of Security, to refuse to undertake the carrying out of this idea as well as having any contact with Fontainebleau, France, so long as the position of the German generals, as natural leaders of this new German army, is not clearly stated. This thought has also led Chancellor Adenauer to prepare a declaration dealing with the official rehabilitation of Germany in order to eliminate in advance in Germany the feeling that this country could participate with equal rights and even superior rights to the defense of Europe but which will nevertheless remain with minor rights and lesser honors. (Adenauer's Koelnische Rundschau, Sept. 21, 1950.) In this connection it is worth mentioning that the chief of the press office of the federal government declared that the members of the SS would be included in this rehabilitation of the old Wehrmacht. (Der Fortschritt, Sept. 22, 1950.)"

IS GERMANY RESPONSIBLE?

From "Information on Germany" published by the W. J. C.:

"The continuing attempt to evade German war guilt operates on all levels of authority as well as among the general population. Thus, on the highest level, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer is quoted by the 'National-Zeitung' of Basle as stating: 'The population of the Western democratic countries still sees in Germany the responsible power for the Second World War—Germany of today, however, feels herself not responsible.' This explains why it is no wonder that other politicians, not in such a prominent position as Adenauer, hammer at this line with far stronger and more irresponsible blows than Adenauer himself. Among these people is Otto Kranzbuhler, defense lawyer of Admiral Doenitz, who has tried to shatter the foundations of the Nuremberg Trials in a published pamphlet 'Review of Nuremberg.' He argues against both the legal and political basis on which the defendants were sentenced and concludes that the Nuremberg Trials did not live up to international law. It is interesting to note that Otto Kranzbuhler, who is in the forefront of the cabale trying to get important Nazis out of Landsberg prison, had been invited during 1949 to lecture before American audiences.

". . . The surprising release of Nazi war criminals was criticized by the 'Telegraf' of Berlin, published by Paul Loebe, a prominent Social Democrat and one-time President of the Reichstag in the days of the Weimar Republic.

"The newspaper asks 'Is that Necessary' and goes on to say that 'the German democracy cannot be interested in the early release of the most prominent Nazi leaders, respectively promoters, of the Nazi cause in order that they may possibly repeat their destructive game of which Germany fell victim.' The complete sordid records of these men now released are listed and the paper concludes that if the Germans do not now prosecute them for crimes not covered by the International Charter, grave injustice would be accorded the persecutees. . . ."

TAKE IT OR LEAVE IT

From "Combat," Paris:

"The first precondition (for German rearmament), writes the Hamburg 'Freie Presse,' is that Germany's contribution must have for its aim the guarantee of the security of Germany.

"The second precondition is that the German army, which is an expression of the national sovereignty, must be autonomous to the same degree as the armies of other countries.

"The third precondition is that the German army must be placed under a German command and that it must not be placed under a supreme European command unless Germany is represented with equal rights —the rights enjoyed by other nations.

"That is the least we can accept and nothing else would do, concludes the German newspaper. Are these conditions? It looks like an ultimatum. The plan of the German reactionary forces seems quite clear in its simplicity. Under the cover of a 'contribution' to the collective defense of Western Europe, the German reactionary elements are trying to obtain a complete restoration of Germany's sovereignty. Banking on its human and industrial potential and on the bureaucratic and military traditions, Germany hopes to get out from under the Atlantic or 'European' trusteeship in order to play her own game by playing a new 'Rathenau' strategy.

"As regards the Western powers, the Big Three have learned nothing, forgotten nothing, and they are going around in circles and Europe is turning with them.

"If this 'realistic' policy should cause a resurrection of German militarism—a militarism which engendered defeat for Germany as well as catastrophes for Europe—we will know who will be responsible for them. The verdict of the peoples of Europe will not be able to make a distinction between those who have promoted this defeat through selfish interests and those who will have tolerated it by showing a total lack of political perspective, or those who have followed this disastrous policy through plain cowardice."

THE GLORY OF THE SOLDIER

President Theodor Heuss, speaking on the first anniversary of the formation of the West German Federal Republic, comments:

"The glory of the soldier has fallen since its 'hubris' made it the grave digger of the German nation. Germany is no longer one of the great powers of the world, and this is the result of treacherous cynicism. But the others need us again and we need them. We need an equal status in order to cooperate in Europe's re-establishment. We need equal legislative and executive powers, not for any prestige but so that we may contribute to the destiny of a great European whole. It requires courageous understanding of the other powers to overcome their war attitude toward Germany."

NEW BOOKS

Ernest Leiser reports the following item to ONA:

"In Duesseldorf, an enterprising reporter for the newspaper 'Frankfurter Rundschau' has discovered that orders supposedly issued for the suppression of a 'textbook' containing strongly anti-Semitic material have not actually been transmitted to booksellers. Officials in the North-Rhine-Westphalian government had previously declared they were banning it. The reporter, however, had no difficulty finding it in a Duesseldorf bookshop he visited and was told by the proprietor that no instructions not to sell it had been given him."

SPIRITUAL UNITY

The "London Economist" reports:

"There are ominous signs that the Evangelical Church in Germany may not prove a faithful ally for the west. In the Soviet German State, the Communists are able to claim increasing support from Protestant pastors, and even some bishops, for their National Front, and the 'peace' campaign. Bishop Dibelius of Berlin has, it is true, made a valiant stand against the National Front in a pastoral letter and has committed the crime of visiting the United States. His attitude led Ulbricht to denounce him and his supporters, with the typical Communist threat that 'we grant democracy only to progressive democratic forces, not to warmongers.' But Communist action has been postponed until after the single-list elections of October 15. In the meantime a considerable number of Evangelical clergy apparently think that Bishop Dibelius has gone too far in defying the state.

"In the west, a conference called recently in Dusseldorf by the Evangelical Church passed a resolution to the effect that Germans would never fight Germans, and a statement by one of the leaders condemned the approval of German aid in western defense, expressed by the Catholic archbishops. The protest made by the Bonn minister of the interior, Herr Heinemann, against Dr. Adenauer's demand for a force to match the Soviet Volkspolizei was due, it is believed, to his leading position in the Evangelical church, as well as to the fact that the chancellor had omitted to consult him.

"There are good reasons for this equivocal attitude on the part of the Evangelical church. From the days of Luther it has been taught to submit to the state, whatever its nature, in all but matters of creed. The Evangelical clergy tend to be narrowly nationalistic, as was shown by their widespread support for the Nazi state. At present, another factor makes the Protestants likely to fall victim to spurious propaganda on German unity from the eastern zone. The main strength of the Evangelical church lies in eastern Germany. Not long ago Pastor Niemoeller himself declared that there was nothing in the Bible to condemn Bolshevism and that Germans would prefer a country united under Communism to one permanently divided. It is on such confused thinking that the Soviet cause thrives."

THEY NEED US

From a recent report by Carolus to "The Nation":

"Returning to Germany after four weeks abroad I can scarcely recognize my country. Is this the same West German state; are these the same politicians, the same newspapers, the same parties? No one talks now about the Schuman plan, about German consulates in foreign countries, about the unemployed and the price of bread, about former Nazis and the law for the defense of democracy. No high commissioner of the occupying powers raises a warning finger against industrial cartels, or urges further dismantlings, or demands a house-cleaning in the I. G. Farben trust. As a small manufacturer who was on the train with me said, 'At last German is being spoken again in Germany.' Swelling out his chest, he added, 'They need us. They need us badly. If they had listened to Hitler they wouldn't be in that mess in Korea. It serves them right. And now they want us to pick their chestnuts out of the fire.'

"... The federal Minister of Justice, Dr. Dehler, mocks 'the holy Three Kings of Petersberg, who have not the slightest idea of Germany's problems.' Herr Seebohm, federal Minister of Commerce, declares that the remilitarization of Germany cannot be discussed until 'the honor of German soldiers has been vindicated and the shameful verdicts of Nurnberg have been set aside.'

"... Rehabilitation, reemployment! Already they are cleaning their old uniforms, getting out their swords and decorations. General Dittmar, the well-known Nazi radio commentator, writes articles on the military situation in Korea in which he criticizes American strategy. General Guderian, who invaded Poland, France, and Russia at the head of Hitler's armored divisions, says that with two billion American dollars he could raise and equip a Panzer army on which the Russians would break their teeth.

"For the present Guderian can make his plans only on paper. In the eastern zone his talents might be put to greater use. The Russians have gone much farther than the Western Allies in using and arming the Germans. Former Hitler officers in the eastern zone have been asked to register for military service. Eight hundred thousand young men are drilling against 'Wall Street imperialism. . . .' "

Recommended Reading

We believe that many of our readers will want to get acquainted with the penetrating study of post-war international problems written by Mr. Lionel Gelber, a former official of the United Nations.

Mr. Gelber was born in Canada and taught international affairs at the University of Toronto. In 1942, Mr. Gelber wrote Peace by Power which immediately received wide attention. A realist, as well as an experienced observer of international diplomacy, Mr. Gelber has continued to probe the complex problems which face us all.

His latest book is entitled Reprieve From War which he calls "A Manual for Realists." Mr. Gelber examines the problems which confront us today with refreshing realism. As he sees it, the West must build up its power morally and militarily so as to save the peace. In advocating this policy, however, Mr. Gelber is mindful of the grave dangers which may develop from impetuous decisions as regards the treatment of Germany. According to Mr. Gelber, a strong and independent Germany is "more likely to take up the cudgels against the West rather than for it." He points out that Soviet Russia has many trump cards which it could employ to bribe the Germans should a showdown come. Among Russia's "Aces" are, (a) a strong United Germany; (b) returning some of the Eastern territories which are now in Polish possession; (c) partnership with the Soviet Union for expansionist purposes; (d) permitting Germany to exploit the vast markets of the East, including Communist China.

Mr. Gelber warns that these factors should not be taken lightly by the West. He sees the grave possibility of Western Germany rebuilt by the Western Allies turning around and linking up its fate with the Russians. Mr. Gelber believes that the resurgence of Germany contains the seeds of disaster for all of us. In concluding his remarks on Germany, Mr. Gelber declares: "Against the West the defeated Germans can now no longer go their way alone; together with the Russians they might, quite literally, find new worlds to conquer. What the question might boil down to is the question of Germany's revival or Europe's survival. Through any indiscriminate effort to restore the European balance with Germany's help, the world preponderance of the West may be lost."

It would be well for Western statesmen to carefully study Mr. Gelber's Reprieve From War. Certainly this masterful exposition of fact and not fantasy deserves a wide reading public.

U. S. HIGH COMMISSIONER McCLOY protested the withholding of immigration visas to known Nazis and former members of Hitler's storm troopers.

THE BIGGEST GERMAN CARTELS and combines have advertised extensively in West German Communist papers.

DR. GEORGE N. SHUSTER was appointed U. S. Commissioner for Bavaria despite his writings which praised Hitler, criticized the Nuremberg trials, and slanderized victims of Nazi persecution.

THE ALLIED HIGH COMMISSIONERS refused to discharge Dr. Globke, chief of Federal Personnel in the Bonn Government, who helped write the commentary on the Nuremberg racial laws.

THE WEST GERMAN POLICE, according to a high U. S. official, are riddled with Communists.

GERMAN NEWSPAPERS are permitted to criticize the Allied war crimes trials.

ALLIED AUTHORITIES are allowing the Germans to whip up a propaganda campaign for the return of their former Eastern territories which can only strengthen Russia's influence in the satellite countries.

THE GERMANS slandered American military power during the first months of the Korean war.

THE ALLIES permitted the appointment of one Herr Floel, as chairman on the Committee of Investigation of Elections in the State Parliament of Schleswig-Holstein when it is known that he participated in Hitler's Munich putsch and was sentenced to six months by a British Military Government Court in the early post-war period for concealing his notorious past.

THE AMERICAN HIGH COMMISSIONER freed Hanz Fritsche, former Nazi radio propagandist and Goebbels' right-hand man, and Baron von Weiszaecker, convicted for war crimes and right-hand man of hanged Ribbentrop.

AMERICAN AUTHORITIES have failed to carry out the execution of the six Malmedy war criminals though there is no longer any question regarding their guilt of murdering defenseless G.I.'s taken prisoners during the Battle of the Bulge.

THE ALLIED HIGH COMMISSIONER remained silent over the fact that Eduard Hempel, Hitler's Minister at Dublin, has been permitted to return some months ago to Germany and is now in Dr. Haas' office in Bonn which is selecting Germany's future diplomats.

THE OCCUPATION AUTHORITIES have not demanded the removal of Gustav Adolf Sonnenhol, press officer of Dr. Franz Bluecher, the German Vice-Chancellor, though he had joined the Nazi Party and the Storm Troopers before 1933 and was a member of the S.S. and Liaison Officer between Ribbentrop and the Gestapo in 1944.

THE RUSSIANS are reviving the German Navy in their Zone which will be equipped with torpedo boats, and the Erfurt People's Police is being trained by the Russians for guerrilla warfare.

THE FIRM OF FRIEDRICH KRUPP received an order of 100 locomotives from South Africa though an American court in Germany decided that the Krupp properties were to be confiscated.

DR. KARL SPEICKER was permitted to go to Argentina where he can help to strengthen the ties between the Nazis living in Argentina and their friends in Germany.

"Within nine months, Western Germany, industrially 'demilitarized' as it has systematically been during five years of Allied occupation, could again turn out the tools of war.

"This is a startling estimate. Nonetheless it was made by officials on the staff of U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy, after consultation with German industrialists and technical experts.

"There would be three major gaps in war production—airplanes, submarines and high explosives—but the general process of converting industry to produce the weapons of ground warfare could be effected in nine months.

"...Today, however, even those Allied officials whose job it has been to see that the Germans did not try to produce war material are undertaking careful studies to see exactly what West Germany could and should produce, either for its own rearmament or for that of Western Europe..."

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir:

"A few weeks ago I had occasion to tune in on a television program which carried an interview with Mr. Henry Byroade, Director of the Bureau of German Affairs in the State Department. Mr. Byroade was explaining State Department policy in Germany, and judging from his remarks, it seemed to me that our policy makers are eminently satisfied with the way things are now progressing there. In answer to the question of the CBS correspondent: 'What is the status of Nazism in Germany now?' Mr. Byroade replied: 'I believe Nazism as such is dead.'

"About two weeks after Mr. Byroade assured his television audience that Nazism 'was dead,' the press carried reports of a new survey of German opinion in the American Zone of Occupation. That survey showed that whereas in 1949, 52% of the Germans thought that Nazism was a good idea which had been badly carried out, the figure had now risen to 59%.

"As an ordinary layman, I am not familiar with the basic factors which are considered in establishing policy in Germany, but I would assume that before we take the Germans to our bosom, our officials search their pockets for hidden weapons.

"American policy in Germany reminds me of the lazy housekeeper who would sweep the dirt under the carpet every time she entertained visitors. Obviously the housekeeper did this to make an impression on her visitors—but the house was still dirty. From all indications, it appears to me that we have been using the housekeeper's method in solving the German problem. Billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money are employed to touch up German scenery, modernize her war potential industries, lay out new roads, provide for athletic facilities, etc. However, underneath it all is the filth of Nazism which accumulates as the months go by. How long our policy makers will be able to conceal this dirt from the view of the outside world is open to legitimate question. In my opinion the day will come when there will be no room to hide this filth and it will inevitably contaminate other areas in the world.

"If it could be shown that our responsible officials in Germany have seriously tried to cleanse Germany of Nazism and its related ideologies, then we could at least absolve them of what is now occurring. But the fact of the matter is, from what I have read and heard, that our leading officials are speeding up the process of returning the Nazis and their fellow travelers to important positions of power. For example, Mr. McCloy sets up a Clemency Board which is supposed to search for mitigating circumstances that would allow the granting of clemency to German war criminals. I must confess that my imagination is not able to picture what factors could justify the freeing of these criminals. In addition, Mr. McCloy has released a number of leading war criminals on the grounds of good behavior. Evidently Mr. McCloy's imagination is more fruitful than my own. If by good behavior it is meant that none of these war criminals committed murder during their stay in prison, then of course their plea for freedom must be recognized.

"Recent developments show that we are going further than that. Now we are told the Germans must be rearmed if civilization is to be saved. Hereafter American democracy will have to depend upon a people who moved heaven and earth to destroy us.

"Five years ago the Allies decided to prosecute German war criminals so as to convince the Germans that crime did not pay. This was supposed to be part of the education program. Another part of the educational program was designed to eradicate German militarism. We told the Germans that this was necessary. We tried to convince them that this policy was for their own good, since militarism had perverted the talents of the German people in the past.

"Now we turn around and free the war criminals and agree to rearm the Germans. Is it any wonder that the number of Germans who believe that Nazism was a good idea badly carried out has now risen to 59%? What else can we expect from a policy which may one day explode in the face of the American people and their Allies. That policy is essentially un-moral and indeed defeats the very purposes for which our country today is mobilizing its strength to ward off the threat of totalitarianism. A man from Mars, viewing the past five years, would be justified in describing our policy in Germany as the product of unbalanced minds. It is even becoming fashionable to fatalistically accept Germany as the decisive power in Europe.

"Mr. Bernard Baruch went further. Some months ago (N. Y. Post, May 18, 1950) he told a newspaper columnist: 'Germany will dictate the peace in Europe. That always has been obvious.' I take issue with the second part of Mr. Baruch's statement. It is true that Germany is being placed in a position where she can dictate the peace which would probably be the prelude to a new war. But why was this obvious? Certainly Mr. Baruch, of all people, had the answers in 1945 as to how the Germans could be prevented from winning the peace. Those answers have been known to our policy makers all along. If this is the case, then how can one explain this deliberate, almost enthusiastic desire to accept a German dictate? It just isn't normal for people to deliberately commit suicide. Yet I am forced to conclude that those who are responsible for our German policy lack the faculty of objective reasoning based on cold facts.

"Frankly speaking, the only voice of sanity that I have heard during the past years has been that of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, and I hope that this wonderful publication will courageously continue to call a spade a spade. As a member of and a contributor to your organization, I am writing you this letter to express my personal opinion regarding the shameful betrayal of the interests of the American people.

"Best wishes."

Dear Sir:

"While I am fully in accord with the spirit of your statement on German rearmament, and share with most people the fear of German intransigence, I believe the present strained situation, with American boys fighting and dying in Korea, requires a more realistic approach to the matter.

"If the Germans are rendered incapable of defending their own homeland, there is no alternative save that American soldiers must do it. To have American boys fighting and dying to save Germany, while German boys sit at home in safety, just does not make sense, at least not to this father of two and father-in-law of two more who have all done their share in the last war and are ready to go again...

"In the first place, I don't believe German rearmament is the question at issue. Rearmament today means vast industrial production of guns, tanks, planes and munitions, the production of which by Germany would undoubtedly endanger world peace, and I would oppose it vigorously.

"The arming of Germans in their own defense is another matter. It could be done without danger. One hint is the French Foreign Legion, where a heavy percentage of Germans serve loyally and capably under officers who are hereditary German enemies. A United Nations or an American Foreign Legion, officered by United Nations or American officers with German non-coms and privates would make a splendid counter to the Soviet hordes and aid in preventing a third world war.

"Even a German force of say, some ten divisions of infantry, would be no danger providing the Western powers matched them with equal or greater forces and kept tanks, planes, and heavy artillery in their own hands. An infantry force without these aids would be no danger to anti-Communist nations.

"The grave situation today requires realistic and unemotional use of every iota of force we can assemble, to assure the survival of the free world."

PITFALLS AHEAD

"The reality is that our real line of defense in Europe lies with the democracies of Western Europe, not with the reactionaries of Germany, who have still suffered no basic change of mind and heart since the days of Hitlerism. Most Germans—a larger majority today than a year ago—say quite explicitly that Hitler's aims were fine, and only his methods were foolish. Armed or unarmed they are dangerous, only they are more dangerous when armed.

"But—it is argued—we won't let them form a separate German national army. We'll enroll them in a joint European army, perhaps under American command. What folly to think that a quarter or half-million armed men—they must reach that number soon—would be any less a German army merely because their formal designation was European . . .

". . . What will it profit us to sell our souls cheap to the Germans, only to find that we have sold away the soul of Europe as well?"

(Max Lerner in the New York Post)

"Following a recent speech by Assistant U. S. High Commissioner Benjamin Buttenwieser in the United States, in which he said that Nazism was dead in Germany, a rash of swastika-ordered leaflets appeared mysteriously on the streets of a number of Ruhr cities. The leaflets said, 'The Jew Buttenwieser says we are dead. We are alive and strong! And we will drive his kind out of our Fatherland!' "

(Ernest Leiser to the ONA)

"Guy Mollet, Minister of State in the French government, said he feared that 'the existence of a powerful German army, and the revival of militarism which would follow, would involve a risk of conflict, since Germany's desire for unity and power was so great.' "

(New York Times)

Dear Sir:

"Today a friend of mine showed me a copy of the magazine, Prevent World War III. I was amazed to find that a publication of this nature existed.

"Since my discharge from the U. S. Army late in 1946 I have been trying to understand the development of events that led us into World War II . . .

"The whirlpool of confusion of our post-war world almost makes the last decade meaningless.

"I didn't get a chance to do more than thumb through your 34th issue, but it contains a wealth of factual information about Germany which is given little publicity in our newspapers and magazines.

"Please send me material which you publish and back issues of Prevent World War III . . ."

REPENTANT WAR CRIMINAL

"Convicted Nazi war criminal Baron Ernst von Weizsaecker walked from Landsberg prison a free man today and immediately knelt at the graves here of the executed leaders of Nazi Germany.

"Von Weizsaecker, former Nazi Ambassador to the Vatican, emerged from prison on the arm of his wife.

"Von Weizsaecker's seven-year sentence had been reduced to five though he was ruled guilty of aiding the deportation of Jews to Poland for slave labor . . ."

(U. P. dispatch from Landsberg, Germany)

"A German newspaper in the British-zone town of Osnabrueck has now undertaken to revive the bitter, German criticism of the Allied war crime trials at Nuremberg. Those trials, the paper has editorialized, 'put the veil of silence over all the crimes committed by non-Germans, overlooked the backing of the Nazis by Wall Street and ignored the massacre of 10,000 Polish officers at Katyn. The lesson of Nuremberg is nothing but a demonstration of one-sided jurisdiction. When today we see newsreels of American soldiers in Korea, we ask ourselves why German generals are still kept under lock and key. Only the victor is right!' "

(Ernest Leiser to the ONA)

". . . The Germans are the only people left in Western Europe who have something to sell both sides, and their old military leaders are making the most of it. Both American and Russian policy are wooing the German militarists because each would like to use the Germans as mercenaries against the other.

"The call issued last month in Eastern Germany for cooperation with reactionary and non-democratic elements in a national front was indicative. The same political logic is at work in the West. The German people are from all accounts sick of war and can only be mobilized again by restoring to power much the same elements who brought on the last two wars.

"This is an issue the French understand in their blood and bone . . .

". . . The faster Germany is rearmed the less politically dependable France will become since patriotic rightists and centrists as well as leftists will feel that American policy is selling France down the river. German rearmament is a wedge which may set France free politically and make her the cornerstone of an independent 'in between' bloc . . ."

C. Monteith Gilpin

This issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III is dedicated to the memory of Mr. C. Monteith Gilpin, a founder of the Society for the Prevention of World War III and its Secretary up to the time of his death on November 3, 1950.

Mr. Gilpin was born in Philadelphia seventy-eight years ago. He was graduated from St. John's College in Annapolis, Maryland, and received his Law Degree from Columbia Law School in 1897. For many years he specialized in corporate and estate law, and was the director of several corporations in New York and New England. Mr. Gilpin was a veteran of the Spanish American War and a member of many patriotic clubs and societies, including the Academy of Political Sciences. Thus it can be seen from this brief outline of his diversified background that Mr. Gilpin's life was not a narrow one.

Nor were his activities confined solely to his professional pursuits. Mr. Gilpin was a man of action. He saw events not as disconnected phenomena but rather as part of a large pattern. Mr. Gilpin had a realistic comprehension of the driving forces in history and he was aware that this great land of ours had a vital role to play in shaping the destiny of the world, providing that its leadership maintained a sense of history. It was Mr. Gilpin's firm conviction that only by understanding the basic forces at work in the world could American leadership act intelligently.

It was for this reason that he advocated the establishment of an academy to train American diplomats on similar lines as West Point educates Americans to assume military leadership of our country. Behind his plan for the training of future diplomats was his insistence that American leadership plan on a long term basis, that it be imbued with a sense of history, so as to avoid the pitfalls of short term expediency and improvisation. American leadership, he maintained, could not afford to blow hot at one moment and cold at another time. On the other hand, if American leadership acted resolutely on the basis of a clear historical perspective of world developments, then America's voice in world affairs could be effective and only then could our security and peace be preserved.

A specific reason which impelled him to propose this plan was the fact that he, in common with other officers of the Society, was witnessing blunder after blunder on the part of American diplomats and statesmen in the solution of post war problems, particularly that of Germany.

At the end of the war Mr. Gilpin expressed high hopes that the United States would take advantage of the great opportunity to break once and for all Germany's capacity to make war and to deprive her of the ability to bargain and maneuver. These were the prerequisites for stability in Europe, and would enable the West to reach some sort of agreement with the Russians without compromise of principle and without appeasement. But, as the months wore on, Mr. Gilpin saw with vivid clarity that those who were responsible for policy had no policy except the same old outworn discredited programs which were applied in Germany after World War I and which failed to prevent the rise of Nazism.

As one of the leading spokesmen of the Society, Mr. Gilpin time and again insisted that if American security was to be assured in our lifetime, then it would be essential to break away from the discredited formulae of World War I and deal with the German problem on the basis of historical realities. He expressed his views in many letters which appeared in the leading newspapers throughout the country. He dealt with specific aspects of the German problem, such as reparations, German assets abroad, the resurrection of Germany's war potential, and the dangers of neo-Nazism. Undoubtedly, his letters received the serious attention of our leading officials and his views were shared by many Americans who did not have the facility to speak out as Mr. Gilpin did on behalf of the Society.

In the last issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III Mr. Gilpin's last piece was published and appropriately enough, the title of his article was: "Towards Collective Security." In that article Mr. Gilpin once more returned to the importance of establishing a world-wide collective security system under the United Nations. Mr. Gilpin supported Secretary Acheson's views, which, he pointed out, could be the forerunner of such a system of collective security and would be the greatest deterrent to armed aggression such as that which occurred in Korea. Then he made the following observation: "Those who have advocated the remilitarization of Western Germany have based their arguments to a large extent on the fact that in Europe the Russians possess overwhelming land power and cannot be effectively checked without available military forces in the West. Underlying this thesis is the assumption that the day of a genuine world-wide system of collective security is gone and that the West must look to its own reserves for protection. But if this premise is true, then how seriously will the nations of the world take the recommendations of Mr. Acheson for the adoption of a world-wide system of collective security?" This is but one sample of his incisive logic. The question which he raised regarding the relationship of Secretary Acheson's recommendations and the remilitarization of Germany has yet to be answered.

It has been said by some of our friends that the Society's educational work will be vindicated some day—when we are no longer around. We do not share that pessimism. Indeed, we are confident that events will vindicate our viewpoint in the not too distant future. In any case, whatever the Society has accomplished or will accomplish, there can be no doubt of the role played by Mr. C. Monteith Gilpin. He was a great inspiration, a wise counsellor, a great American.

WE MUST ALWAYS TRY

It is understandable that the State Department should be suspicious of the Soviet proposal for a Big Four meeting on the question of the remilitarization of Germany. With Asia ablaze, the latest Russian demarche seems to be a cynical gesture in the eyes of our diplomats. It is as though the Russians were offering a single hose to put out widespread flames which threaten to engulf the whole world. Moreover, it is clear that the new Soviet bid aims to break up Western solidarity by raising the specter of a militaristic Germany, which sacked Europe twice in a generation and haunts every household on the periphery of German territory.

The importance of resolving the crisis in the Far East which threatens our security and peace is beyond debate. To achieve a measure of success in Asia, however, will be of little comfort if in the meantime a new blaze sweeps over Europe, ignited by the remilitarization of Germany.

Insofar as the Soviet objective to break up the Atlantic Alliance is concerned, we may as well admit the fact that the Soviets possess some important trump cards. The question is, shall we give the Russians the opportunity to play them? One of these cards could be used to place the onus of German rearmament on the United States. The other trump would be Russia's exploitation of the fears of the French and other Western European nations which don't relish the idea of German armed forces stalking their borders.

Business Week of January 6, 1951 reports: "Some American observers in Paris feel a refusal to talk with Moscow now will completely shake Western Europe's faith in American leadership." Finally, a U. S. refusal to meet with the Russians would, in the words of the Wall Street Journal, January 4, 1951, leave the United States "open to the charge that it is unwilling to negotiate with the Russians. This country should always be willing to talk as long as it is possible to talk." Similar sentiments were expressed in an editorial in the New York Post, January 5, 1951.

A Big Four meeting on Germany would not preclude the possibility and probability of discussions on other vital problems, including the Communist challenge in Korea. It would give our diplomats a chance to call a spade a spade and challenge before the peoples of the world the sincerity of the Soviet's peace offensive. In addition, such a meeting could be used by our statesmen as a means of "getting the record in perspective, the record, that is, of Soviet violations of Potsdam and the remilitarization of East Germany, which the Soviets have long undertaken." (Wall Street Journal, January 4, 1951)

A Big Four meeting, therefore, would not in any way weaken the determination of the Western powers to defend themselves and would not detract from American leadership. The contrary is more likely. In addition to these considerations, a Big Four meeting on the demilitarization of Germany would check, at least temporarily, the German drive for resurgence, by playing East against West and vice versa.

The Society for the Prevention of World War III has contended for many years that the cold war has not only been a blessing to the Germans, but more than that, it has enabled them to play no small part in keeping East and West at sword's point. Through the heightening tensions between East and West the Germans are succeeding in evading their responsibility for their crimes against humanity. Thus it is no surprise that the Germans are fearful over a Big Four meeting. The Germans don't want to be "sold out."

Mr. McCloy, the American High Commissioner for Germany, has gone so far as to assure Chancellor Adenauer that the Western Allies' investment of their resources in Western Germany gives evidence of their (Allies) good faith that there would be no betrayal of the Germans. (New York Times, December 28, 1950) Mr. McCloy's attitude explains a statement made by Bernard Baruch some months ago when he said: "Germany will dictate the peace in Europe."

The future would be gloomy, indeed, if this prophesy should come true. A Big Four meeting, therefore, could very well prevent such a catastrophe. Actually, there should be no contradiction between the basic interests of the United States and those of the Germans—that is, if the Germans are not interested in fishing in troubled waters. Why should the Germans fear a Big Four meeting, unless perhaps they are afraid that out of such talks agreements would be reached which would ease the present crisis?

Of course, miracles cannot be expected out of such a conference. Yet, if the Big Four can agree to enforce their original war aims with regard to Germany, there is hope for a brighter future for mankind.

FACTS VERSUS WORDS

When the war ended in 1945, the Allies were faced with a great problem, namely the creation of a free and independent German press. The problem was made more difficult by the fact that in most cases printing facilities in Western Germany belonged to Nazis and Hitler supporters.

To assist German publishers who desired to make a clean break with the undemocratic traditions of the old German press, Military Government issued regulations which enabled such publishers to utilize the printing facilities and equipment which had formerly belonged to Hitlerites. Allied protection of the rights of these publishers was confirmed as recently as July, 1950 by Mr. Ralph Nicholson, former Director of the Office of Public Affairs in the Office of the American High Commissioner for Germany. Mr. Nicholson reaffirmed the validity of the mandatory leases on German newspaper plants established by the U. S. Military Government in a reply to a letter from Franz Karl Maier, President of the Association of Newspaper Publishers in the United States zone. Mr. Nicholson informed the German publishers, (see July, 1950 issue, Information Bulletin) through Mr. Maier, that the Newspaper Leases Review Board, set up to review proposed changes in mandatory leases, continues to exercise jurisdiction in this field.

In addition, Mr. Nicholson referred to Allied Law No. 13, which "prohibits German courts from rendering a decision impeaching the validity or legality of any recognition, decision or order published by the Military Government. . . ." Mr. Nicholson further declared: "Only the occupation authorities are competent to determine and construe the existence, terms, validity or intent of the voluntary and mandatory leases of the job printing contracts formulated . . . under Military Government directives . . . and that German courts have no competence in cases involving these issues."

In reply to Franz Karl Maier's question as to whether recognized restitution claims affected in any way the lease facilities, Mr. Nicholson wrote: "The recognition of a restitution claim to property subject to one of the newspaper leases in question does not terminate the lease nor affect its validity. . . . These leases can be terminated or altered, therefore, only by the Newspaper Review Board."

Yet, in spite of these avowed policies to encourage the development of an independent German press, the first victim of the drive on the part of powerful vested interests to undermine the free press in Germany was none other than Franz Karl Maier himself! Dr. Frederick K. Wallach described in detail in the last issue (No. 36) of PREVENT WORLD WAR III how the Bosch interests, through dubious legal proceedings and tactics, were able to obtain from a German court the verdict that they had been victims of Nazism. Following up this triumph, the Bosch interests immediately confronted Franz Karl Maier, one of the publishers of the Stuttgarter Zeitung, with an ultimatum—either he would submit to their dictation or they would, by hook or crook, undermine his position.

The printing facilities which the Stuttgarter Zeitung uses were at one time the property of the Bosch interests. In view of the fact that the Bosch Trust had been adjudged a victim of Nazism, it was determined to regain control over these facilities as part of its claim for restitution. Franz Karl Maier alone, of course, could not balk the Bosch people who have friends in the highest circles of the Bonn Government. He had every right, however, to expect the protection of the American High Commissioner for Germany. No such help came, and Mr. Maier had to quit. This was a victory for the Bosch interests, but more than that, a very dangerous precedent in terms of the future of the democratic German press.

It would be hard to believe that American officials in Germany were unaware of the machinations of the Bosch interests. In this connection, we recall a part of an address on democracy and German public opinion by Mr. Shepard Stone, present Director of the Office of Public Affairs: "Above all, however," he told his German audience, "the papers themselves should be aware of their duties. Publishers and editors should know that they are trustees—trustees of the people. In times of financial difficulties they should remain firm, and not look for some capitalists to give them money to save their paper, which may very often turn out to be dangerous for the paper's independence. The publisher should take a close look at the man who gives him money and should insist upon the independence and the mission of the paper in being endangered." (October 20, 1950)

It seems to us that Mr. Stone would have not issued this warning unless he was aware of the fact that powerful industrial interests were out to recapture the German press and use it for their selfish purposes, as was the case before and during the Hitler regime. It is all very well for Mr. Stone to advise German newspaper publishers to be wary of sinister forces which would destroy the independence of German newspapers, but, in view of Allied regulations on this important matter, isn't it clear that Allied officials also have a responsibility in keeping clean the German newspaper profession?

The danger to the independence of German newspapers was also admitted by John J. McCloy in his Fourth Quarterly Report on Germany: "Potential threats," he observed, "to the independence of the German press are spreading newspaper mergers. As yet there is no evidence of outside financial interests in these combines, although this development could lead to the establishment of powerful newspaper trusts."

Although he recognized the danger to the independence of the German press by spreading newspaper mergers, Mr. McCloy denies the fact that outside financial interests are pulling the strings, although in the Bosch case the contrary is true. Moreover, the very fact that mergers are increasing could imply that outside capital has been brought in to effectuate these changes. As Mr. McCloy knows, it takes a great deal of money to buy up other newspapers. Therefore, an investigation of the circumstances surrounding the ouster of Franz Karl Maier from the Stuttgarter Zeitung might open up new clues for Mr. McCloy regarding the influence of outside financial interests in the German newspaper field.

From recent reports it seems that the pernicious influences which threaten the independence of German newspapers have invaded another important channel of public information, the film industry. The New York Times of November 7 carried a story captioned: "Ex Nazis Seek Control of Films." The dispatch discloses that the German film empire, UFA, which was supposed to have been broken up under the Allied deconcentration laws, is attracting the eyes of some of the most influential Nazis and Hitler supporters. Among those who are trying to regain control over the UFA empire, are:

Max Winkler, Joseph Goebbels' right hand man, who was special deputy propaganda minister in charge of films.

Alfred Hugenberg, steel tycoon, who helped Hitler come to power.

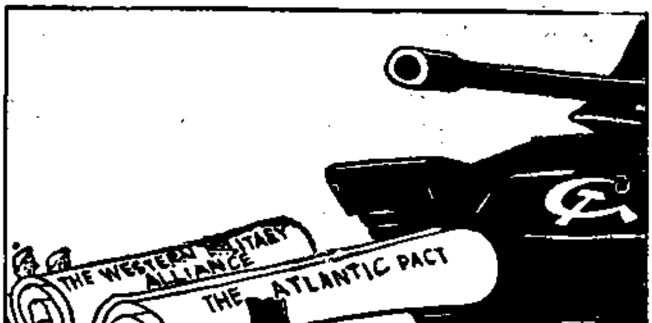
Alfred Greven, director of German film interests in France during the occupation.

Dr. Gunther Dahl Grunen, Managing Editor of the Nazi super holding company, Cautio, which controlled all propaganda media, including films.

According to the Times, this group is in close contact with the Allied Film Reorganization Committee, and "is lobbying extensively with important West German Government personalities to keep the empire intact." In view of the activities of this unholy group, it is not surprising that efforts to suppress a new film produced by Veit Harlan, favorite movie maker of Joseph Goebbels, were blocked by a German court in Hamburg.

One can hardly say that the situation in the newspaper field and in the film industry in Germany is encouraging. Yet some of our leading officials in Germany continue to make lengthy speeches and write detailed reports on how successful "we" have been in bringing democracy home to the Germans.

A GERMAN VIEW



"Well, anyway, we are secure from the rear."

Die Welt, Hamburg

DECARTELIZATION FARCE

The most recent report on Germany (Fourth Quarterly, 1950) by the United States High Commissioner, is not only interesting in what it says but also in what has been virtually omitted. Mr. McCloy comments on a wide variety of subjects, ranging from the field of civil liberties where he notes that the Bonn Government, "has been inclined to follow German traditions and has resisted efforts to liberalize some of the most paternalistic practices which have grown up in the past," to his discussion on the need for increasing Germany's war potential. "Capital," he declares, "must instead be furnished to industries likely to play an integral part in Germany's contribution to the common defense effort."

Strange as it may seem, Mr. McCloy's report says practically nothing about the question of deconcentrating German heavy industry and the smashing of the German cartel network. One of the few remarks which we have been able to find alluding to this problem is filled with exuberant optimism: "Free enterprise . . ." he reports, has been one of the "watchwords of the Government's economic policy as formulated and carried out by the Minister of Economics, Dr. Ludwig Erhard."

Reading this statement one could easily get the impression that the Germans are now on the road to a genuine free enterprise economy. Unfortunately, all the evidence we have seen points the other way around. (In this connection, the relationship of German economic policy to a system of free enterprise was discussed in issues No. 32 and 33 of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, under the title: "Champions of Free Enterprise?" by Dr. Jean Pajus.)

As a matter of fact, Law No. 27, which is supposed to break up the German coal and steel trusts is in reality a far cry from the avowed policy to deconcentrate German heavy industry. This Law and the regulations accompanying it make it clear that the same German tycoons who have been responsible in the first place for the trustified character of German heavy industry, will be in charge of liquidating it.

As early as June 26, 1950 the Stuttgarter Zeitung, commenting on the Law, noted that German industrial circles were very pleased about Article No. 5 of said Law. Article No. 5, in the opinion of these powerful interests, writes the Stuttgarter Zeitung, permits, "the exchange of shares of the old steel industry against shares of the newly to be formed steel units." Moreover, the Stuttgarter Zeitung flatly states that under Law No. 27, "It will be possible now to reorganize vertical concerns of mines and steel plants." It is a fact of history that the vertical German monopolies have not only exercised a stranglehold over the German economy, but have dominated the economic life of most of Europe.

As mentioned above, regulations supplementing Law No. 27 provide that these powerful monopolies will be liquidated by the German monopolists themselves. We estimate that roughly 50% of the present leading officials of the German monopolies to be liquidated, fall within the classification of the War Department circular of March, 1945, as individuals who: "in an outstanding way thrived under National Socialism, who welcomed it in the beginning, aided the Nazis to obtain power, supported them in office, shared the spoils of expropriation and conquest, or otherwise markedly benefitted in their careers or fortunes under the Nazis."

The inadequacy of Law No. 27 is further confirmed by a description of the powers of the German coal control board (DKBL), by the London Economist of November 11, 1950. The Economist, speaking about the temporary coal shortage, said: "Last week the German Coal Control (DKBL)—a curiously anomalous body which exercises the powers of a government or cartel under the nominal authority of the Allied Coal Control —was empowered to ration supplies, in practice though not in name. The DKBL can do so because it controls a sales organization which in the internal market exercises all the powers which used to be wielded by the Rheinisch-Westfaelisches Kohlensyndikat. This organization was dissolved by Military Government on account of its being a cartel. Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose."

Francis D. Murnaghan, Jr., of the Decartelization and Deconcentration Division, HICOG, writing in the November issue of Information Bulletin, confesses that decartelization and deconcentration of German industry is no easy matter. Implicit in his remarks is the admission that the German cartelists are far from convinced of the benefits of free enterprise, nor are the cartelists pursuing a do-nothing policy. Consequently, Mr. Murnaghan writes: "A large portion of the Division's time is devoted to obtaining evidence of such agreements (cartels) which, understandably, the parties keep as quiet as possible." Though more than 6,000 of such cartel agreements, according to Mr. Murnaghan, have been "formally terminated . . . there are signs of a revival of such agreements. . . ."

To round out this picture we are taking the liberty of quoting from a report by one of the members of a United States anti-trust team which had been sent over to Germany last year to undo the damages against the decartelization law under the regime of General Clay. We are indebted to Mr. Robert S. Allen, who published excerpts of this report in the New York Post of November 26, 1950:

"We have been fighting our own battle here ever since the Korean affair broke, but it looks as though ours will have a far less happy ending. Decartelization, dispersal of the I. G. Farben combine and break-up of the banking monopolies are about to be swept away in the panicky rush to give the Germans whatever they want in order to get them to accept the arms we are trying to thrust upon them. It is a truly tragic and despairing situation.

"All prospect of any acceptance by the Germans of any part of our economic reform program has virtually disappeared in the scramble to get them back into uniform. . . . Instead of advancing as we were doing for a while, we are now having to fight very hard to hold on. to anything at all. It now appears that our decartelization program is out the window. . . . The British were always against it and so were a lot of other people in our own occupation establishment. Between them and the rush to rearm Germany, our deconcentration program appears about finished.

"Now, only a few months later, there is a beautifully organized drive, encouraged by the British and led by the old Farben gang, to scrap the law and let the Germans, meaning the Farben crowd, handle the problem.

". . . The lack of resolve by the Allies, and their susceptibility to blackmail, has now been graphically demonstrated. The Germans have tasted blood and they are on the prowl once more. Once again, it is the old cry, 'Deutschland Uber Alles.'

"Only recently, the Minister of Justice at Bonn made a public speech in which he denounced the three High Commissioners, demanded that they get out of Germany, and excoriated the occupation statute as a scrap of paper which had no authority in Germany. That's where we came in. Adolph Hitler rides again."

This sensational indictment of the decartelization farce is in sharp contrast to Mr. McCloy's rosy picture of free enterprise in Germany.

GUNS FOR BUTTER

"We're trading guns for butter in Germany today. The Soviet world is getting the tools with which to make guns; in return the free world's getting stuff with which to butter bread and sweeten coffee and trim Christmas trees.

"Here in the Ruhr—the industrial heart of West Germany — factories are booming this winter. Blast furnaces are roaring and the night sky is lit by the glow of open hearths. But much of its production—its high-grade steel and tools and heavy machinery—are flowing across the iron curtain at the rate of $250,000,000 a year.

"With these critical materials the Communist East German state is building up an industrial plant whose steel output has trebled in three years and which will be practically self-sufficient in two more. In 1952 production is expected to reach 160 per cent of prewar levels.

"In exchange, Soviet Germany is sending back silk stockings and film, glassware and baubles—the kind of trinkets that fill shopwindows and give West Germany its look of lush prosperity.

"This bustling trade is being carried on in the West by German industrialists, often with the approval of the German Ministry of Economics and in shocking disregard of the free world's strategic interests. It is causing grave alarm among American and British officials—who are all but powerless to prevent it.

" 'We turned export licensing back to the Germans last February,' I was told by a State Department economic supervisor. 'Now they're determined to go on doing business as usual with their fellow-Germans across the line. And the Soviet Germans pay well—in gold and dollars—for the goods they need.'

"I looked at last year's figures of approved shipments to the East: $23,000,000 worth of iron and steel; $14,000,000 worth of vehicle and construction parts; $2,500,000 worth of machine tools; $7,500,00 worth of chemical and electrical products. And those are only a few of the items . . ."

(William Attwood in The New York Post)

RE-EDUCATION FIASCO

"German schools in the American zone are bringing up another generation to be blind followers. . . . Unless a major operation is performed in the German school system, we shall prepare for another generation that will welcome a dictator. . . . Ironically, we are doing it with American taxpayers' money expended for the express purpose of making another dictator unacceptable."

Thus spoke Dr. Worth McClure, Executive Secretary of the American Association of School Administrators before a Washington audience some weeks ago. There are ample facts to back up Dr. McClure's observations. Indeed, on the same day he spoke, the Associated Press reported from Stuttgart that: "Thousands of former Nazis are back in their school teaching jobs in Western Germany." According to the AP, at least forty-seven school teachers were found to be worse than "nominal Nazis" in the state of Wuerttemberg-Baden "where denazification scandals have been frequent."

A correspondent for the New York Times, writing from Stuttgart, revealed that of the forty-seven mentioned by the AP, twenty-four had been Nazi Party district leaders while many others had been active in "Racial Problems Bureaus." A number of them were "confidence men" in the Nazi Party Teachers' Association. For the information of our readers, Nazi "confidence men" were stool pigeons and spies employed by the Hitlerites to execute the Fuehrer's directives in whatever organizations they were assigned.

To illustrate the importance of these teachers to the Nazi machine, the Times correspondent cites the case of Dr. Ernst Schmidhuber. Schmidhuber was the executive officer of his Gau which was the biggest regional area in the Nazi Party organization. He possessed great talents and was an invaluable asset to the Nazi cause. Schmidhuber was an authority on the Hitler youth. He was a leading Party orator and district orientation leader. And last, but certainly not least, he was one of the Party's oracles on the "racial question." Today, he is back on the job—a teacher again!

The setbacks suffered by democracy in the German schools are reflected among German youth. A recent United States High Commission survey disclosed that only one out of four German youths in the American zone and one out of three adults believe that American democratization efforts "have achieved any great success up to now." Specifically, the survey reported that among Germans with twelve years or more education "84% see little or no success in American democratization efforts."

In this connection, we call attention to the fact that neo-Nazi youth organizations are appearing on the German scene. The latest of these outfits is called: "Reichsjugend" (Reichs Youth). It is led by one Herbert Muenchow, who, according to the Frankfurter Rundschau of November 4, 1950, was a district leader in Berlin under Hitler and at the end of the war was "Superior Fuehrer" of the Pioneers of the Storm Troopers. Muenchow, therefore, is a professional youth organizer who received his basic training in the Hitler youth organizations. The political godfather of Muenchow's organization is none other than Wolfgang Hedler, an important bigwig in one of the extreme German rightist parties. Hedler is a violent anti-Semite and has savagely attacked the Occupying Powers. His anti-Semitic activities became so obnoxious that even members of the West German parliament demanded his ouster from that body.

Ernest Leiser of the ONA writes: "The group, like the Hitler youth, is uniformed, and on the right breast of each uniform shirt the members wear a Germanic 'wolfsangel,' a symbol which closely resembles the National Socialist swastika."

In discussing the deteriorating situation among West German youth, the New York Times said in one of its editorials: "Five years of Allied and German efforts of reorientation have not succeeded in filling the vacuum left by the collapse of the Reich with an understanding of the workings and meaning of democracy." Every informed person knows that the New York Times is right in its conclusion, namely that there has been no significant victory for democracy among German youth.

But one is justified in asking the question—precisely what efforts have been made on the part of the Allies and the Germans to drive home the lessons of democracy? We are not talking about the handful of sincere Allied educators who have worked under the most difficult circumstances to do a job. They are not at fault. One merely needs to compare the paltry sums spent for education in Germany with the billions expended for the re-creation of German "efficiency," to understand how little has been done and who is to blame.

The American High Commissioner for Germany, Mr. McCloy, insists that a strong Germany is essential to the security of the West. Strength, to him, means a powerful industrial war potential. Everything else appears to be secondary. But would such a Germany really be strong to meet the challenge of Communism? Could such a Germany be a trusted ally of the West? There was a strong Germany before World War II. It was strong in the sense that it had unrivalled economic power, and that the Germans were thoroughly indoctrinated to follow the leader. But that Germany did not serve as a bulwark of democracy. It did not help to maintain peace.

Only a Germany whose people are thoroughly imbued with the democratic spirit can be strong, and that is why the re-education of the German youth is of paramount importance. It is they who must be made strong through the conviction that crime does not pay, and that peaceful pursuits and respect for one's neighbors is the truly democratic way. This will require much greater effort on the part of the Germans themselves. But, can we expect the Germans, young or old, to respond when they find that the Allies are hypnotized by the magical words, "German economic efficiency?"

DEMOCRACY IN REVERSE

"Roger N. Baldwin, national chairman of the American Civil Liberties Union, recently called American efforts to reorient Germans toward democracy a 'failure' and charged:

" 'The old gang of civil servants is back; business is run by the same men who ran it under the Nazis. Order, not liberty, is their chief concern. Government of, by, and for the people is a long way off.' "

(From a report to the Christian Science Monitor)

I. G. FARBEN MERRY-GO-ROUND

The New York Times of January 15, 1951 reported that the Allied High Commission had agreed on a plan to "break up" the mammoth German chemical trust and cartel, I. G. Farben.

Long before VE day, the U. S. A. had been aware of the evil role which Farben had played in building up Hitler's war machine and undermining the economies of Germany's prospective victims. At the risk of being trite, we dare say that I. G. Farben was a government within a government. Indeed there are many authorities who say that I. G. Farben ran Hitler, and not the other way around.

As early as May 19, 1946, the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Howard C. Petersen told a radio audience that the position of the American Military Government was "to destroy cartels and we are proceeding to do so." In this connection, Mr. Petersen declared that the old management of I. G. Farben had been removed and that "four or five Farben munition plants" were destroyed. Concluding his remarks, Mr. Petersen assured his audience that the Farben cartel would be wiped out in accordance with Allied control agreements. The year 1946 passed but nothing substantial happened.

A chronicle of events in 1949 and 1950 indicates the vicissitudes in the efforts to eliminate the Farben cartel.

1. On June 1, 1949 the New York Times reported that the United States Military Government was going to sell one of the I. G. Farben chemical trust properties. It was reported as a move to implement previous laws for the breaking up of the Farben cartel.

2. On June 25, 1949 the New York Times reported that "a committee of creditors, bond holders and stock holders of the former I. G. Farben chemical trust" would be established "as one of the steps in the dissolution of the monopoly and the sale of its properties."

3. On July 13, 1949 the United Press reported that the stockholders of I. G. Farben had charged the occupying powers with disregarding "rights of private property." According to the United Press dispatch, the I. G. Farben stock holders were objecting to Law No. 9 of Nov. 30, 1945 which was designed to break up Farben.

By the end of 1949 it became apparent that the wide publicity given to the breaking up of Farben that past summer was "premature." As the year 1950 rolled around, it became clear that the resistance of the stock holders of Farben was having its effect:

1. On February 24, 1950 the New York Times carried a story titled: "New Farben Trust Seen in Germany." The article reported "the alarm" expressed by Allied officials over the rebirth of the Farben cartel. The Times dispatch observed that "officials here also deplore the fact that subsidiaries, notably in Spain and South America, are operating for the benefit of the old German proprietors."

2. On April 24, 1950 the New York Times carried a story titled: "I. G. Farben Cartel Again Is Target." But the dispatch revealed that the sale of Farben properties "which was to have set the stage for a vast liquidation program, is now 'dead as a doornail.'"

The Times wrote that the Office of the High Commissioner had rescinded the plans for such sales because they had been "ill-conceived." The article continued: "Instead of selling the remaining I. G. Farben properties outright—as previously was considered by military government officials—the Allied High Commission experts were thinking in terms of reorganization with stocks to be rearranged among the present stock holders."

Finally, on June 5, 1950 the Associated Press carried a report which read in part: "The Western High Commissioners turned control of the West German chemical industry back to the Germans today. . . . The Germans get control of some chemicals that can be used in war, but that also have peacetime uses. . . ."

During these years of promise and failure, the former bigwigs of the Farben cartel were reinstated in their old jobs, particularly in the French and British zones. For example, Wilhelm Mann, who had been indicted as a war criminal, resumed his post as director of Farben's Bayer Co. at Leverkuesen. Mann, according to the court transcript of the Farben trial, was an active Nazi Party member from 1931 until the end of the war. He took a leading part in creating and equipping the Nazi war machine. On the basis of his Nazi affiliations, Mann in 1933 purged the Farben organization under his control of all "non-Aryans."

Another important Farben official, who was restored to a preeminent position in the Farben hierarchy is Ulrich Haberland. Herr Haberland, unfortunately was not placed on the dock for the war crimes he committed. He was a member of the Nazi Party and as a bigwig in the Farben Combine, shared the responsibility for the employment of slave labor.

According to the New York Times of January 15, Haberland is the chief spokesman for the Farben empire in opposing the present plan of the Allied High Commission to establish 3 large companies and 6 smaller concerns out of the Farben combine. This is only a slight change from the pre-war organization of Farben, which was always divided into 3 groups as contemplated by the new plan.

One would think that Haberland would be prevented from regaining a position of power. But in accordance with the morality of some of the leading occupation officials, and with Allied policy to encourage "efficiency," Haberland was appointed as a manager of the Leverkuesen plant of I. G. Farben, which includes the huge Bayer organization.

As regards the new Allied plan to "break-up" Farben, the authoritative magazine Business Week, declares that the 3 major units resulting from "splitting" Farben look "a lot like cartels in their own right."

The Times indicates that the war criminal, Herr Haberland, who was never prosecuted, is not so much opposed to the setup of the 3 major units as he is to questions of detail. In this connection, Business Week reports that Law 35, covering the "decartelization" of Farben is precisely the kind that "the Germans—government, businessmen, stock holders, have been plumping for with all their might." Thus it seems that we are witnessing a sham battle, one which has been fought over and over again since the end of the war.

Given the political climate of today, which is so favorable to Germany's resurgence, and given the group of Allied officials who worship German "efficiency" and who do not feel any pangs of conscience by permitting war criminals like Haberland to dominate the German Chemical industry, is it not clear that the final victory will go to the Farben gang?

An Alternative to Rearming Germany

by

James. P. Warburg

(Author, Economist, Lecturer)

I

The writer has been a "re-examinist" with regard to certain aspects of our foreign policy during most of the postwar period. He has supported the Marshall Plan, "Point Four" and the Atlantic Treaty. He has opposed our assuming the role of self-appointed global policeman, involving the assumption of far-flung military commitments without commensurate military power. Testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in May 1949, the writer warned against assuming the specific commitment of defending Western Europe against invasion in the event that the deterrent to aggression provided by the Atlantic Treaty should fail to prevent a Russian attack. He contended that the United States should not commit itself to any pre-announced strategy of defense and maintained that an undertaking to defend Europe at the Elbe or the Rhine would sooner or later lead to the fatal mistake of rearming Germany. This would not only fail to make Western Europe secure against invasion but might easily provoke the very attack we were seeking to prevent. The Senate Committee expressed its concurrence with these views. Nevertheless, the commitment to defend the frontiers of Western Europe was shortly thereafter taken by the administration, accompanied by repeated assurances that no rearmament of Germany was contemplated.

A year later the Government of the United States declared itself in favor of West German rearmament and is now engaged in trying to force the consent thereto by a reluctant Germany and an even more reluctant France. On October 21, 1950, the Russian Government issued a protest and suggested renewed four-power discussion of a German peace settlement.

In view of these developments, the writer has ventured to submit to the Secretary of State a proposal for the "re-examination" of our European policy which he believes would strengthen the defense potential of Western Europe, while at the same time creating the conditions in which a German peace settlement might profitably be discussed. The following is the gist of the proposal submitted.

II

Our Government is proceeding, at present, on the assumption that German rearmament and French rearmament can be made to complement each other. The evidence from abroad indicates this belief to be a fallacy.

1. Reports from Germany indicate:

(a) that the West Germans will not willingly rearm for a war in which their country would be the battleground—much less for a war in which the defense might be moved back from the Elbe to the Rhine; if they fight at all, the West Germans will want to fight an offensive war to recapture Eastern Germany;

(b) that the Germans will be uncertain allies unless they are sure of a Western victory, which they will be only when they see some twenty American and British divisions stationed in Western Germany; and

(c) that the Germans will not willingly rearm at all as second-class members of a Western coalition; that they will demand full equality, including equality in command.

2. Reports from France indicate:

(a) that if these German conditions are met, France will become more "neutralist" than ever;

(b) that the French do not want to fight an offensive war to recapture Eastern Germany for a strong, militarized German nation;

(c) that the French do not want or trust Germany as an equal partner; and

(d) that while the French would like to see large American and British armies stationed on the Continent, they fear that such a build-up in Germany may provoke Russian attack.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that German rearmament and French rearmament would actually cancel each other out; and that our present policy, while possibly producing some sort of compromise "agreement," will fail to produce the will to resist anywhere in Western Europe. Such a result might well invite Russian attack.

III

The alternative suggested is to forego German rearmament and, instead, to encourage serious rearmament and the will to resist in France and the Low Countries, by undertaking to station in those countries not less than twenty American and British divisions. This would be done on condition that France would match—division for division—any such Anglo-American garrison.

Admittedly, this alternative will not provide a sure defense against 175 Russian divisions. It still involves the risk—inherent in the commitment we have taken—that, if war comes, we may have to begin it with another Dunkirk, or worse. But, under this alternative, we should at least know upon whom we could count to provide a real deterrent to aggression and to put up a real fight if an invasion were launched. At the very least, we should have created the conditions in which a rearmed France and its rearmed neighbors could reasonably be expected to offer determined resistance.

This is the first part of the writer's proposal. It is a plea to reconsider where, how, and with what to build real strength in Western Europe, even if it entails far greater immediate efforts and sacrifices here at home than our present program.

IV

The second part of the writer's suggestion is founded upon the revised rearmament program just suggested. It deals with a new approach to a German peace settlement.

In their proposal of October 21, the Russians put forward four major suggestions:

1. A reaffirmation by the four occupying powers of their Potsdam undertaking to keep Germany demilitarized;

2. The "removal of all hindrances to the development of a peaceful German economy," and a renewed pledge against the "rehabilitation of the German war potential";

3. The "undelayed conclusion of a peace treaty," the creation of a unified German state, and the withdrawal, within one year after the peace treaty, of all occupation forces;

4. The "creation of an all-German Constitutional Council on the basis of balanced representation of Eastern and Western Germany"—this Council "to prepare for the establishment of a German Government."

Taking his cue from the Russian preamble to this proposal, which contained the usual vilification of the West, the Secretary of State issued a formal statement on October 24, denouncing the "effrontery" of the proposal and demanding that the Russians demonstrate their sincerity by deeds rather than words. This was to be expected, in view of the predicament to which our present policy has brought us. That predicament consists in being unable to discuss the possible attainment of our own avowed objectives in Germany without running afoul of our present efforts to include Western Germany in a Western defense bloc. So long as these efforts continue, we cannot discuss the unification of Germany, we cannot discuss a peace treaty, we cannot even contemplate the withdrawal of our occupation forces. So long as our present policy stands, it is clear that we shall be embarrassed by any suggestions—sincere or insincere—for a renewal of negotiations leading toward a German settlement.

If, however, we were to modify our defense program along the lines already suggested, the situation would be reversed. We should be relieved of our present embarrassment and Russian sincerity would then truly be on trial before the world.

As matters stand, we cannot renew our Potsdam pledge against remilitarization for the simple reason that we intend to remilitarize Western Germany. Therefore, we can only denounce the Russians for having broken their pledge by a partial remilitarization in Eastern Germany. Granted that the Russians have transgressed, our case is weak because we intend to transgress even more. Under the alternative here proposed, the Russians would have to undo what they have done in Eastern Germany or else admit that their proposal was insincere.

The same thing holds for the Russian proposal to unify Germany, sign a peace treaty and withdraw all occupation forces. Here, too, we can only denounce the Russians for having until now obstructed unification. Our case is weak for two reasons: first, not only the Russians but our friends, the French, have obstructed unification and would still be reluctant to see it accomplished; and, second, our present program for rearming Western Europe is based upon the assumption of a divided Germany. Under the suggested alternative, we would be in a position where we could sincerely pursue our avowed objectives, where we could allay French fears of German unification (since Germany would be kept demilitarized), and where Russian sincerity in proposing unification would be on trial.

The greatest obstacle to a German settlement in the past has been Russian unwillingness to permit a unified Germany to be democratic, in the Western sense—that is, to have a government based upon free elections and a constitution guaranteeing the political freedoms. Mr. Acheson rightly denounced the Russian proposal for "balanced representation" between East and West and for its implied failure to permit an all-German government based upon free elections. Since then, however, there have been some interesting reports of statements by East German communist leaders which indicate that the Russians might be willing to back down on their "balanced representation" and possibly even accept free all-German elections. This could be true, if the Russians have concluded that a demilitarized, "democratic" Germany (in the Western sense) would be less of an evil than a remilitarized Western Germany. If so, this would be a great step forward toward a German settlement. But we shall never find out by just asking, unless the Russians feel that, by making the concession, they have a chance of preventing West German rearmament. The suggested alternative would make it possible to demand a clear answer.

Finally, when the Russians proposed (item 2) "the removal of all hindrances to the development of a peaceful German economy," they were, in effect, offering to give up further reparations out of current German production. In the past, this has been the second great obstacle to a settlement. This proposal may have been a bluff or a sincerely offered concession, motivated, perhaps, by the fact that the Russians know they have milked the East German cow fairly dry. Once we get ourselves in a position where we really want unification and a settlement, we shall be able to find out whether this second obstacle has been removed.

V

To summarize:

1. The writer submits that, by embarking upon the suggested course, we shall not weaken but strengthen the defense of Western Europe. It should be noted that this proposal does not suggest that the Russians should retire a few miles to the Oder, while our troops come home across the ocean. Under this proposal we and the British would maintain at least twenty full-strength ready divisions no further from the West German frontier than the Russians will be from the East German frontier, and this Anglo-American force would be at least matched by France and the Low Countries.

2. The writer submits that, by modifying our rearmament program as suggested, we shall put ourselves in a position to pursue with sincerity our avowed aim of unifying and permanently demilitarizing Germany, of working out a peace settlement, and of withdrawing all occupation forces under United Nations supervision and control.

Obviously, if this plan is adopted, we shall have to go considerably further in arming ourselves than seems at present contemplated. It is unlikely that the British could provide more than perhaps five divisions for a West European garrison. This means that we should have to provide fifteen—perhaps more. The writer believes that the American people would not balk at the additional sacrifice and effort, if they were given an opportunity to study and understand the facts.

The writer is fully aware of the dangers involved in moving nearer to the condition of being a full garrison state. He would accept this evil until, by determined creative effort along political and economic lines, we can at last create those conditions in which universal enforceable disarmament becomes a practicable possibility.

If the present acute crisis in Asia can be surmounted, here is our great opportunity to strike at the heart of the cold war, which lies in Europe. To seize this opportunity will require both skill and courage. In foregoing German rearmament, we should not be making a concession designed to appease Russia. We should be making a concession demanded by a clear understanding of our own vital self-interest. Were we to change our course with regard to German rearmament, we should bring about, here and throughout the world, a feeling of relief, of renewed confidence in the justice of our cause, and of hope for the future.

"There are two major reasons why the Russians might prefer to wait a while.

"One is that it will take at least a year before Atlantic Pact blueprints start getting translated into actual armies. It will take time to reconvene the war-industries of the Ruhr. It will take time to win over the still bargaining west-German leaders, and even more to win over a German people who don't want to fight for either side. The Russians may prefer to wait until an attack can be timed to a sharp crisis of disunity in the West.

"Which leads to the other reason. Every step we take to arm Germany means bringing back the former Nazi generals and the military caste, which in turns means placing Germany under a blacker reaction. This is a risk which even Gen. MacArthur has all along been unwilling to take in Japan. If we do it in Germany, we weaken further our ties to our allies in Britain and France, who still have reason to remember the German military caste. The Russians, I suspect, may not be adverse to allowing us some time in which thus to undermine our own moral strength in Europe.

"I wonder whether either side can stop on this road to a common suicide. The trouble with time-tables is that they become ends in themselves, and take on a motion and volition of their own. This is the most terrifying element in the whole world crisis."

COMMON SENSE

"Another reason why sizeable military assistance from the United States is essential and why production of military equipment in Continental Western Europe cannot be pushed beyond certain limits ties in with the problem of Western Germany. It is not in the interest of our long-range security that the Ruhr should once again become one of the world's major producers of military equipment. There is, of course, always the dreadful possibility of a successful Soviet invasion of Western Europe, in which case the Ruhr would fall under Soviet control. But even leaving this possibility aside, we must be wary of developing in Germany a powerful arms production center which might some day be used for the sake of dominating Western Europe or for the basis of a German-Russian deal. It is better for our own security and for that of our Western European allies in two world wars that industry in the Ruhr should concentrate on the production of necessary civilian goods for the Allies rather than munitions. Western Germany can and must be integrated with the rest of Western Europe, but under circumstances where she would not become the single dominating element in that part of the world."

(From a Statement on European Recovery Program by the Board of Directors, National Association of Manufacturers)

"The Allied High Commission has agreed on a new plan for the break-up of the I. G. Farben empire into three big and six smaller companies. This preserves the Allied record of drafting at least one plan for the break-up of Farben every year since V-E Day."

Who Should Distrust Whom?

"Germany has been besmirched . . ."

Over a tri-zonal radio hook-up some weeks ago Dr. Konrad Adenauer, Chancellor of the Bonn Republic, bitterly complained to his fellow Germans that they were still distrusted by some of the Allies. As though he were shaking a warning finger at the Allies, he said that this attitude must be corrected because, "Distrust never breeds trust on the other side, but only infects with distrust again."

Dr. Adenauer's complaint should cause surprise among the Allied High Commissioners, French, British and American alike, for they, of all people, have devoted a good part of their energies toward establishing mutual understanding and friendship with the former enemy. The record is clear on that score. Seldom have the Allied High Commissioners failed to concede to Dr. Adenauer whatever he has desired. As a matter of fact, the whole history of the Allied occupation is one of accommodating the Germans at every turn, so that today it is no longer a case of the Germans waiting on the Allies, but rather the Allied High Commissioners anxiously wooing the Germans.

Only recently Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, British High Commissioner, speaking before the Senate of the City of Bremen, pleaded with the Germans to accept partnership with the West. To the Germans he said: "We can save our Western inheritance. The people of the West have the numbers, the resources, the technical ability and the courage with which to overcome all perils." Thus Sir Ivone made short shrift of the other kind of German—the destroyer of the great cultural landmarks of the West. His colleagues, the American High Commissioner, John J. McCloy, and the French High Commissioner, Francois Poncet, are by no means playing second fiddle in this race for the hand of the Germans. Surely Dr. Adenauer has no cause for complaint insofar as they are concerned.

Then why does Dr. Adenauer continually berate the West for their mistrust of German intentions? Can it be that he believes that the Allied High Commissioners do not reflect the sentiments of the overwhelming majority of the peoples of the West? Can it be that he fears that the peoples of the West refuse to be duped by German stratagems?

Certainly a casual reading of the remarks made by Germany's leading politicians, including Dr. Adenauer, would give sufficient justification for the peoples of the West to continue to keep the Germans at arm's length. Dr. Adenauer, himself, in one of his rare off-moments, let loose a torrent of abuse which in itself is an answer to the reason why the Germans have failed thus far to ingratiate themselves with their former victims. Here is what he said: "Germany has been besmirched, insulted and degraded too long. For five years we have been demilitarized and dismantled. For five years we have had war crimes trials and the German soldier has been maligned and insulted."

Dr. Adenauer's outburst is not exceptional among German politicians. For example, the German newspaper, Der Kurier, reported on September 29, 1950, part of a statement made by Dr. Seebohm, Adenauer's Minister of Trade. Seebohm demanded that: "The honor be restored to the German soldiers." He demanded an end to the defamation of the German Wehrmacht as well as an end to denazification. Concluding his remarks, Seebohm said: "We would regret the shedding of one drop of blood for foreign interests." But significantly, he added: "When the fatherland calls, then we will know what our duty is."

In a recent debate on foreign policy which took place in the Bonn Parliament, Dr. Adenauer's "line" was reiterated by other leading German politicians. As the debate opened up, Dr. Schumacher, the leader of the German Social Democrat Party, thundered against the Allied occupation and demanded complete equality for Germany. "The spirit of unconditional surrender," he declared, "is not the spirit which is required for political and military collaboration with the Western powers." As for Germany's contribution to Western defense, Schumacher said: "We are not an instrument for the defense of somebody else. Germany cannot be used as a territory to defend other countries. Germany must have complete equality in fact. . . ." However, in his harangue against the Allies, Schumacher let something slip which perhaps was a good thing for those of us who want to be at all times up to date on German thinking: "We," he boasted, "were alone to fight Communism while the Allies negotiated with the Russians." Could this perchance be reference to Hitler's "glorious war for the fatherland?"

Schumacher's remarks were seconded by the leaders of other German parties in the Bonn Parliament. Dr. Seelos of the Bavarian Party demanded the end of the war status, demanded abolition of the occupation statute, demanded that all the trials of former generals be ended, demanded the liberation of all war criminal industrialists who were still in jail, demanded that the honor of the German soldier be restored, demanded Germany's admission to the North Atlantic Pact and the United Nations, demanded a reduction of the occupation costs. Not to be outdone by these demands, other German politicians arose and spoke in a similar vein.

And so the debate went on until it was more or less climaxed by Dr. von Thadden, who spoke for the German Reichs Party. Von Thadden declared that only those states which have clean hands have a right to count on the German people. He referred to press statements that former Nazis would not be able to participate in the defense corps. To this he said: "Should these former Nazis be included in the army? If not, who else? In this case the West German Republic will be hardly in a position to set up any force at all."

Here is a typical collection of German politicians and their statements are typical. Yet Dr. Adenauer pretends to be hurt by the sad fact that the Germans are still mistrusted. His sensitivity and that of his colleagues is just a thin veneer which covers their contempt for the very peoples whom the Allied High Commissioners are supposed to represent in Germany.

"Deutschland Ueber Alles"

The pro-German apologist is a curious fellow. He speaks to Americans in the English vernacular, but his heart belongs to the "Fatherland."

Few publications have gone into as much detail as PREVENT WORLD WAR III in exposing these loyal sons of Germany, their publications and their groups. Our readers are familiar with our factual exposes of the writings and harangues of such characters as E. J. Reichenberger, Austin J. App, Kurt Mertig and others. It has been said that these individuals, for the most part, are crackpots whose diatribes against democracy and defiant defense of Nazi war crimes are of little consequence in the long run, and that it is best, therefore, to ignore their rantings.

PREVENT WORLD WAR III does not share this opinion. It has always maintained that these individuals and the groups they represent are real dangers, and a policy of ignoring their activities affords them the opportunity to dupe scores of patriotic Americans. Many of them do not only echo the defunct German-American Bund, but they also spread distrust, suspicion and disunity among our people. It is significant, we believe, that the very campaigns which the pro-German crowd has conducted since the end of the war to place the burden of guilt on the Allies and whitewash the Herrenvolk, are beginning to show marked success.

Of course, it would be an over-simplification to attribute the growing resurgence of the Germans and the Allied capitulation to German demands solely to the work of the pro-German forces here and elsewhere. But nevertheless, many of the things which these pro-German groups have demanded from the very beginning of the occupation have been conceded, and one can legitimately ask the question as to the extent to which these pro-German groups have influenced American policy in Germany.

In this connection, we are in possession of a document which contains a wire sent on December 12, 1950 by E. A. Fleckenstein, President of the "Voters Alliance for Americans of German Ancestry," to the representatives of the German Bonn Government in Washington. In this wire Fleckenstein appeals to the Bonn Government to blackmail the defense of Western Europe until the Allies admit their "crimes" against the Germans and submit to every German demand.

At this point it is appropriate to mention some basic facts concerning the Voters Alliance. Like many so-called German-American outfits in the United States, the Voters Alliance is fanatically pan-German in its outlook. The New York Post Home News in April, 1949, ran a series of articles on the Voters Alliance and indicated that this organization was considered a successor to Fritz Kuhn's defunct American Bund.

On June 4, 1946, Supreme Court Justice Hammer denied the Voters Alliance permission to become a membership corporation on the grounds that "the name in connection with the purposes set forth . . . appeared provocative of the notion that an attitude was indicated to organize for domestic political action persons who might be resentful over the victory of the United States of America over Germany."

Among the directors of the Voters Alliance for Germans of American Ancestry is Eugene Brand. Brand is the owner of a newspaper store in New York's Yorkville section, and he is the main distributor in New York City of the hate sheet, The Broom.

The former President of the Voters Alliance was A. O. Tittmann. It is reported that he is now Vice President of the Voters Alliance. Tittman is a violent Jew-baiter. He has denounced Presidents Roosevelt and Truman and has defended the German war criminals. In his pamphlet, "The Planned Famine," he denounced the internment of German enemy aliens during the war and stated: "The whole is an outrageous violation of international law and human decency and shows into what depths of iniquity and depravity the Roosevelt-Truman dictatorships have cast the country." (Page 11)

On page 14 of this pamphlet Tittman wrote: "Since Germany was Britain's principal competitor, Roosevelt, the Jewish Pan-Briton, saw to it that Britain was to get the richest, the industrial part of Germany."

In his pamphlet, "The Nuremberg Trial," he wrote: "One might truthfully say that with the end of this war the Christian era has also come to an end. All previous tenets of conduct have been discarded and in their place established the vindictiveness of Mosaic Law. Hence, it is not surprising that the idea of 'trying' the leaders of the vanquished nations should have stemmed from a Jew, Judge Samuel I. Rosenman. . . ."

Returning to the Fleckenstein wire, we are quoting the following choice statements which will be found therein:

". . . The long fearless dedication of my organization to the cause of an absolute and unconditional rehabilitation of Germany entitles me in this hour of decision to call the following facts to the attention of his Excellency, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer.

"We urge the German government not to rearm the Reich, unless it is granted the right to possess full-fledged armed forces, officered by Germans and equipped with all kinds of modern weapons, instead of the proposed police force which could only fight a delaying action. . . . It is clear to us German Americans that if Germany welcomes these Greeks bearing gifts, the Truman-Acheson-Marshall triumvirate, and accepts their proposal to hire out a few Hessians to them, it will lead to the certain extinction of Germany. . . .

". . . In view of this dismal background the greatest precaution is advisable for the government of his Excellency, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, not to fall into a trap of the Truman Administration, since very recently Marshall, the co-assassin of China, has been brought into the Truman cabinet as Secretary of Defense and adviser. . . .

"German General von Manstein received a severe prison sentence from the western Allies for dealing sternly with red guerillas and snipers behind the German lines in Russia, and now, paradoxically, the Americans are confronted with the same question, as they see their own men brutally murdered by Communist guerillas in Korea.

"All considered, I want to warn his Excellency that any agreement which his government enters into with the Truman Administration is at its peril. The German Federal government should, therefore, break off all further negotiations concerning the question of rearmament, UNLESS AN IRON-CLAD GUARANTEE FOR THE DEFENSE OF ALL WESTERN GERMANY IS GIVEN.

"We also urge your government, as a condition precedent on which to base its dealings on this subject, to insist that the United States give certain guarantees beforehand to undo the rape of the trans-Oder-Neisse lands and that it recognize the validity of the Munich agreement of October 1938 and the rights of Sudeten Germans and other expellees to their lands. . . . Hence it should be your government's policy, before it continues to deal with the Allies any further, to force them to repudiate for all time their stand at Potsdam. A German government which does not seize this opportunity is guilty of a grave dereliction of duty.

"We also urge your government to insist on the immediate restoration to Germany of the merchant ships stolen by the allies, inasmuch as reparations imposed before a peace treaty is concluded are illegal and inasmuch as possession of these ships is necessary to the full restoration of Germany's foreign trade.

"It would be unthinkable for a German government to enter into further negotiations with the Truman Administration until the latter changes its apparent policy of not allowing Americans of German ancestry to become members of the U. S. military government in Germany.

". . . In the White House there still reigns a psychopathic antagonism to everything German.

"The entire subject of German rearmament and steps which are contemplated to be taken in that direction are extremely serious for the reason that the German people is not being consulted in this question any more than it was in the matter of the Occupation Statute, the rape of the Ruhr territory, the Acheson gift of the Saar territory to France and many other matters. The German people cannot be heard because no real freedom of speech and of the press exists in Germany. This telegram represents the prevailing sentiments of Americans of German origin and like so many other statements, this telegram will not be published in the German press because of the western allied commissars or because the German press will not dare publish these words out of fear of these commissars.

"One of the greatest crimes committed by the Nazi regime was its signing of the unconditional surrender agreement. The signing of same has given the color of legality to the violence, rape, looting, larceny and murder which all of the allies have visited on the German people. . . ."

It will be seen from the above "gems" from the Fleckenstein wire that a so-called iron-clad guarantee for the defense of Western Germany is tantamount to an Allied acceptance of the Germans' objective to regain the Eastern territories ceded at Potsdam, and to uphold the infamous Munich agreement of October, 1938 in all its aspects. This is a tall order, as it would turn the clock back to the days of Hitler. It would vindicate everything that Hitler stood for and make a mockery of the sacrifices of World War II. More than that, it would compel the Allies to pull Germany's chestnuts out of the fire and would probably lead to war.

In our opinion, however, the real significance of this wire lies in the fact that its contents, no doubt, bespeak the minds of many of Germany's leading politicians today. They are biding their time until the favorable opportunity arises when they can speak as boldly as Mr. Fleckenstein and the "Voters Alliance."

German Question — Atlantic Answer

by
Livingston Hartley

(The Society asked Mr. Hartley, who is associated with the Atlantic Union Committee, to present the views of the AUC on the crucial aspects of the German problem.)

MOST Americans are now so concerned with the growing menace of Communist Russia that they tend to forget the serious threat to peace and security inherent in a fully independent Germany. Yet the German question, which has already brought two world wars, remains with us, though in a new form. If it cannot be solved successfully and permanently, it will compound our danger and may precipitate a third world war.

The German question brought war twice because Germany was the most powerful nation in Europe; because she occupied a strategic central position; because she maintained the most efficient and strongest army in the world; and because she was committed to policies of militarism and conquest. None of these conditions now applies except geographic position. But new conditions have arisen which make the modern German question potentially as dangerous as was the old—conditions which are connected directly with the rise and expansion of Communist Russia.

More than two generations ago, Bismarck made friendship with Imperial Russia a central feature of his foreign policy. In 1922, the Weimar Republic made a deal at Rapallo with Communist Russia, which led to Russian assistance in training the German army. In 1939, Hitler made another deal with Communist Russia, creating a temporary partnership which permitted him to unleash World War II. Over the best part of a century, regardless of forms of government, the Germans have turned periodically to Russia and worked with Russia when so doing was to their advantage.

Western Germany now occupies a middle position between Russia and the Atlantic democracies. The greater the degree of independence which the Western Germans gain, the more effectively they can take advantage of their middle position between the West and Russia. At the same time, the nationalists among them, rapidly growing in influence, will become better able to bid for power by advocating another deal with Russia.

Russia possesses some exceedingly valuable trump cards to use in such a diplomatic game. She can offer to restore German unity, anticipating that her stooges from the Eastern zone will eventually gain influence over the entire country. She can offer the Western Germans guarantees against invasion by the Red Army. She can offer to restore the lost provinces of Germany at the expense of Poland. She can even offer the Germans dominion over most of Western Europe if her expansion policies prove successful. When the potential value of these trump cards are weighed, it appears possible, if not probable, that the continuance of our present policies toward Germany may result eventually in the creation of a Russo-German alliance which could marry Russian manpower to German technical skills and productive capacity and immeasurably increase the war potential at the Kremlin's command.

How such a disastrous outcome can be prevented by our present policies is not clear. The German leaders have made it apparent that even limited German forces will be raised for defense only in exchange for greater independence. As progress towards such independence takes place, Western Germany can be kept on our side only if she is tied into the Atlantic Community by bonds which will endure. Whether or not these can be forged by means of diplomacy and agreements between governments is a 64 dollar question laden with atomic explosives. The past record of the Atlantic democracies in dealing with an independent Germany by diplomatic means gives little basis for expecting their continuing success under conditions which are incomparably more difficult than those which existed 20 years ago.

Certainly there is no hope of preventing a Russo-German partnership by the surrender and withdrawal policy which has been advocated by some Americans on the basis of Mr. Hoover's broadcast address of December 20. Such a policy would give the Kremlin far more than it has ever asked. Based upon invalid strategic conclusions, it would amount to the most gigantic act of appeasement in history. The American people, in exchange for a short period of peace, would allow the Communists to add the industrial plants of Germany and all Western Europe to their own, to turn our advance bases into their advanced bases for atomic attacks on our cities, and to create a war capacity which North America could not long withstand. As for South America, to consider the militarily weak and ideologically vulnerable republics of the continent as components of any kind of "Gibraltar" is to be more imaginative than realistic.

A future Russo-German partnership might in theory be averted by the integration of Western Germany in a Western European Union. From a practical point of view, however, this solution of the German question contains some dangerous flaws. Since the British have made it clear that they will not participate in a European Union, Western Germany would be its most powerful member in industrial power, productive capacity and population. Due to the importance of these factors under modern conditions, such a European Union would be likely soon to become dominated by the Germans.

A European Union dominated even partially by Germans could hardly be regarded as a reliable ally of the United States in the developing conflict with Russia. There would be no assurance that it would continue to maintain democratic institutions. There would be no assurance that it would not eventually seek security by a deal with Russia.

The flaws in a solution of the German question by a Continental Union disappear if that solution is broadened to a Union including both Britain and the United States. There could be no fear of German domination of an Atlantic Union since the Germans would be dwarfed both in numbers and in productive capacity by the peoples of North America alone. Neither could there be any fear of another relapse of the Germans into dictatorship, since their free institutions could be guaranteed by the Union.

This solution would also furnish a permanent answer to Germany's economic problems by providing a vast and expanding market for German products. It would make Germany economically viable and lift her off the American taxpayer's neck. It would permanently divert into peaceful economic channels the deep-seated German urge for expansion.

At the same time, German productive capacity could contribute powerfully to the economic, political and military strength of the Union. It would make the European part of the Union better able to bear its share of the burdens of defense. It would become possible to enlist German manpower and military skills in Union, not German, defense forces. And this could be done safely on a scale many times greater than that now contemplated by our political and military leaders.

Inclusion of the Western Germans in an Atlantic Union, moreover, would constitute a major move toward victory in the conflict with Communism. This development would insure that German unity could be found only inside the Atlantic Union. The Eastern Germans would not be slow to see the writing on the wall. Spurred by the desire for unity with the more fortunate two-thirds of their fellow-Germans, as well as by the contrast between the Union's rising living standards and their own, their resistance to their Communist rulers would build up progressively. This situation, however, could be dangerous only locally, because the men in the Kremlin would not risk war with an Atlantic Union possessing 80 per cent of the world's industrial capacity and most of its resources and able to apply its vast potentialities by means of a unified foreign policy and a fully unified military policy and defense.

In the long run it would seem likely that the resistance of the Eastern Germans to Soviet rule would prove successful. Even the Russian dictatorship could not then expect to maintain its grip indefinitely there solely by force.

The question arises, however, whether it would be practicable to include the Western Germans in an Atlantic Union. Since it would be a Union of peoples, not of governments, and since their inclusion could so effectively further the interests of both the Germans and the Union's peoples, the answer appears to be "yes." The Union would be designed to expand by inclusion of additional peoples who possessed adequate free institutions. Considerable progress has already been made in establishing free institutions in Western Germany, which would border directly upon the European part of the Union. Taking these factors into account and also the urgent need for a solution of the problem of Germany, it appears likely that the Western Germans could be included in an Atlantic Union relatively soon after it was formed.

Creation of an Atlantic Union would provide not only an adequate "situation of strength" but a sturdy bulwark of peace based upon an enduring world predominance of power which was destined to increase progressively through inclusion of additional free peoples. It would furnish also a permanent solution of the dangerous German question which has brought about two world wars and may set off a third. But a question may be asked at once by those who fear that such a war may engulf the Atlantic democracies in 1952 or even 1951. Is there time to achieve peace and security by Atlantic Union? There are good reasons to believe that there still remains time if we do not delay the initial steps too long.

In the first place, an Atlantic Union could be established relatively quickly under the pressure of crisis if it were streamlined for that purpose. Its primary essentials for security and prevention of war would be unified foreign policy and defense. If these essentials were provided through a limited political and military Union, a more comprehensive Union could be developed later when the more complex problems involved in its creation had been solved. Steps already taken by the Atlantic democracies toward integrated defense are steps towards military Union. The most urgently necessary step to make that defense fully effective is establishment of one Union Government able to bring the military and foreign policy of the Atlantic democracies under a fully unified control.

In the second place, the initial steps towards Atlantic Union will go far to solidify the Atlantic democracies, give their peoples new faith in the future and in victory in the conflict with Communism, contribute powerfully to their existing collaboration and convince the Western Germans that their hopes of peace and future prosperity depend upon cooperation with the western democracies.

Passage of the Atlantic Union Resolution, backed by one-fourth of the Senate and about 70 members of the House and re-introduced into the new Congress in January would electrify free people everywhere and contribute directly to all these results. This Resolution requests the President to invite Canada, Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxemburg to join with us in sending delegates to a Convention to explore the possibilities of forming, within the framework of the United Nations, a free federal Union. The delegates, representing the principal political parties of these democracies, may invite other democracies from any part of the world to participate in the Convention.

The meeting of this Convention, hailed by free peoples everywhere as the opening of a new era for mankind and a decisive step towards an eventual free world, would contribute further and much more powerfully to all these results. And it would seem likely to decrease at once the growing threat of another world war, since the rulers of Russia could not fail to recognize that democracies actively engaged in exploring Union would stand together under attack.

This step alone would sweep away much of the fear and lack of confidence which are among the salient weaknesses of the democracies, providing their peoples with a positive goal and a broad, new road to its attainment.

Illusions and Realities In World Affairs

by

T. H. Tetens

(This analysis of the world crisis in its relationship to American foreign policy is part of a forthcoming publication by Mr. Tetens entitled: "Peace Through Capitalism.")

A GERMAN WEHRMACHT AGAIN?

The failure of the containment policy in Asia and Europe has caused great nervousness among American policy shapers. Secretary of State Acheson, and high military planners who, a month ago, denied in solemn statements any intention of rearming Germany, are discussing today the necessity for a new German Wehrmacht, disguised as a "police force."

The architects of the containment policy favored from the beginning a tacit plan for the resurrection of a strong Germany, destined to become some day again the "bulwark against the East." This plan had not only the backing of a group of policy planners and diplomats in the State Department, but the plan was especially boosted by big brass in the Pentagon who dreamed of a German army of 20, 50 or even 100 elite divisions. This scheme turned out to be the most disruptive feature in our cold war strategy. It made the Germans bold and cocky in their shrewd maneuvers to wrangle bigger and bigger concessions from the Americans and the British. It made the French bitter to see the Western allies falling for the same booby trap that proved so disastrous during the twenties. It gave Russia the golden opportunity to join the race for the re-establishment of a united German Reich. The Soviets, having the better trump card in hand, and knowing intimately the German mentality, could easily outbid us in this poker game.

The big question is whether the Germans are really willing to fight for the Western powers. Experts on German affairs generally agree that the Germans, due to strategic economic and psychological reasons, will not line up with the West, but will side with the East against the Anglo-American bloc. Men with experience and calm judgment like Walter Lippman, Sumner Welles, William Shirer, James Warburg, Telford Taylor, Edgar Ansel Mowrer, Delbert Clark and Drew Middleton have often pointed to the dangers of a possible alliance between Western Germany and the Soviet Union.

The lofty miscalculations of our policy planners have brought our cold war strategy in Europe on the rocks and have opened the way for a new German comeback. The Germans would like to have a new Wehrmacht but they are not anxious to become "Kenonnenfutter" for the U. S. A. Uncle Sam can pay for the rearmament but the final bargaining offer will go to the East. American correspondents in Western Germany have frequently reported that all Germans show unwillingness to fight for the Western powers and that "the memory of the Russian campaign still haunts like a nightmare all those who took part in it." Among former German soldiers the most popular argument for siding with Russia runs like this: "If we fight for the Americans, Stalin will ship us by the millions as prisoners to Siberia; that means misery, slave labor and death. But if we fight with the Russians and the Americans win, we will go as prisoners to the United States which means good food, good treatment and nothing to fear. Thus, it is better we go with the Russians."

The thesis that in the event of a third world war the German people must side with Russia against the West has been expressed since Summer, 1948, in nearly every issue of the influential geopolitical journal Der Weg. According to American newspapermen, this attitude is prevalent among most of the Germans. Herald Tribune correspondent Joseph Neuman in a dispatch from Frankfurt of August 27, 1950, warned that those who have the "impression abroad that the German people would jump at the chance to get in uniform again . . . are sadly mistaken." Times correspondent Jack Raymond reported from Bonn on August 29, 1950, that Chancellor Adenauer is willing to share in common defense with the Western allies, "but the German people, cynical and fatalistic, are not so ready." On the same day, the Times correspondent Lansing Warren reported from Paris that Dr. Adenauer's request for rearming Germany "raises the greatest fears in every section of France, where the arming of Germany is considered premature and fears are held that the West Germans might be tempted to use their arms against the Western allies."

The Russians know they have nothing to fear from Western Germany. They have secret and open assurances from the industrialists in the Ruhr for close cooperation with the East. On Stalin's birthday, according to a report by Karl von Wiegand, chief foreign correspondent for the Hearst papers, leading industrialists in Western Germany sent carloads of gifts to the Red Czar in Moscow. Every informed newspaperman in Europe knows that Western Germany would be no reliable ally but rather a powerful satellite of Russia. In spite of all this evidence, our policy planners in the State Department and in the Pentagon still live in a fool's paradise and are willing to gamble on German rearmament.

A THIRD POWER BLOC IN THE MAKING

An essential part of our containment policy was to facilitate a quick comeback of a powerful German Reich. What the U. S. is doing at present in Europe is "Realpolitik" in favor of Germany. We rescued Germany from the consequences of defeat, we have built up again her gigantic industries and the plans under consideration in Washington will make Germany the strongest power in Europe. Germany is today far better off than France and England. We have sunk into Western Germany billions of dollars for her economic revival. It is the only part of our containment policy that has turned out a great success—for the Germans! Although the loser of the war, Germany is free of debts, and the Germans pay only comparatively low taxes, whereas the French and the British have to carry heavy tax burdens. On October 25, 1950, a United Press report from Frankfort stated that Jean Cattier, Marshall Plan chief for Germany, had warned the Adenauer government against the low tax system of better income groups. "No German in business, no matter how much he earns, pays more than 50% of his income in taxes. . . . This was much lower than in the United States, Britain or France."

Having restored Germany's power our policy shapers went a step further. It is a well-known fact that Washington put heavy pressure on France to come forward with a plan for European economic and political "integration." According to the Alsop brothers, the E. C. A. head, Paul Hoffman, was instructed to force France into a "shotgun wedding" with West Germany. The result was the world-stirring Schuman proposal for the creation of an European steel and coal cartel.

John Foster Dulles, one of our leading policy shapers, suggested that America create an European Union by "friendly but firm outside pressure," and he added "the United States can and should take that opportunity and exert that pressure."

The U. S. instigated Schuman proposal was enthusiastically supported by the Chancellor of the West German Republic, Konrad Adenauer. In several speeches and articles Herr Adenauer expressed his wholehearted sympathy with the Schuman plan, because it is "the first step for the unification of Europe." Europe, he said, will "become a third force (Dritte Macht) in the world, not as strong as Russia or the United States, but powerful enough to intervene successfully—in a decisive moment—to safeguard the peace." There was not a word about fighting Communism. On the contrary, Herr Adenauer stated that he does not fear that Germany would arouse Russia's anger, if the Western Federal Republic joins the Council of Europe. Germany, he said, "has again become a political factor with whom others will have to reckon in international affairs." The Third Force idea was received by the German people with great applause. According to Times correspondent Drew Middleton, the idea of a Third Force in world politics "powerful enough to make war between the Soviet Union and the United States impossible, brought a favorable reaction among the general public and from German political and industrial leaders." Middleton quoted the statement of a Ruhr industrialist that Western Germany's economy could not prosper "unless there were extensive trade with the Soviet Union and its European and Asiatic satellites."

In addition to the political goal of a federated Europe, Herr Adenauer pictured the aspects of a gigantic economic venture: "There is, first of all, a long-range economic goal, the colonization of Africa. . . . If we Europeans colonize Africa, we create at the same time a supplier of raw materials for Europe which will be of the greatest importance."

It is significant that Herr Adenauer's interpretation of the Schuman proposal rests on two main points: Firstly, that a federated Europe, dominated by Germany, will gain a neutralizing position between Russia and the United States and, secondly, that such a Europe will become a "Third Force" in the world, powerful enough to develop Africa as it own hinterland.

Germany's idea is to make the best of the present tension between the U. S. A. and Russia. It is to exploit American fear and milk American resources as much as possible in order to hasten the resurrection of a strong Germany. The old idea cultivated from Bismarck to Hitler, is that only a strong Germany can be a factor in world politics and thus be able to make alliances. And alliances are important because only a strong state will attract other powers for this purpose. Therefore, Herr Adenauer sees the easiest way for a German comeback to power in the setup of an European Union in which Germany will play the leading role in economics and politics.

An "integrated" Europe will automatically come under the domination of Germany's industrial octopus. There is even a far greater danger. If an European Union is established, its driving motor will be German nationalism and political intrigue. The German tentacles will spread into every nook and cranny of Europe and in all countries the old groups of economic and political collaborationists will immediately come to the fore again. In such a Union, Germany together with Italy, Spain, Portugal, Austria, Greece and Belgium, can easily form a solid block against France.

The French feel clearly that an "integrated" Europe will fall under the dynamic German leadership. What the Kaiser and Hitler could not accomplish with their military steamrollers in two world wars, will now be served to Germany on a silver platter by High Commissioner McCloy and ECA head Paul Hoffman.

An European Union will turn out to be the greatest blunder in our cold war blueprint. Germany's industry will not only dominate the markets in Europe, in stiff competition with the British and the U. S. A., but it will also conquer additional markets in Latin-America, Africa and Asia. The logic of events would bring inevitably political rapprochement between a German-dominated Europe and the Soviet Union. Thus, we would have just accomplished what we are trying feverishly to prevent: namely, that Europe will line up with the East, against the Anglo-American bloc.

Plans for a Third Power bloc have been discussed in German geopolitical journals and in secret German memoranda during the last three years. It is significant that the idea of a Third Power bloc was also supported in public speeches by Franco and Peron. In fact, the Third Force slogan has become the rallying cry of the remnants of the defeated Axis nations.

The clever German scheme of changing defeat into victory runs the following time table: After the establishment of a German-dominated Europe, a close tieup will follow with a Peron-dominated Latin-America. At the same time, the big German industrial combines will start with an ambitious plan for the economic exploitation of Africa for which they expect great financial support from the United States. Having gained a foothold in Africa, Germany will create close relations with the nationalistic

Union of South Africa and at the same time she will buttress her friendship with the whole Pan-Arabic world. Of course, that scheme can only be carried out after having established friendly political and economic relations with Russia. The agreement with Russia will also open the door to a very profitable trade with China and Southeast Asia.

German statesmen and geopoliticians are aware that a Third Power Bloc under German leadership will quickly gain freedom of action. German industry will gain access to vital resources in America, Latin-America and the Near and Middle East, and Germany will gain command over 700 to 800 million people in the world. Such a Third Power Bloc can play the East against the West and vice versa.

The Germans believe that during the next five to ten years, they will gain such tremendous economic strength and will make such great strides in scientific accomplishments that in a not too far distant future they will be ready for a knock-out blow against the Anglo-Saxon world. According to a dispatch by Karl von Wiegand, a British General in occupied Germany ventured his opinion as follows: "Given the opportunity and necessary credits, Germany, with its extraordinary stockpile of brains, energy and working capacity would within ten years become the most modern country in Europe, if not in the world."

German planners expect a severe economic crisis in England and in the U. S. A. within the next few years. If such an economic slump comes, it will have a terrific impact on the Anglo-Saxon position in the world. The British Empire will begin to disintegrate and the United States will be torn to pieces in a turbulent domestic crisis. In such a moment a German dominated Third Power Bloc might have a chance to make another bid for world mastery.

Germany's Third Power idea should be seriously pondered in Washington for it may easily play topsy turvy with the whole concept of the containment policy. The creation of a United Europe, dominated by Germany—the most formidable political, economic and racial bloc—is an old German dream. The United States went to war twice within a generation to stop that German venture. Now, our policy shapers in Washington are hell bent on "exercising friendly but firm outside pressure" in order to create a platform for which the Pan-German master minds have been longing for seventy years. If this suicidal plan ever materializes it will spell the doom not only of a free Europe, but of the Anglo-American world too. Such an European Union would automatically become the stepping stone towards German world rule.

Which Is the Truth?

"There is no room for military cliques or societies, or for reactionary doctrines. The democratic political leaders of Germany are aware, I believe, of the necessity of avoiding any such tendencies." (From a speech by John J. McCloy, United States High Commissioner, October 6, 1950)

"In favoring German participation in European defense, the United States emphatically opposes so-called 're-militarization' in Germany. . . . Nobody in the West wants a restoration of the Wehrmacht. The American people know of the overwhelming current of public opinion within Germany against such a restoration. . . . The U. S. is not willing to sacrifice basic democratic objectives in Germany to temporary expedience, and these objectives include an unalterable aversion to the Kasernenhoften, the Rekrutenschinderei, and the dominant role of militarists in the public life of Germany." (Die Neue Zeitung, Nov. 4, 1950, U. S. sponsored German-language newspaper)

"Brunswick, Germany. Veteran Nazis here have formed the most openly neo-Nazi organization yet—the 'Fighting Group of German Socialists.'

"The meeting held November 9 was called by Wolfgang Muller, who recently made an appeal over a public address system at the Brunswick fair for German pilots to join 'a South American air force.'" (Christian Science Monitor, Nov. 11, 1950)

". . . The Bruderschaft, organization of former German officers, finally came into the open in Bielefeld, November 5 and announced its formal organization. Since its start . . . the Bruderschaft . . . has changed . . . from a group of former professional soldiers into an organization led by former SS men. . . ." (New York Times, Nov. 11, 1950)

"Former German officers may use their military titles in public, the Hessian Ministry of Interior said today." (AP, Dec. 18, 1950)

"Chancellor Konrad Adenauer said that the relationship between West Germany and the free nations of the West was 'on the way to developing into a real partnership.'" (AP, Dec. 28, 1950)

"Now here again our task is easier than the German. We are accustomed to the idea of partnership. He is not. He has never been a partner. We are accustomed to compromise. The German is not. He expects 100% concessions and thanks, and the German Government which fails to secure this is deemed a failure." (Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, UK High Commissioner, Information Bulletin, Nov., 1950)

"Although most West Germans were opposed to the resurrection of a German national army, a majority appeared to favor active participation in a European defense force under unified Allied command." (From a letter of John J. McCloy to Dean G. Acheson, Secretary of State, Sept. 30, 1950, Fourth Quarterly Report)

While on the heights of the Petersberg at Koenigswinter, the generals and diplomats conferred about Germany's rearmament, indications were growing on the grass roots level that Western Germany does not want to be rearmed." (New York Times, Jan. 10, 1951)

"In some quarters it has been suggested that our recent actions are prompted by the desire to 'buy' German military help in a time of danger. In all earnestness, I urge the German people not to be misled by such suggestions. The fact is that the United States and the Western nations are not bargaining for German help, and they do not intend to do so." (American High Commissioner, John J. McCloy, U. S. Information Bulletin, Nov., 1950)

"The United States High Commissioner, McCloy, and West German Chancellor Adenauer, met in a bargaining session today to discuss Germany's demand for more sovereignty in exchange for German troops. . . ." (UP, Jan. 2, 1951)

". . . As the military committee begins its sittings, the Western powers already have virtually promised the Germans almost all political concessions presented by the latter as the price of rearmament." (New York Times, Jan. 10, 1951)

German-Russian "Bruderschaft"

Readers of PREVENT WORLD WAR III know that this magazine has never lent itself to the dangerous game of wishful thinking on questions pertaining to Germany. It has never subscribed to the theory (which, incidentally, has become policy) that a few kind words plus billions of dollars from American taxpayers would convert the Germans to democratic ideals. Nor has this magazine ever succumbed to the belief that the Germans would rise to the occasion in a crisis and prove their dependability as an ally against the rising tide of Communism.

The evidence of Russian-German collaboration in the past is too compelling—it cannot—it must not be ignored. For example, the Russian-German pact signed at Rapallo in 1922 was followed by secret cooperation between the German General Staff and the Red Army. This bond of common interest vis-a-vis the West was a precursor to the Nazi-Soviet alliance in August, 1939. Yet, throughout those fateful years Western diplomats preferred to hear nothing and see nothing. Indeed, there was an influential school of thought in the West which pinned its hope on eventual war between Russia and Germany. This partly explains, of course, the reason why the Germans received generous loans from the West to rebuild her war potential.

But when the terrible drama unfolded in 1940, the Germans struck their first devastating blow against the West. For a while it seemed as though the expensive pastime of daydreaming about the reliability of the Germans had passed into limbo. This is not the case today. Once again eminent statesmen and diplomats talk about the Germans as the great bulwark of democracy. Yet an increasing number of facts are available to them which show that "their" great "bulwark" may turn out to be a gigantic booby-trap.

Since the end of the war PREVENT WORLD WAR III has repeatedly published reliable data showing how, in spite of public assurances to the contrary, the West Germans are flirting with the East. In the last issue of the magazine (No. 36), we printed a full length study by Dr. Jean Pajus, which cited ample documentary evidence proving that the barons of the Ruhr were doing a lively business with the countries behind the Iron Curtain. Nor is this an isolated case. On the contrary, there is a developing cooperation between the Western Germans and the East in many other fields including, significantly enough, the military. In view of the current campaign to rearm the Germans for the sake of Western democracy, this seems to be an appropriate moment to report some new facts concerning the growing tieups between German militarists in the West and the Russian bloc.

Under the title "Germany Looks to the East," the September-October 1949 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III published excerpts from a sensational document bearing the initials of the Chief of the High Command of Hitler's Wehrmacht, Field Marshal Keitel, and of Grand Admiral Doenitz. Parenthetically, it is interesting to note that a group of Doenitz' naval colleagues are now pressuring for his release from prison though he had been convicted as a war criminal at Nuremberg.

This memorandum was written in 1945, a few weeks before Germany's surrender. It was entitled: "The Overcoming of the Catastrophe" and sought to find ways and means of preserving and revitalizing Germany's power. The conclusion of the document read as follows:

"A colossal bloc of world-dominating greatness, economic power, energy, and numbers of population would be created from ocean to ocean.

"Not only would the danger of future wars for generations be eliminated from Europe but also from the double continent of Eurasia.

"The two great peoples, the Russians and the Germans, have extraordinary possibilities for development without collision of their interests.

"The chief emphasis in this bloc will shift more and more to the racially superior, intellectually more active and more energetic (people), that means to Europe.

"Thus, would be formed an alliance between the young Socialist forces against the old rotten entrenched powers of the West."

This plan of a Russian-German alliance has turned out to be more than a paper scheme. It has active supporters in West Germany, among which are powerful groups of officers of the so-called Bruderschaft. We have already published a documentary exposé disclosing the character and purposes of the Bruderschaft. (See issue No. 35, PREVENT WORLD WAR III.) We revealed the fact that at the first meeting of the Bruderschaft on February 11, 1950 a secret memorandum outlining the program of the Bruderschaft, stated in part: "The goal of the Bruderschaft is the union of the peoples of Europe between the Atlantic and the Urals with the Reich of all Germans in its ethnographic and historic borders as an organic part."

Thus the idea of linking the Germans and the Russians into a solid mass is a fundamental objective of the Bruderschaft. New light on the activities of the Bruderschaft has recently appeared in L'Aube, the most prominent Catholic newspaper in France, which expresses the views of one of France's leading political parties, the MRP. L'Aube confirms earlier evidence which underscores the fact that the leadership of the Bruderschaft is ruthless and cunning.

Among the leaders of the Bruderschaft is Kurt Manteuffel, former Commander of the Greater Germany Division. In this connection, Melvin J. Lasky, writing in the New Leader of November 6, 1950, states that Manteuffel "was Hitler's favorite military adviser to the end."

Besides Manteuffel the leadership of the Bruderschaft consists of: Major Beck-Broichsitter, a former Chief of the SS Division, "Gross Deutschland," Dr. Franke-Greicksch, who was a close friend and assistant to one of Nazism's early leaders, Gregor Strasser, and one Dr. Achenbach, representing powerful industrial interests.

According to L'Aube, Franke-Greicksch is considered to be one of the main advocates of a closer collaboration with the Soviets. He is convinced that only on the basis of a firm understanding between Germany and Russia can the Fourth Reich become a power in Europe again. In the month of July, 1950, Franke-Greicksch declared at Frankfurt: "I have succeeded in entering into good relations with the Soviets." Shortly thereafter, Franke-Greicksch followed up his words with deeds. He went to Munich and from there to Prague where he had extensive conversations with administrative officers of the Eastern zone and generals of the so-called People's Police, as well as with Russian diplomats.

Prior to his trip to Prague, Greicksch had a long conversation with General Vincenz Muller, Chief of the General Staff of the People's Police of Eastern Germany. L'Aube discloses that at the conclusion of their discussions, they reached an agreement under the terms of which all former German officers who cannot be placed in the West German army, to be created, would be accepted by the Eastern People's Police in the Soviet zone. It was also agreed that the Bruderschaft would undertake to organize para-military organizations among the Volksdeutsche refugees in the Western zones. These para-military formations, according to L'Aube, would be used to harass the Western Allies in the event of a new war in Europe.

L'Aube further states that there is evidence indicating that the Bruderschaft is supported by the Soviet Government. Both Greicksch and Muller agreed that the Bruderschaft must work on the closest terms with the Soviet sponsored National Front of Germany. This is in keeping with the oath formulated by the Bruderschaft which all German officers must take when and if they join a West German army: "I pledge to work for the re-establishment of Germany's unity with the weapons in my possession, and in case of necessity, by force."

Leo Lania, writing in a recent issue of United Nations World, reported the following statement by Franke-Greicksch on a Russian-German alliance: "The Latins and Anglo-Saxons after the French Revolution ceased to mold European history. The Slavs and the Germans are destined to create a new revolutionary order. The Prussian Eagle and the Russian Bear are the symbols of a new Europe. Dialectical materialism in its modern form is a synthesis of idealism (German) and materialism (Russian)." This statement seems to confirm L'Aube's contention that the real philosophy of the Bruderschaft bends toward some sort of National Bolshevism. It is interesting to note that in his article on German militarists, Mr. Lania states that extremist rightist parties headed by several neo-Nazis such as the notorious Major General Otto Remer, Fritz Dorls of the Socialist Reichs Party, and Alfred Loritz, "the new Hitler," are not only enthusiastic supporters of the Bruderschaft, but "they agree more with the East than with the Western orientation."

Some writers contend that while Franke-Greicksch is an ardent exponent of a Russian-German tieup, there are other powerful leaders in the Bruderschaft who seek a Western orientation. This remains to be seen. True, Franke-Greicksch is more outspoken, but even Beck-Broichsitter, who is alleged to be of the Western school, has been reported toying with the idea of closer relations with the East.

According to L'Aube, even the Russians suspect the Bruderschaft's intentions. Thus, to avoid any "mishaps," the Soviets have selected a certain Captain Boldt, former Aide to General Guderian, to oversee the activities of the leading figures of the Bruderschaft. Captain Boldt is head of a bureau called "Office for Germany's Unified Affairs," with headquarters at Lubeck. This town, which is situated close to the Russian zone, serves as the liaison center for the Soviet sponsored "National Front of Eastern Germany." In this strategic position, Boldt plays an important role in the expansion of the activities of the Bruderschaft and seems to have at his disposal considerable funds to expedite his work.

Unfortunately, the exposes of L'Aube are unknown to most Americans, who have been given to understand that of all the peoples of the West, the Germans are the most dependable and the most resourceful. We have no doubt that as time goes on more light will be shed on the roots of Russian-German collaboration, and how deep they go.

Our readers can be assured that PREVENT WORLD WAR III will continue to provide them with the facts concerning this great danger which presses on, while the statesmen of the West construct grandiose schemes involving Germany's participation in a common defense against aggression.

Was the Decartelization Program Sabotaged?

PART II

The Robert Bosch Combine and General Arthur Wilson

As part of its educational activities, the Society for the Prevention of World War III has held conferences with former decartelization employees and has made a study of their findings, most of which have been published in books and magazine articles. The article following represents the collective viewpoint and expression of these experts.

The spectre of a militaristic, re-Nazified and anti-democratic Germany is again making its appearance. Former Nazi industrialists now occupy the leading positions in industry and in the political and economic administration of the Bonn government. Rightist parties are expanding their influence among the populace. German cartels are being reconstituted. These are facts of great portent to everyone who remembers Germany's potential capacity to wage war, her unceasing efforts to become and remain the dominant power in Europe.

What contributed to these new developments? Certainly, one factor was the failure of American Military Government to carry out the decartelization program for Germany which originally constituted a fundamental objective of American occupation policy for Germany. This failure opened the way for a return of the old Nazi forces; it strengthened their hand vis-a-vis the democratic nations, and it has enabled them to conduct a policy of blackmail of the democracies for economic and political concessions in return for their "support" of the West against the East. The approval of a Franco-German steel pool must be paid for, in the eyes of the resurgent German Nazi industrialists, by permitting them to make Germany the major industrial power in Europe. Can we afford to pay such a price?

How the failure of the decartelization policy in Germany contributed to these developments will be illustrated by the fiasco of the efforts to deconcentrate the biggest automotive equipment combine in Germany—Bosch. The Bosch combine was not only the biggest monopoly in its field and therefore an excessive concentration of economic power, but it was also a company which had devotedly contributed to the building up of the Nazi war machine. It had utilized its facilities and foreign affiliates to conduct espionage in the interests of the German government. Its espionage in the United States during the first world war, and its activities on behalf of the Nazi regime prior to U. S. entry into the second world war, are a matter of record.

In March, 1948, General Clay ordered the Decartelization Branch to cease all action against Germany's major combines, with the possible exception of Bosch, which became the only major industrial combine against which the staff of Decartelization Branch was permitted to prepare an order for deconcentrating its excessive economic power. Yet, although Clay gave his reluctant assent to the action against Bosch, the Decartelization Branch had arrayed against it a coalition of forces within Military Government and outside of it, which rushed to the defense of Bosch and made every effort to nullify any effective execution of an order against Bosch. These individuals included the head of Decartelization Branch, Richardson Bronson, and the top economic advisers of General Clay, Wilkinson and Hawkins. They also included Leland Spencer, chief of the Bipartite Industry and Commerce Committee.

Bosch, located in Stuttgart, had the support of George Erion, chief of the economic division, who fed Bosch information on the planned deconcentration order. General Wilson, whose connections in the United States and Germany came from the highest levels, also played a most prominent part in restoring Bosch's international position. With all these forces operating to upset the proposed order against Bosch, it was a foregone conclusion that the endeavors of the Decartelization Branch were doomed to failure. How this took place and who was responsible will be shown in the following paragraphs.

I. The Bosch Combine as an Excessive Concentration of Economic Power

Under Military Government Law 56, passed in 1947, together with amendments and regulations, it was the mandatory obligation of Military Government, through its Decartelization Branch, to carry out deconcentration of German enterprises and combines or monopolies which constituted an excessive concentration of economic power. The Bosch combine not only conformed with this definition but it had made tremendous contributions to the expansion of the Nazi war machine and the building up of the Nazi war potential. The Bosch combine, in every sense of the word, was an enterprise the deconcentration of which was in accordance with U. S. policy directives on denazification, demilitarization and decartelization. The Bosch combine, domestically and in foreign countries, was an essential element in the war plans of the German government in the first world war and of the Nazis in the second world war. In both wars, Bosch interests in the United States had been seized by the Alien Property Custodian Office.

The core of the Bosch combine is its three plants located in Stuttgart and its environs, in the American zone of occupation. These plants produced finished products as well as assembled parts manufactured in various Bosch subsidiaries. In these plants, also, all research and scientific developments were concentrated. The Bosch parent company kept a tight hold on all technical advances, and its research work, as was the case of all German combines, was highly centralized.

Bosch owned, in addition, 11 other companies, a controlling interest in 4 companies and minority participations in 5 other firms. Bosch directors occupied a total of 38 directorships in other industrial and banking enterprises.

Bosch's patent holdings were an important weapon in subduing its competitors. Bosch owned approximately 1,100 German patents and 4,000 foreign patents in addition to 7 or 8 hundred trade marks. This ownership of essential patents and trade marks provided the wily and shrewd officials of Bosch with the means for removing undesirable competitors and for restraining international trade in those areas where Bosch influence was strong. One of the devices in connection with patents was the Bosch system of licensing, under which Bosch could dictate prices and conditions of sale. The Bosch cartel policy is well expressed by a letter of the Bosch director, E. C. Rassbach, to its American affiliate, dated October 13, 1933:

". . . our attitude is not one of antagonism to your interest, but follows the lines of a well defined policy which is applied to all comers. We do not oppose your patents because they are your patents, but we oppose all patents which, of any origin whatsoever, can affect our interest, unless we are conceded an inside position. In other words we will always oppose the erection of fences by anybody on our possible territory, unless we can get inside of the fence, and in that case we will render every assistance to make it as high as possible."

While the historical evidence on the ruthlessness with which Bosch carried out its monopolistic and cartel policies is conclusive, it is an interesting contribution to the post-war mentality of former Nazi industrialists that the Bosch officials officially and unofficially proclaimed their innocence of all charges of unfair trade practices, or of any anti-democratic action, or anything except the purest motives to serve their customers and to further the welfare of its workers. Bosch officials went so far, indeed, as to claim that their activities increased competition.

The truth, of course, is the very opposite. Decartelization Branch analysts were able to show that Bosch used every financial and technical contrivance ever invented to eliminate, or paralyze, the competitors of the company. These devices included buying secretly into selected companies, exerting pressure through the banks on which Bosch directors sat, refusing to license its patents to firms which refused to toe the line, charging exorbitant royalty fees to drive competitors into bankruptcy, or where necessary, start price wars. During the last war, Bosch, in addition to being the recipient of many Nazi honors for its contribution to the German war effort, also employed many slave workers.

No wonder then that Theodore Heuss, venerable president of the Bonn republic and life-long friend of the Bosch family, felt compelled to write a post-war biography of old man Bosch, endeavoring to exculpate him from the verdict of history. In this biography, numerous copies of which were appropriately dispatched to the Decartelization Branch, Bosch is pictured as a devoted and unswerving anti-Nazi, a life-long democrat and, above all, a friend of the United States (see the following section on this category of affection). The company was depicted as passionately devoted to free enterprise, and it was alleged that whatever steps Bosch undertook in the direction of amalgamation (the word "cartel" was never used) were really in the best interests of the company about to be amalgamated. Wherever Bosch swallowed up another company, it was done only in the interests of providing Bosch workers with steady employment. Nowhere does Theodore Heuss speak of the medals bestowed upon Bosch by the Nazi regime, nor, for that matter, about the activities of Bosch in the United States.

Compare this with the statement made on October 17, 1941, by the Nazi Minister of Economics, Funk (hanged at Nuremberg as war criminal) when he bestowed the highest Nazi award to the father of the German steel cartel, Dr. E. Poensgen. "On my suggestion, the Fuehrer

". . . Dr. Schumacher has declared that Germany has suffered much more in the last war than other countries, so should be spared in the next; that Germans must not contribute to Western defense until the Western powers can undertake to win the first battle on the Vistula; and that not a German soldier will defend foreign national interests on German soil. This is the voice of the average German."

(London Economist, Nov. 25, 1950)

"For what has happened in Germany since the war the occupying powers have themselves a considerable responsibility. Russia is seeking to create Eastern Germany in her own image. America is seeking to do the same in the West. Perhaps the greatest short-coming of Western policy has been our failure to alter the structure of German society during the years when we had absolute power to control Germany. . . . The most reactionary bureaucracy is once more dominating German administration."

(F. Elwyn Jones, British MP, Oct., 1950)

awarded you, Dr. Poensgen, the rare distinction of the Eagle Shield of the German Reich. This distinction brings you into the same rank as men like Robert Bosch, Karl Duisburg, Emil Kirdorff, Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach."

The international strength of Bosch was derived from its ownership or control of 45 foreign affiliates. Through these affiliates, Bosch was able to fix the prices of its products in world markets. Some of these companies in turn owned subsidiaries on which Bosch could exercise influence through cartel agreements. Bosch's international connections were useful for conducting espionage in the interests of the German government.

As a major producer of Diesel engine components and fuel injection equipment, its economic power extended far beyond the limits of its own sphere of distribution and sales. Diesel and gasoline engine producers, automobile manufacturers and radio and television producers were to a greater or lesser degree dependent on Bosch for essential components. Bosch was able, therefore, to exert broad influence on a large segment of the total German economy.

At the beginning of World War II, there were no serious threats to Bosch's dominant position in the production of automotive equipment. The biggest German company in this field, the Eisemann firm, had already been swallowed up as early as 1923, although this deal was not made public until 1937. By 1939 Bosch had considerably expanded his activities into other fields including the manufacture of television sets, refrigerators, movie projectors and radios.

Bosch's productive capacity in the post-war period was not materially affected by military action. Although the Stuttgart plants suffered somewhat from bombing (the damage being exaggerated by Bosch officials), its subsidiaries remained largely untouched. Decartelization Branch investigators found that in relation to over-all German production, Bosch accounted for 75% of all generators, starters and ignition units; 65% of ignition distributors and contact breakers; 50% of coils for gasoline engines; 60% of electrical equipment for motorcycles; 70% of magnetos for stationary engines; 60% of forced feed lubricators; 60% of fuel injection pumps and accessories; and even 40% of all radio sets notwithstanding the relatively large number of radio set manufacturers. It also produced lesser amounts of other items of automotive and engine equipment.

There is reason to believe, moreover, that the above figures are understated. A former director of Bosch stated in conversations with Decartelization investigators that the percentage of total German production of some items of automotive equipment was as high as 90%.

II. Bosch Espionage Activities in the United States

Robert Bosch, Stuttgart, founded his American affiliate in the United States in 1906. All of the directors of the American company were German nationals, but a majority of the stock in the new company was personally held by Robert Bosch.

The Bosch Magneto Company was very successful and in a few years after its incorporation it had already managed to purchase the controlling interest in a number of American companies in allied lines of production. Among the companies in which Bosch acquired a controlling interest, was the American branch of Bosch's biggest German competitor, the Eisemann firm.

The Bosch interests in the United States were transformed into an important center of German espionage in the U. S. At the outbreak of the first world war, Bosch productive capacity for ignition equipment was large enough to satisfy the entire demand in the U. S. The Allies fighting Germany were desperately in need of this equipment. The Bosch interests in the U. S. were thus in a strategic position to sabotage the war efforts of the Allies. Bosch activities were directly under the supervision of Germany's top spy in the United States, Captain Boy-Ed, military attache to the German embassy. It was Boy-Ed who issued instructions to the directors of Bosch in the U. S. on the proper policies to be pursued on behalf of Germany's war effort. In a letter to Boy-Ed, Otto Heins, a director of Bosch, informed the former that the efforts of American Bosch company to prevent the Allies from obtaining essential war equipment were proving successful. Wrote Heins:

"Proceeding on the principle that interest in business profit was to be put wholly in the background and interest in defense of the country was singly and alone to be followed, the part of the business policy I was to take presented itself — everything must be tried to make difficult and slow in every way the acquirement by the enemy of the necessary special apparatus before referred to and to do this partly by seeing that the special war apparatus was not delivered by us and partly by the delivery of normal trade apparatus making the enemy believe that they could cover their requirements through us and would not hasten the production of special war apparatus themselves. . . ."

Heins went on to say that his efforts at sabotage were proving highly successful and that the Allies were experiencing great difficulties in producing the equipment which Bosch had promised to deliver, but failed to do so.

With American entry into the war in 1917, the espionage activities of the Bosch company were stopped. The American company was swathed, through various financial cloaking devices, in the garment of financial respectability. Notwithstanding these actions, American Bosch was seized as an enemy firm by the Alien Property Custodian and the Department of Justice proved, after an investigation, that the various cloaking devices and transfer of ownership to American hands, did not actually affect the ownership of the company, since Robert Bosch, Stuttgart, remained the real owner of his U. S. interests through the physical retention of the stock certificates. Up to that time, the German company and Robert Bosch, in particular, had withdrawn huge sums in payment as salary, royalties on patents and licensing fees. The financial cloaking devices were also useful, notwithstanding seizure, in order to facilitate the eventual returning of the ownership of American Bosch interests to the Germans after the cessation of the war. Although American Bosch went through a number of reorganizations, the company was again in a position to serve its German masters, which they did with no less vigor after the war than before.

With the advent of the Nazis to power, the espionage activities were intensified and expanded to include economic warfare. The Bosch combine became a willing and important link of Nazi plans for world domination. Its international policies were subordinated to the Nazi program for rebuilding the German war machine. The cooperation of Bosch with the Nazis was expressly stated in a letter by E. C. Rassbach, German director of Bosch, shortly after the Nazi accession to power. In this letter Rassbach wrote:

"... . all forces of administrative endeavor, such as the different cartels, etc., are to be brought into one definite line of endeavor coinciding, of course, with the policy of the ruling party. . . ."

This policy directive was faithfully observed by the American Bosch company. Thus, prior to the last war, American Bosch impeded the national defense efforts of the U. S. American affiliates of Bosch also succeeded, prior to World War II, in obtaining specifications on certain Army and Navy developments in the field of radar and short wave transmission. American Bosch also obtained engineering data on American producers in the field of fuel injection and ignition equipment for transmission to the Nazi government. American Bosch officials were ordered to retard or refuse to sell equipment to countries at war with Germany. Bosch also fixed royalty fees on its patents at such a level that the development of Diesel engines in the U. S. was retarded. It became necessary, in the interest of national defense, to obtain a court decree against Bosch nullifying certain agreements between American Bosch and the German company and forcing American Bosch to provide its patents on a royalty free basis. In the course of this action, the American Bosch Corporation was fined $50,000.

In 1942, American Bosch Corporation was for the second time seized by the Alien Property Custodian, but who knows if cloaking devices will not again lead to a restoration of the company to the parent concern at some time in the future?

At any rate, it is clear that the international activities of Bosch have been extremely inimical to the interests of the U. S. Can the effort by Military Government to restore Bosch to its former position of power be considered a contribution to democracy or a patriotic endeavor?

III. The Bosch "Deconcentration" Fiasco

From the foregoing, it was clear that Bosch ranked high on the list of major German industrial combines against which decartelization and deconcentration action was imperative.

Members of the Decartelization staff were occupied for a considerable period of time in gathering and analyzing the data on Bosch's internal and foreign economic power. By February, 1948, two drafts of an order directing Bosch to comply with the findings of the Decartelization staff had been prepared and submitted to Richardson Bronson, chief of Decartelization. (See his profile in our issue No. 36.) Bronson tabled these drafts and neither he nor General Clay's top economic advisers gave any hint as to whether the orders would be served on Bosch, or whether any action whatever was contemplated to implement them.

Then, in March, 1948, Bronson held the well-known staff meeting at which he informed all the members of the staff that General Clay had ordered all action against the major German combines to stop. Henceforth, only consumer industries would be subject to deconcentration and then only in accord with the so-called "rule of reason" which General Clay substituted for the mandatory provisions of Law 56.

In the beginning, Decartelization staff members working on the Bosch order were not aware of the combination of forces set in motion to thwart their loyal endeavors to carry out U. S. policy. They were not aware that a General Wilson had already undertaken various steps to undermine the Decartelization Branch and that Bosch officials were being advised by their friends in Military Government.

On the other hand, a deconcentration order against Bosch, to be effective, would have to include specific measures of implementation, measures which should provide for the severance of Eisemann, Bosch's major competitor prior to 1923, before it was absorbed by Bosch.

The order would also have to break Bosch's hold on his future competitors by removing his control over patents and licenses so that it could not again swallow the divested companies. In addition, it was essential to break up Bosch's international cartel agreements.

Decartelization lawyers, after examining Bosch's international connections, found that the combine could escape the controls set up by the Allied Control Council on German and Nazi external assets through the various loopholes and financial cloaking devices which Bosch employed to conceal its foreign ownership rights.

On direct instructions of Bronson, the provision against severing Eisemann was thrown out, as well as reference to Bosch's ownership of international companies which did not fall under specific prohibitions of Military Government laws. Moreover, Bronson instructed the drafters of the order to water down the section on patents and licenses in accordance with the wishes of Hawkins.

In the judgment of the experts on the staff such a change in the original deconcentration order would nullify any genuine action against the combine, now that Bronson had ordered all the essential sections of the draft changed or thrown out. Among the most important was the section severing Eisemann from the parent company. Bosch was permitted to retain this firm. The loopholes which the lawyers for Decartelization had plugged up in the sphere of Bosch's international connections were thrown out of the original draft, thus leaving Bosch free to re-acquire or re-establish its international position. Last, but not least, the section on licenses and patents was watered down in accordance with direct instructions of Philip Hawkins.

When the new draft finally emerged, it became apparent to the staff that the action against Bosch was meaningless, since the fundamental purpose of the deconcentration order nullified the specific prohibitions of the original draft. Moreover, under complicated machinery set up by Clay's lieutenants, a German company could employ a variety of appeals procedures to delay final action for a long time.

The order by Bronson to revise the Bosch directive, the long delays in approving the revised order, the maneuver employed by Bronson of shifting the work on Bosch from one member of the staff to another and then back again, all had their telling effects. One year after the original drafts on Bosch had been prepared, in March, 1949, Bronson stated that the "finalized" version of the Bosch order was now ready and would be forwarded to Bipartite Decartelization Board for consideration. From here on, action against Bosch passes into the limbo of dead silence, since no trace whatever appears as to what happened to this order subsequently.

IV. Bosch Friends in High Places— General Wilson

While the Decartelization Branch was preparing its order against Bosch, company officials were not laggard in defending their interests. They established close relationships with such people as George Erion, economics chief of the Military Government in Stuttgart. Through Erion, the Bosch people were able to learn the details of the order planned against them. They were also intimately associated with Leland Spencer, chief of the Bipartite Industry and Commerce Group. Spencer, an influential person in the determination of the steps taken by Military Government to revive German industry, declared that the Bosch directive would have to pass through his hands before it would be approved.

Spencer was in touch with U. S. businessmen who gathered material for use by the pro-Bosch officials in Military Government to defeat the decartelization program and in particular to water down and emasculate the Bosch order. Among the statements gathered, for instance, was one from Charles E. Wilson, former chairman of General Electric, opposing action against Bosch as detrimental to German industrial recovery. This material, gathered by Kenneth L. Meyers in the U. S., was forwarded to George Erion, Wurttemberg-Baden economics chief, and thus became available to Bosch for use in prosecuting its case before the various appeal boards. Other individuals on behalf of Bosch included Major General Hayes, Deputy Military Governor, who "inquired" into the nature of the impending action against Bosch and lent encouragement to those who were engaged in whittling down the Bosch directive. Among the most important of these individuals was an ex-general of the U. S. Army, Arthur Wilson.

As early as 1947, Wilson undertook an offensive against the decartelization program and the Bosch order. Ex-General Wilson, a private individual, and in no way associated with the Military Government, received the support for his activities from every Military Government official opposing the Decartelization Branch. They included the already well known Bronson, Hawkins, Wilkinson, Spencer and others, as well as officials in JEIA (Joint Export-Import Agency) such as George Santry, John French and other top officers of that agency.

Wilson's actions in the interest of Bosch deserve the closest scrutiny. General Wilson had met Bronson while the latter was in the service. He came to Germany on his own, armed with an introduction to General Clay. Although Wilson did not talk to Clay about Bosch directly, he nevertheless voiced his opposition to the entire decartelization program. He stated that his efforts on behalf of Bosch had the full support of all of Clay's top lieutenants, but did not indicate whether General Clay, himself, had directly encouraged his efforts.

Wilson was vitriolic against the staff of the Decartelization branch. He denounced their efforts to deconcentrate German industry as a reflection of their belief in the "Morgenthau Plan." He argued that Bosch had already been deconcentrated as a result of war action. He disputed the findings of the Decartelization staff on the cartel and monopoly position of Bosch within Germany and justified exclusive trade and distribution practices in the name of efficiency and normal business practice. He demanded that the order against Bosch be rescinded and that the company be permitted to remain intact in the Western zones with all of its subsidiaries. He declared that American taxpayers would be burdened if action against Bosch took place and stated that even the Bosch employees would suffer a decline in their standard of living. In all of these arguments, Wilson was echoing the Bosch position which Bosch officials had prepared in their reply to the order to comply with the already emasculated directive signed by Bronson.

However, Wilson's intervention in the affairs of Bosch was not the result of his deep concern for the American taxpayer. As a matter of fact, as early as April, 1947, Wilson had entered into business negotiations with the Bosch firm for the exclusive distribution of Bosch products throughout the entire world. The nature of the contract between Wilson and associates and the Bosch combine will be examined in the following section. It is necessary, however, to look at the various intermediary steps undertaken by Wilson prior to the final signing of the Bosch deconcentration order, to grasp the full importance of Wilson's activities on behalf of the Bosch cartel.

General Wilson engaged in numerous conversations with the Bosch officials in the course of 1947. Through Erion and the Industry and Commerce Group under Leland Spencer, Wilson was informed of the pending action against Bosch. Wilson started his operations by appearing in Berlin and soliciting the support of General Hayes, Deputy Military Governor. He was supplied with an official car, an office and a secretary. He expressed alarm at the consequences of deconcentrating Bosch to all of the top administrators of Military Government. He obtained the help of General Hayes with particular reference to the patent provisions of the pending Bosch order, and through General Hayes, he requested that they be changed. He engaged in numerous conferences with Bronson, Hawkins and Wilkinson on these matters. He also spoke to a number of staff members about the Bosch order, but decried their motives and the purposes of the entire procedure. These conferences between Wilson and the Bronson-Hawkins team occurred periodically over the course of months. It will be recalled that during this period, a draft of the deconcentration order had already been prepared and submitted to Bronson without any action and that the final version accepted by Bronson had been depleted of its vital provisions.

Is it a matter of coincidence that the vital parts of the Bosch order were thrown out on Bronson's instructions at the time when Wilson was conferring with Bronson and Hawkins? As we shall show in the next section, all of these provisions were of paramount importance in Wilson's business deal with the Bosch company.

The real motives behind Wilson's activities were made apparent when he presented Bronson and Hawkins, during one of his periodical visits to Berlin, with a copy of a draft of a contract between the so-called "International Products Trading Company" of Zurich, Switzerland, and the Bosch firm, giving the former exclusive rights to sell and distribute Bosch products on the international market. Wilson requested Bronson and Hawkins to give approval of the contract which had already been, in principle, accepted by JEIA (the Joint Export-Import Agency). These conversations concerning the contract also took place before Bronson instructed staff members of Decartelization to delete or change portions of the original draft of the Bosch order and before Bronson signed the revised draft of this order.

At no time was any member of the Decartelization staff informed by Bronson that such a contract was in existence or being considered by him and Hawkins, or that an agreement had been entered into by a foreign company and a German firm which was subject to deconcentration action. At no time prior to the issuance of the approved draft on Bosch did Bronson consult the legal members of his staff as to the validity of such a contract. Its existence was in effect kept secret by Bronson and Hawkins.

Hawkins and Bronson, after making a number of minor revisions in the contract, gave their approval to the deal and the contract was forwarded to JEIA which gave its final approval in July, 1948.

Asked to account for his relations with Wilson, Bronson subsequently grew very hazy about his conversations with him. Bronson never questioned the impropriety of a private individual, a citizen of the U. S., a former General, representing the interests of a German company before an official agency of the U. S. government. In any case, he never informed the staff about Wilson's deal with Bosch until the contract was accidentally discovered by a member of his staff who raised the entire issue of the legality of Wilson's actions and the legality of the contract itself.

V. Background of the IPTC (International Products Trading Co.)

It is clear, as Wilson subsequently admitted himself, that his intervention on behalf of Bosch was only motivated by his personal interest. It is also evident that Wilson's activities on behalf of Bosch bore fruit in the revisions in the Bosch order and the Hawkins-Bronson approval of his private deal with Bosch. It may explain the long delay in taking action against Bosch and the lukewarm attitude towards the contemplated action by General Clay.

We can examine, therefore, at this point, the International Products Trading Co. itself and the kind of arrangement it made with Bosch.

The IPTC is stated to have been established as a result of the initiative of two Greek businessmen by the name of the Ghertsos brothers. For over 20 years they operated an agency in Greece and other countries for the distribution and sale of Bosch products. After World War II, the Ghertsos brothers undertook to re-establish their international connections with Bosch. For that purpose they first approached a certain Colonel Colcaire, assistant military attache of the U. S. embassy in Berne, Switzerland. They proposed to Colcaire the re-establishment of an international agency for the distribution and sale of Bosch products throughout the entire world through the formation of a company under Swiss laws. Colcaire avidly accepted the proposal in which he would have a substantial participation without investing any money, since the Ghertsos brothers agreed to supply all the capital.

During these negotiations, General Wilson, at that time vice-president of the Trans-World Airlines, made his appearance. It is not clear whether he already knew the Ghertsos brothers or was introduced to them by Colcaire. In any case, he agreed to participate in the establishment of the proposed company under the same conditions. Subsequently, Colcaire was eased out of the deal and Wilson became an equal partner in the new company, owning one-third of its capital stock with the money put up by the Greek businessmen. Wilson's share was to be repaid by him out of the future earnings of the new firm.

Wilson immediately took over the assignment of setting up the company and entered into negotiations with Bosch on details of the contract for the exclusive distribution and sale of their products. Wilson, as we already have seen, undertook the job of obtaining Military Government approval for the deal and sought to interfere in the pending deconcentration action against Bosch.

As a private individual, Wilson was clearly engaged in activities which violated Military Government regulations. On the other hand, is it not evident that Bronson and Hawkins, in encouraging a private business venture on the part of an American citizen, did not live up to their oath of office?

VI. The Meaning of the Bosch-IPTC Contract

The contract signed by Bosch and the IPTC, and approved by JEIA in July, 1948, conveyed on the IPTC exclusive rights to sell and distribute Bosch products in the international market. When its existence was finally brought out into the open through the accidental discovery by a Decartelization staff member, it was characterized as illegal and in violation of British and American laws on decartelization. In addition, staff members declared the new Swiss company to be a front for Bosch and a method whereby Bosch hoped to evade Military Government laws on the accumulation of foreign assets by a German company and thus pile up foreign assets outside the jurisdiction of the occupational authorities.

The evidence that Bosch and Wilson had engaged in an attempt to outwit Military Government came from a former director of the Bosch firm who had been connected with the operations of Bosch for many years. This individual stated that, in reality, the IPTC was not a private "baby" of Wilson as Bronson continually asserted, but a company established after a conference between Wilson and Bosch officials in Switzerland, held in the summer of 1947. The purpose of this company was to build up Bosch's foreign assets and the capital for the enterprise came through Bosch. Its directors also were declared to be in the employ of the German firm. We have already seen that Bosch was adept in the utilization of various cloaking devices to hide its ownership of domestic or foreign companies. It is a charge which cannot, therefore, be lightly ignored. The IPTC, moreover, employed as its chief agent, a Swiss national who had been the liaison for Bosch during World War II. This person now became the general manager of the IPTC. Among his activities was the re-establishment of Bosch affiliates in Spain and Portugal, two countries with which German firms were expressly forbidden to do business under existing U. S. laws. While these charges that IPTC was a dummy for Bosch were expressly denied by Wilson, it is a fact that top officials of Military Government never endeavored to find out whether they were true or not.

But aside from these aspects of Wilson's activities and the actual ownership of IPTC, lawyers for the Decartelization staff declared the contract itself to be a violation of Law 56. The contract provided for the maintenance of international cartel agreements by requiring the IPTC to protect Bosch from any limitation on the sales of its products in any country, whether that country was within or outside the agreement. The contract further bound IPTC not to deal in any competitive products, as such products would compete with Bosch regardless of price, performance or method of manufacture. IPTC was obligated to compel its sub-contractors to adhere to this principle. The contract was declared to be exclusive geographically since it covered the entire world and all inclusive since it pertained only to Bosch products.

Decartelization staff lawyers declared the contract was made and the IPTC established for the purpose of providing Bosch with an ostensibly independent company for the re-establishment of Bosch's international network of sales and distribution outlets under the control of Bosch, and intended to build up reserves of foreign exchange outside the combined zones of occupation. Under Military Government laws, a German company was prohibited from making and entering into such an agreement. This would be true even if the IPTC were not a front for Bosch. In substance, then, Wilson, with the support of Military Government officials, had sought to evade Military Government regulations, and his actions were therefore clearly in violation of occupation laws.

It is certainly strange, therefore, to realize that neither Bronson nor Hawkins made any effort whatever to inquire into the nature of Wilson's activities nor to demand any information on the individuals associated with the IPTC. The casualness with which they approved an agreement clearly in violation of laws they were pledged to uphold, throws a revealing light on the whole attitude towards decartelization and on the nature of the behind-the-scenes efforts to bury decartelization, and the sabotage of their solemn obligation to carry out the laws of the U. S.

We need only refer to Bronson's behavior after the discovery of the contract and the nature of Wilson's activities. Afraid of the repercussions from his high-handed manipulations in favor of Wilson and Bosch, Bronson made a gesture towards ascertaining the opinion of his legal staff. Without exception, all of the members of the staff consulted declared the contract to be a violation of Law 56 and British ordinance 78.

To add to Bronson's discomfiture, Brigadier Oxborrow, British chief of decartelization, officially denounced the contract as illegal and protested Bronson's unilateral action which Bronson explained as due to difficulties of communication between himself and the British. Subjected to such pressure, Bronson stated that perhaps he had gone "out on a limb" in this matter and had made a mistake.

In any case, Bronson agreed to have the whole case reviewed and requested staff members, in conjunction with the British, to prepare a memorandum outlining why the Bosch-IPTC contract should be nullified for dispatch to JEIA. Such a memorandum was prepared for the signature of Bronson and Oxborrow. Bronson accepted the memorandum but never signed it. Instead he hurried to Berlin for consultation with Hawkins, telling the latter that maybe they had both stuck their necks out too far. Hawkins recommended that the Legal Division of OMGUS be asked for an opinion. After due deliberation, Colonel Raymond, chief of the Legal Division of OMGUS, came forth with the answer. Raymond's advice was a masterpiece of non-commitment. After outlining the relevant sections of Military Government law which would prohibit Bosch from making such a contract with a foreign company, he declared that no facts had been presented by which a conclusive judgment could be made. Without approving or disapproving, the Legal Division, in effect, declared the deal to be a fait accompli.

The final nail was thus driven into the fiasco of the Bosch case. Whether action against Bosch will ever be taken remains to be seen. The final draft of the Bosch order, in any case, was so innocuous that Bosch could afford, with Wilson's approval, to submit to a deconcentrating action which, at best, would only be a pious gesture.

Will the U. S. have to seize Bosch for the third time?

Argentina — Fascism's Refuge

By

Robert J. Alexander

When the United States and Argentina were barely on speaking terms, the State Department talked long and eloquently about how the Argentine military regime was harboring Nazis and Fascists. Not so much has been heard about this point recently. An unsophisticated observer would imagine that the recent $125,000,000 loan from Uncle Sam to Juan Domingo Peron was an indication that the Argentine Govt. was no longer providing a haven for Axis exiles.

This is not so. Although Peron did make a few gestures in the direction of rounding up some Nazis and Fascists, numerous war criminals from all over Europe have been given refuge in Argentina, and many of them have received important posts in the Peron government.

The United States Blue Book of January, 1947 called Ludwig Freude and Richard Staudte the No. 1 and 2 Nazis in Argentina. Freude, a well-known organizer of Nazi activities among Argentine Germans before and during the war, is the father of Rudolph Freude, who was Peron's private secretary for a long time. Under U. S. pressure, the de facto military government at one time arrested the older Freude, but after Peron became President, Freude was "exonerated" completely.

As for Staudte, all charges against him as a Nazi have been dropped by the Peron regime, and important United States businessmen (including a one-time intimate of President Truman) have been doing business with this big-shot Nazi.

Still in Argentina are such leading Nazi figures as Ante Pavelic, once puppet president of Croatia; Hans Hofer, Nazi gauleiter of Tyrol; Admiral Litzman, erstwhile commander of the German Black Sea Fleet; former Fascist party secretaries Carlo Scorza, Ettore Mutti and Francisco Giunta; Spinelli, Mussolini's ex-Minister of Labor; Dino Grandi, Fascist Italy's Ambassador to London and Foreign Minister; Rafael Cassetano, former Italian minister in Budapest; Tamburini, ex-chief of Rome's police; Piero Parini, ex-prefect of Milan; and ex-Senator Prampolini, ex-Deputy Moretti, ex-National Councillors Berte and Rocca, and ex-Minister Poverelli, all old Mussolini henchmen.

Many of these Fascists and Nazis are politically active in Argentina. The most notorious of them, Vittorio Mussolini, the ex-Duce's son, conducted, soon after his arrival in 1947, a memorial ceremony on the anniversary of his father's death. Another important Fascist, Commandante Enzo Grossi, has organized a Federation of Republican Ex-Combatants among former fighters for Mussolini's Social Republic of Italy.

Then there is SS General Otto Skorzeny, who makes his headquarters in Argentina, but travels freely and frequently to Europe on mysterious missions. Other Germans include Professor Willy Tank, a leading Nazi airplane designer, Generals Adolph Galland and Baumbach, Aviation Colonel Hans Ulrich Rudel and Karl von Merck, one-time chief of German espionage in Brazil.

Merck—along with Dr. Hochleuten, erstwhile Nazi judge, and Robert Kessler, one-time Sudeten German journalist in Czechoslovakia and later said to be a Gestapo agent—is publishing a Nazi daily, Freie Presse, in Buenos Aires.

Smaller-fry Nazis from other countries have also found their way to Argentina. Among the Norwegian Quislings who are there are Johan T. Landmark, Reidar Nilsen and Olaf Haavardsholm. Hans Rothia, Nazi leader in Esthonia, is also there.

The Peron regime has uses for the singular talents of many of these one-time European Fascist leaders. General Mario Roata, once commander in chief of the Italian Army, is reported to be employed in the Casa Rosada, the Argentine "White House." Mussolini's Minister of Agriculture, Eduardo Moroni, is an adviser at the Banco Central.

The Federal Police has employed several Gestapo experts, including Dr. H. Theiss, F. Adam, H. Richner and J. Paecht, all of whom are ranked as "advisers" to the Peronista police force. Another Nazi, Hans Koch, is an adviser to the Argentine Institute for Trade. The Ministry of Agriculture, in Decree No. 1019 of May 21, 1949, announced the appointment of Albert Durigen, Helmut Weekamp and Detlef Kloss, ex-Nazis, to posts carrying salaries of 1,400 pesos a month and expense accounts of 1,200 pesos.

The Military Aviation Factory in Cordoba has at least two dozen ex-Nazis employed and nearly a dozen Italian Fascists. These gentlemen earn salaries ranging from one to four thousand pesos a month.

This great influx of Nazis and Fascists into Argentina, most of which has taken place during the administration of Peron as President, is probably one explanation of the growing totalitarianism of the Peron regime. It hardly explains why we lent money to that regime. (Courtesy New Leader, 7 E. 15th St., New York City.)

"All the cold military calculations are dominated by two mastering political questions.

"The first are the Germans. Western Europe can be defended without the Germans but only on the slow schedule outlined in the foregoing. At present, the Germans show no enthusiasm for rearmament. But if the Germans seized the Western invitation to rearm with vigor, if they swiftly organized an initial 150,000 men in brigades as they are asked to do, they could have almost ten divisions in Gen. Eisenhower's army in 1952. German rearmament is, of course, the most perilous defense effort. If the Germans should throw their entire energy into soldiering while the Western powers lag, Gen. Eisenhower's army could in a few years count more German divisions than any other. As such it would be compelled to yield to German national will, and there is no way of satisfying German national will except by war.

"The second are the Russians. The rearming of Western Europe is the greatest test yet made of Russian will and intention. There are only two reasons why the Russians should not pinch off the industrial and technical capacity of the European in these last-chance months. One of these reasons is the atom bomb, the second is the morality of peace. No one knows how the Russians weigh these factors."

Inside Germany

PLAYING THE RUSSIAN GAME

"In Bavaria, erstwhile breeding ground of the Nazi Party, would-be 'Fuehrers' are sprouting anew. . . .

"The two politicians that have the western Allies worried are August Haussleiter, leader of the Deutsche Gemeinschaft, and Alfred Loritz, founder of the Economic Reconstruction Party (WAV). Herr Haussleiter is alleged to be receiving Russian money.

"The Communists pale as a threat when compared to fast-rising nationalist parties who espouse an anti-American line. . . .

"'We can't prove that Herr Haussleiter is getting money from the Russians, but he is certainly following the party line and is widely reported to have Russian contacts,' one serious observer, whose job is to follow political developments here for the high commissioner's office said . . .

"The theme of Herr Haussleiter's party is that no German should make the supreme sacrifice for America in Europe—and there is no sense in opposing Russia since it can force the Americans out of West Germany any time it desires. Other planks in his platform include:

1. A dole for all refugees.
2. Pensions for soldiers.
3. Restoration of dignity to the name of the German soldier.

"Such a platform, as could be expected, has garnered a lot of support among the refugees and ex-soldiers."

GERMAN CULTURE

"Glancing at the many illustrated weekly newspapers and magazines prominently displayed on West German news stands, one might almost think Hitler and his associates were still running the country. . . .

"The bookshop just inside the entrance to the Parliament buildings in Bonn showed, besides the Nazi-nostalgic weeklies, 24 new books on the German General Staff, the Tunisian campaign, Stalingrad, the German collapse, Marshal Erwin Rommel, and other personalities of the Nazi regime.

"Goering's is the favorite picture. Few of the magazines seem able to resist the temptation to dig out old photographs showing him in the flamboyant uniforms of which he was so fond. . . .

"One popular weekly featuring Goering sold 450,000 copies. The publishers said that they could have doubled that figure if they had had the newsprint."

THE INNOCENT WAR CRIMINALS

"Heated appeals for the release of two of Hitler Germany's top war criminals have been received by the three Allied High Commissioners of Germany's Western zones.

"The two prisoners are former Grand Admiral Erich Raeder, head of the Nazi Navy, and onetime Foreign Minister Constantin von Neurath. Both were convicted at the first Nuremberg trial of Hitler's principal aides, and both are serving sentences—Raeder for life and Neurath for 15 years—in the four-power prison of Spandau, in Berlin.

"The appeals represent the newest, boldest point of departure to date in German attacks on the Allied war crimes trials and on their judgments. Formerly, the Germans restricted their demands for clemency to lesser war criminals and, although they have attacked the entire premise of judgment by the victors on the vanquished, they have conceded that the chief assistants of Hitler merited punishment. Now, however, there would appear to be rejection of even that concession.

"It is believed that the present appeals are forerunners of others to seek the release of all seven major war criminals, including Rudolf Hess, in Spandau prison—the 'world's most exclusive jail.'

"Signing the appeal for the release of Raeder is former Admiral Hansen, as chairman of the Association of Former Professional Soldiers. . . .

"Admiral Hansen's letter states, in part, '. . . the judgment which convicted the Grand Admiral to life in prison because of the attack on Norway is an untenable one. He has been convicted—like many Germans—despite his indubitable innocence. . . .

"'If I make this plea for the Grand Admiral, I must also declare that hundreds of other innocent German men are still held in the prisons or in the custody of the Western Allies.

"'The laws of the victors were made in the hour of conquest. They described inevitable measures of war as crime. They led to rigid judgments or will lead to such judgments in the future.

"'How can we achieve true peace and mutual understanding among the Western nations, how can we rebuild the broken wall against the East, if right and true justice are not granted the imprisoned men of Germany?'"

GERMAN COOPERATION

"Western Europe, short of coal and looking to Western Germany to fill her vital defense needs of this raw material, was faced with German unwillingness to fulfill the export quota decided upon by the International Authority for the Ruhr of which the Federal Government is a member. . . .

PAGING MR. HOOVER

"Communist propaganda chief Gerhart Eisler claimed that former U. S. President Hoover has 'confessed that American imperialism is not strong enough' to prevent the unification of Germany on Soviet terms.

"He asserted Hoover had convincingly shown that 'the American camp is much weaker than the camp of peace, democracy and socialism under the leadership of the Soviet Union.'"

PROSPERITY IN GERMANY

". . . While the position of nearly everyone has improved, the profits of German entrepreneurs have gone from good to fabulous. Partly to induce saving and strengthen incentives but partly, one supposes, out of dislike of the progressive income tax, the German Government has reduced taxes in the middle- and upper-income brackets. As a result, German owners and managers have a tax liability on their profits and earnings which is nearly negligible by British or American standards. They enjoy standards of personal consumption which are far beyond the reach of an American or an Englishman of equivalent gross income. . . .

"It is also worth noting that the costs of sustaining well-to-do Germans in their present spacious standard of living are not borne entirely by Germans. ECA officials have guessed that Germany's imports of luxury products for consumption by the well-to-do now amount to as much as $100 million a year. Some part of this expenditure could be used for goods now paid for by American aid. During the period July 1 through October 31, 1950, West Germany was allotted $171.6 million."

NEW FACES IN BONN

"Herr Gustav Adolf Sonnenhol is Press Chief to Vice-Chancellor and Minister for Marshall Aid Franz Blucher. A member of the Nazi party since 1931, Sonnenhol (reports the Allgemeine Zeitung of Dusseldorf) became a captain in the SS as early as 1933. . . .

"Another of the same stripe is Dr. Kutscher, personal adviser to the Minister of Economic Affairs, Dr. Ludwig Erhard, in Bonn today. The principal speaker at a Nazi conference in April, 1944, of Judenreferenten, anti-Semitic specialists attached to German legations abroad, Kutscher set forth his views on anti-Semitism with some strength. 'The Jews are the misfortune of all nations,' he remarked: 'A Jewish victory would bring about the end of all civilization. By this war, the Jew has dug his own grave.' . . .

"Then there is Dr. Ernst Rudolph Huber, since the autumn of 1949 a legal adviser to the Ministry of Economic Affairs at Bonn. A leading Nazi jurist and member of the Nazi 'Academy of German Law,' Huber wrote in his book, 'The Constitutional Law of the Greater German Reich,' that: 'The volkisch (racial) Reich is neither an absolutist regime nor a dictatorship, but a final and normal political order.'

"There is Dr. Carl Diem, Director of the Department for Physical Training in the Ministry of the Interior, who held a similar post under the Nazis. There is Dr. Rieck, now in the Ministry for Marshall Aid Affairs, who joined the Nazi Party in 1933 and the SS in 1934.' . . .

"Here are a few random names picked from a long list of lesser Globkes who were lately appointed to the Federal Ministry of Economic Affairs at Bonn; these men took jobs from others who, though for the most part without any political background, had been dismissed:

"On December 1, 1949, Dr. Ing. Pallsch became Referatsleiter. Dr. Pallsch belonged to the Nazi Party (card No. 1,585,363) from 1933-45 and had been Oberscharfuhrer in the SA (Sturmabteilungen).

"On the same day Dr. Hans Grotjan became Referent. His membership in the Nazi Party was also from 1933-45, though he joined the SA only in 1938, five years after Dr. Pallsch.

"On October 17, 1949, Herr Carl-Herbert Jansen became Sachbearbeiter. Also a Party member from 1933-45 and a member of the SA throughout the same period.

"On December 16, 1949, Herr Hans Koelfen became Hauptabteilungsleiter. He joined the Party only in 1937, but made up for this by serving in the SS (latterly as Unterscharfuhrer) from 1934-45."

(Excerpts from pamphlet "Once Again" by Basil Davidson)

"But the progress is offset somewhat by the appearance of increasing German resistance to western rearmament plans—a resistance obviously calculated to make the most for Germany out of the crisis in which the West now finds itself.

"The western Allies must move cautiously in this area of defense building. There can be little doubt that the greater the need they have of West Germany, the higher will be the German price for meeting it, and the more the West German leaders can exact from the western Allies the stronger the German position for yet more bargaining becomes.

"Even to grant West Germany full equality, military as well as political, will not solve that problem. The question will always remain as to what the Germans will do with that equality. If they have no stake in the survival of the western world, then to arm them may involve questionable risks."

(From an editorial in The Christian Science Monitor)

DENAZIFICATION UNDER MR. McCLOY

"West German authorities plan to ignore a letter from American High Commissioner John J. McCloy charging that German courts whitewashed an ex-Nazi industrialist in Stuttgart.

"The German officials said they had 'full faith' in the German courts that cleared the industrialist, the leather goods manufacturer Karl Kaess, of bribing a denazification court, and therefore would not reopen the affair.

"Defiance of Mr. McCloy's letter was announced in the Wuerttemberg-Baden state legislature at Stuttgart by Minister-President Reinhold Maier. 'This case is closed,' he said.

"Observers here believe Mr. McCloy will let the issue die, because he said in his letter to Mr. Maier and Wuerttemberg-Baden Minister of Justice Josef Beyerle that it is not his intention to 'intervene' in the case."

FROM THE HORSE'S MOUTH

". . . Explains one German: 'Frankly, we have always resented the Americans. Korea has probably increased this resentment.' Even gratitude for American assistance is tinged with bitterness. 'We thank you for Marshall aid,' says a Frankfurt barber, 'but we're not going to spend our lives thanking you for it. Nor will we bind ourselves to you in the future merely because of it.'

"Knowing that the West needs them, the Germans are also resentful of every delay in removing occupation shackles. Comments Hermann Singer, a Heidelberg lawyer: "We'll use every trick we can to get as much as we can—and there may be angry feelings along the way but we feel we are an intelligent people and need independence to make our own policies.' . . ."

(From a dispatch to The Wall Street Journal)

OF THINGS TO COME . . .

"Probably Moscow will rely on the political maneuvering of the East German Communist regime, plus a group of former Nazis and German army officers. These two groups have a common aim—the unification of Germany under Russian control.

"It's the former Nazis who have the job of penetrating the Western zones. There, they can count on the support of many thousands of disgruntled Nazis and a few army generals. Horst Dressel-Anders, former assistant to Goebbels, is one of their key figures. These men have established connections with the secret 'Brotherhood of Former German Army Officers' in West Germany. Their aim is twofold: first, to sabotage plans for raising a West German army; second, to prepare underground support for an eventual invasion from the East.

"Moscow has another link with West Germany—West German industrialists who look to the East for big markets. In 1950 the legal trade between East and West Germany went up 300% over the 1949 figure. But this legal trade is probably small compared with the illegal traffic between the Ruhr and the Soviet zone. This traffic includes steel and machinery of all sorts for the East Germany Five-Year Plan."

(From a report to Business Week)

"It is, of course, the most shameless hypocrisy for the remilitarized East German Communist state to shout threats against the rearming of Western Germany, but the violence of those threats gives some indication of how seriously their Russian master looks at this problem.

"The Russians have long known, if the Western powers have not, that the only way to get the Germans rearmed is to offer them something to fight for. On both sides of the Elbe that means the unification of Germany. In Western Germany, filled with nine million pauperized refugees from former German communities occupied by Poles, Russians, and other eastern European peoples, the only remilitarization program which would make sense to those who might be willing to fight would be a program aimed at recovering those lost territories."

(From Landrum Bolling to the ONA)

"A New German Army can only be brought into being by those forces in the Reich which want a war to reconquer the Eastern territories, and these forces will act only if given assurances of support in advance. On this basis, the Atlantic Pact guarantees the new world war it was supposed to prevent . . .

"The U. S. errs badly in thinking that Western European nations may be handled as if they were corps of mercenaries. America conceives of itself as having two main allies on the Continent, but one of these is treacherous and the other is discontented."

(I. F. Stone in The Daily Compass)

The "First Legion"

by Ernest Leiser

A new, apparently Nazi-type political organization, which avowedly aims to "do away with the old, 19th-century forms of parliamentary democracy," has been formed in Western Germany.

It calls itself the "First Legion" and is reported to have achieved already a nucleus of some 10,000 members. According to investigators, it has been deliberately conducting its organizational activities in a "twilight of mystery."

Three "respectable" members of the Bonn Parliament, all enrolled in government coalition parties—Dr. Kurt Kiesinger of the Christian Democratic Union, Erich Mende of the Free Democratic party, and Dr. Hans Merkatz of the German party—have lent their names as prominent supporters of the new group, but investigation has not yet revealed who the actual leaders are.

In its party propaganda, the First Legion has declared that it is looking for a "new form of democracy" which would eliminate the old-fashioned competition and strife of traditional party politics and end the "disastrous class struggle." In this connection, the new group would "circumscribe the activities of trade unions to their original, proper fields" and drive them out of political life. The Legion platform inveighs against "corruption which endangers public life" and calls for the mobilization of the youth behind this "new politics."

The Frankfurter Rundschau, independent, liberal newspaper here, has commented wryly that "we experienced once before these 'new forms of democracy.' Such non-party organizations always show signs of neo-fascism."

The new group becomes one more minor star in the constellation of radical, right-wing parties which have been struggling—thus far with no conspicuous success—to capitalize on the dissatisfaction of many Germans, and especially the youth, with the present democratic party set-up.

As always, officials on the staff of United States High Commissioner John J. McCloy report that they are keeping the new organization "under scrutiny." However, they indicate that they are not particularly alarmed at its inception and doubt that it will succeed where its predecessors have failed.

Nevertheless, some United States representatives see in the First Legion another confirmation of the facts, contained in a High Commission report, that American efforts to introduce democratic ideas to the Germans in the last five years have been notably unsuccessful, that a vast majority of Germans themselves have seen no effects of those efforts, and that the Germans are therefore vulnerable to the suasions of a demagogue-dictator who may once again offer them the promise of a strong and independent Germany, not bound by the "old forms of parliamentary democracy."

The First Legion may not be such a group, they say. But they add the somber warning that no such organization should be underestimated; one of these days such a body may prove to be what the Allies have always feared, the reincarnation of the Nazi idea dressed up in a 1950 costume which appeals to the still-undemocratized Germans.

Mr. William L. Shirer is well-known to American radio audiences. For years prior to the outbreak of World War II Mr. Shirer's voice was heard from the key capitals in Europe where he reported the momentous events which finally led to the outbreak of war. He was among the few American correspondents abroad who grasped the meaning of the Nazi march to power in Germany. He witnessed at first hand the rising tide of Nazism and the dark shadow it was casting over Europe. Many of the highlights of his fifteen years of experience in Germany and in other dangerous spots in Europe, were recounted in his "Berlin Diary" which became a best-seller throughout the country.

The sequel to "Berlin Diary" was his second book, "End of a Berlin Diary," which tells the story of Mr. Shirer's return to the land of the Herrenvolk after World War II. "End of a Berlin Diary" is a forthright report of dangerous trends and blunders in the early days of the Allied occupation. It provides many clues which explain the tragic events in Germany today, unfolding before our eyes.

Mr. Shirer's competence as a reporter has been firmly established. Indeed, for his work as a reporter and commentator Mr. Shirer was given one of radio's highest honors—the George Foster Peabody Award for "outstanding interpretation of the news in 1946."

Recently Mr. Shirer has proven that he is not only an outstanding reporter, but a skilled novelist, as amply demonstrated in his first novel, "The Traitor."

In this novel Mr. Shirer skillfully dissects the makeup of a potential traitor. The character who is destined to betray his country is one Oliver Knight, an American who is brought up in a typical small town in the Midwest. Knight's early life at home was commonplace, and, like many other young men who were bored with small town gossip and small town affairs, Knight sought the high adventure of Europe. This he was able to achieve by working as a correspondent in Germany, for American newspapers.

Just as at home, Knight's personal life is filled with frustrations. His bride-to-be rejects him for another man. There is constant friction between Knight and the American newspapers who employ him. Suffering from personal bitterness he finds himself drawn into the web of Nazi intrigue, spurred on by an affair with a ruthless and loose woman of German cafe life. Welcomed by Nazi circles and bearing personal grudges against Americans who had spurned him in one way or another. Knight becomes a potential tool of the Nazi Party.

But more than personal experiences explain Knight's degeneration. As Mr. Shirer so clearly points out, Knight is enamored with the America First movement, which, during the late 30's, was echoing Goebbels' propaganda. Therefore it was not merely his personal contacts with the Nazis and their hanger-ons, but his political vulnerability, which finally marked the stamp of traitor on his forehead.

Knight became a mouthpiece for Nazi propaganda. His radio broadcasts to the United States during World War II were designed to demoralize American unity and glorify the Nazi cause.

While Knight is the main character in "The Traitor," Mr. Shirer's characterizations of Hans Oldendorff, the sadistic SS ape-man, his portrayal of Jack Goodman, the American journalist who was not politically vulnerable, and who thoroughly understood the meaning of the Nazi drive for world conquest, show once again Mr. Shirer's ability as a novelist.

"The Traitor" is replete with incidents which fully expose Nazi treachery. In that sense "The Traitor" can be called an historical novel, for it is grounded in historical fact.

Mr. Shirer's presentation of the typical German militarist is made most clear in his description of Freddy von Langsdorff, an officer in the German army. Freddy, Mr. Shirer tells the reader, was no friend of the Nazis: "But today Jack could see Freddy was in a different mood. The contempt was no longer there, in his face or voice. Indeed, there was an exhilaration in his whole being. After all, this was what Freddy and his class had been trained for over the generations, no matter who ruled Germany. For war."

There are many other vivid passages dealing with German militarism and culture. For example, the statement by Whitney Wentworth, Knight's friend and university instructor: "The Germans are different. Their civilization, despite the heights they have reached in music with Bach and Beethoven, in literature with Schiller and Goethe, in philosophy with Kant, not to mention their attainment in science, seems most of the time to be a mere veneer so thin that their barbarism—the pagan barbarism of the German forests— is continually threatening to break through and engulf them."

"The Traitor" deserves a wide circulation, as its message has much meaning, even today. We strongly recommend it to our readers for their enjoyment and edification.

In 1946 an unusual book was published in Germany by an unusual German. The book, "Der SS Staat," was written by Eugen Kogon. It had an electrifying effect, so that while the first edition sold only 35,000 copies, the second edition published in 1947 reached the figure of 100,000. Unfortunately, the English speaking world was deprived of this important work until it was translated and recently published in the United States, under the title: "The Theory and Practice of Hell."

Mr. Kogon should know about "The Theory and Practice of Hell," for he was in hell—the hell of the Nazi concentration camp, Buchenwald, from 1938 to the day of liberation. Kogon was a student of sociology and as early as 1927 was a member of the editorial board of the German publication, The Catholic Weekly. Despite his "aryan" status, his firm opposition to the Nazis finally placed him behind the barbed wire of Buchenwald. Undoubtedly Kogon had the opportunity to go along with the Nazis, but his convictions and principles remained firm within him. The price he paid was a living death for seven years.

"The Theory and Practice of Hell" is not so much an account of his personal experiences but rather a stark report on the internal makeup and organization of a German concentration camp. He shows that the camps were not only utilized to destroy hundreds of thousands of human beings, but also provided a pool of manpower for the modern slave drivers of the Ruhr and other war arsenals in Germany.

What was the aim of Hitler's elite, the SS? In answer to this question Mr. Kogon relates a conversation that he had in the fall of 1937 with an SS officer: "Within 10 years," this SS officer boasted to Kogon, "at the latest, it will be possible for us in this way to dictate the law of Adolf Hitler to Europe, put a halt to the otherwise inevitable decay of the continent, and build up a true community of nations, with Germany as the leading power keeping order."

The new "German order" is described in Kogon's book. It is the concentration camp. Kogon does not only describe in detail the sadistic practices and the tortures inflicted upon concentration camp inmates by the SS, but he also shows the utter corruption which existed among Hitler's elite. They did not hesitate to feather their own nests, although the world was given to believe that Hitler's followers were dedicated solely to the unselfish cause of greater Germany. One example of this corruption is the case of the hereditary Prince of Waldeck—Pyrmont, an SS Lieutenant General. Taking advantage of his high position, the Prince was able to put through an urgent high priority order "for an installation by way of the Institute of Hygiene of the Waffen SS, Division of Typhus and Virus Research (Building 50 at Buchenwald). This was to enable the Prince to store the deer he shot. The military priority certificate listed as the purpose of the installation: 'Production of serum for combat troops!'"

Space does not permit us to go into a fuller description of the life of a concentration camp as portrayed by Mr. Kogon, but the message of "The Theory and Practice of Hell" is quite clear and needs little elaboration. It is a message to all peoples who place a value on human life, to defend that value and to stand firm against those who perpetrate crimes against humanity.

Like "The Traitor" it is our considered judgment that "The Theory and Practice of Hell" deserves to be read and pondered.

("The Theory and Practice of Hell," by Eugen Kogon, Farrar, Straus & Co., New York City, 1950)

"The Western German bourgeoisie is, for the most part, anxious to appease the Communists. Many German firms are placing advertisements in the puny Communist press, hoping that these advertisements will prove to be a kind of gilt-edged security if ever the Communists become masters. No German industrialist wishes to expose himself to possible reprisals by attacking the Communists in word or deed."

(F. A. Voigt in The New Leader)

"Although the average German is against another war and German industrialists would rather do business with Stalin than fight him, former German officers favor rearming Western Germany. The Russians have offered the officers better terms."

(Report of a speech by Saul K. Padover at a meeting of the American Jewish Committee)

"There is the third possibility of a 'protected' Germany that will not be asked to provide troops as long as officers would have to be drawn from circles still strongly attached to Prussian militarism and convinced that Hitler could have triumphed if he only had listened to them.

"A German army now, however tightly integrated into Atlantic Pact forces, could never be a democratic army because its officers would inevitably steer it in the opposite direction. Before we rearm the Germans, we have to strengthen the foundations of democracy in their public life and in their hearts."

(By Ernest S. Pisko in the Christian Science Monitor)

"Western policy on Western German rearmament should be flexible. It is a dubious policy at best, a reversal of the war aims of World War II, a propaganda godsend to the Russians. The Germans don't want it, the French don't want it and everyone is uncomfortable about it."

(From an editorial in the Wall Street Journal)

"The Schuman Plan . . . is one of the great developments in contemporary history . . .

"(But) those of us from America who had some familiarity with it at once said, 'Is this the beginning of the new cartel? Is all Europe to be united by restrictive price covenants? Are price policies to be determined by one man or one group of men?'

"It seemed to me clear that there was a problem for the American steel industry. There are 50 million tons of ingot production and it seemed to me that if the 50 million tons should be wrapped up in one package by a snug European cartel, the ultimate impact of that upon our industry and upon the economy of a free America might be staggering . . .

"A few weeks ago I had the great privilege of meeting Jean Monnet, the man who actually wrote the Schuman Plan . . . I expressed to him my doubts that perhaps he was to be the architect of the most pernicious cartel the world had ever seen, but he swept my doubts away . . .

"The difficulty is that Jean Monnet is surrounded in Europe by people who believe the opposite. European businessmen have the cartel way of life. They are government-control minded by tradition. They are restrictive-covenant minded by habit, and they are writing their impress on the Schuman Plan . . .

"It seems to me that the challenge to America is clear. We must in forthright language demand that the basic charter of the Schuman Plan have written into it the principle of free and honest competition and empower the higher authority to destroy and control monopolistic practices . . ."

(From a speech by Clarence B. Randall, president of the Inland Steel Co.)

Eyebrow-Lifting Department

THEY DON'T LIKE "GENERAL IKE"

From a cable by Karl H. von Wiegand to the New York Journal American:

"Whatever may be said for it militarily, the naming of Gen. Eisenhower as a commander-in-chief of a West European army and defense is against the best interest of wise American political and diplomatic strategy. . . .

"American Gen. Eisenhower was commander-in-chief of the Allied armies in World War II. Now the British should take that heavy responsibility, and Britain has two or three very good generals and strategists.

"If Germany should in some form acceptable to the German people be included in the West European coalition army, it is doubtful whether German troops would fight their best under Gen. Eisenhower.

"They feel, I am told by sources that should know, that he dislikes them, distrusts them, regards them as inferiors, and they recall that he was reported to have said: 'The Germans are a nation of paranoiacs and I see no reason why they should be treated gently.' "

JUSTICE IN REVERSE

From a special dispatch to the New York Times:

"Fourteen German war criminals, nine of whom were serving life sentences, have received grants of clemency from Gen. Thomas T. Handy, commander of the United States forces in Europe.

"On the recommendation of the Army's War Crimes Modification Board, the prisoners will be released from Landsberg prison in Bavaria.

"The nine serving life sentences had been convicted of crimes committed as guards at the Mauthausen concentration camp during the Hitler regime. The others, serving sentences ranging from twelve to twenty years, have been convicted of war crimes in and around the Dachau concentration camp.

"An announcement at Army Headquarters said that the beneficiaries of a clemency in connection with the crimes at the Mauthausen camp had been members of the former German Army and Air Force units assigned to perimeter guard duty at the camp."

THOSE PEACEFUL RUSSIANS

From a Berlin dispatch to the New York Post:

"The official American newspaper, Neue Zeitung, claimed that an East German steel works was manufacturing artillery parts for the Soviet army.

"Neue Zeitung said artillery production began a few weeks ago at the Ver plant in Crossen, Saxony, under strict secrecy. Communist propagandists have claimed for more than a year that West German factories were producing armaments for the Western Powers."

PROGRESS IN GERMAN SCIENCE

From an Associated Press dispatch:

"A group of German scientists, including several Nobel Prize winners, proposed the erection of a small German atomic plant for peaceful purposes and demanded the lifting of all Allied restrictions on German scientific work.

"The Group was founded by Karl Arnold, Christian Democratic head of the British zone state of North Rhine-Westphalia."

JUST A MISUNDERSTANDING

From a Reuters dispatch to the Chicago Daily Tribune:

"Gen. Ernst von Falkenhausen, war time governor of Belgium and northern France, was answering to Jewish aspects of his indictment. He is charged with deporting 25,000 Jews and 250,000 Belgians to Germany, and with the execution of 240 civilian hostages.

"Co-defendant with him is Gen. Egel Reeder, head of the German civilian administration in the area. . . .

"Leaning forward across the bench Marechal asked von Falkenhausen: 'Don't you think these deportations were contrary to human rights?'

"Pale and weary, the general replied: 'I was a soldier. I had to execute the orders I received. I had not the right to discuss an order. All I could do from time to time was to give advice.'

"Reeder, asked whether 'the German population was against the persecution of Jews,' replied: 'No, not as far as the great masses were concerned.' "

JUST A GOOD MOTHER

From a dispatch to the New York Times:

"Ilse Koch denied in court today that she had ever seen any one ill treated in the Buchenwald Concentration Camp, where her husband, Karl, had been commandant before he was executed by the Nazis for murder and corruption.

"She never owned a riding whip, so she could not have hit any inmates with it, she said. All she did, she asserted, was to take care of her children like any good mother should."

ECHO OF DR. SCHACHT

From Theo. White to the ONA:

"For a decade, economists have been analyzing Hitler economics and decided it was free trade in reverse. The trick that Dr. Schacht, Nazi financial wizard, learned was that Germany should get itself in debt to its neighbors. Then, holding billions of blocked marks, they would have to buy German exports at German terms in order to use their marks. In November, 1950, the newborn European Payments Union, chief creation of the Marshall Plan, ran into its first trouble. Germany had suddenly—in three months—gotten into debt with practically everybody. In what the London Economist calls 'rake's progress' it had used up $175,000,000 of credits from the Payments Union in the worst spate of buying and hoarding on the war-scared Continent. To prevent the Germans from too much preclusive buying, the French have slapped on export controls, directly contrary to Marshall Plan objectives."

MEMORIES, LONG AND SHORT

From Theo. White to the ONA:

"Le Figaro, one of the most powerful of Paris dailies, front-pages the story of a current war-crimes trial in Lille. It concerns a Major Kolrep, a German commander infuriated by the last-ditch resistance of French units in the collapse of June 1940. Kolrep decided to take reprisals on the little towns of Courrieres and Oignies. Le Figaro reports:

"At Courrieres, more than 600 houses, 100 farm buildings, the city hall, the church, the schools, the stores, were put to the torch. At Oignies, by the same means, the Germans set fire to 500 houses and shot—as at Courrieres—every man they met.

"A British officer was burned alive bound in an armchair. A young man of 17, sick, was hauled from his bed and forced to dig his own grave. Finally, to end French resistance, the Germans pushed in front of them women and children. One hundred and ten civilians perished on that tragic day."

THAT ELUSIVE BORMANN

From Terence Robertson to the Reynolds News:

"Martin Bormann, Deputy Fuehrer of Hitler's Germany and only topranking Nazi to survive the Allied intelligence net, lives today in a small monastery in southern Spain where monks call him the 'Grey Eminence.'

"From this secluded hide-out, Bormann, master-mind of the vast, international Die Spinne organization, plans the revival of German military might under a 'New Deal' German government.

"These startling disclosures are made by Captain Jacques Kaminski, former Free French officer and British agent, who won the Military Cross for his liaison work with the Maquis and espionage work in the Low Countries during the last war.

"Captain Kaminski posed as an ex-Nazi to join Die Spinne (The Spider) organization two years ago. In June this year he disappeared after receiving a warning that the Nazis were aware of his true identity....

" 'Bormann is without doubt the brain behind Die Spinne,' said Captain Kaminski. 'He is known, rather ironically, as the Grey Eminence because of the robes worn by the monks at his monastery hide-out in Spain. He stays there because it is the one place where he is safe. . . .

" 'Skorzeny moves about Europe at will, especially in the American and French Zones of Germany.'

"This allegation is supported by a photograph of Skorzeny taken in 1947 shaking hands with an American army colonel in the American Zone of Germany."

FOR HEALTH REASONS

From a Frankfort dispatch to the Associated Press:

"Four Germans convicted as war criminals by the Nuremberg tribunal have been released from Landsberg prison under medical parole because of bad health, the United States High Commission announced today.

"They were Dr. Franz Schlegelberger, former Secretary of State in the Nazi Ministry of Justice; Wilhelm Keppler, a former economic adviser to Adolf Hitler and Minister to Czechoslovakia; and two executive officials of the Krupp armament concern, Max Ihn and Eduard Houdremont.

"Schlegelberger was serving a life sentence. The other three were sentenced to terms ranging from nine to ten years."

FARBEN AGAIN

From a Bonn dispatch to the Associated Press:

"West Germany's chemical industry appealed to the Allied High Commission to transfer the job of breaking up the powerful I. G. Farben chemical combine to German hands.

"W. A. Menne, president of West Germany's Chemical Industry Working Group, told a news conference:

" 'We do not oppose the breaking up of the Farben concern . . . But we definitely oppose the way the Allies issued such a law without even consulting German authorities and experts,' Menne declared. . . .

" 'It will be very hard for us to attain our previous position as exporter,' Menne said, 'unless our chemical industry is allowed a sufficient working and research capacity to keep abreast of foreign developments.' "

THE VOICE OF THE REICHSWEHR

From the Belgian newspaper Soir General Dittmar is quoted as saying:

" 'The first step in the rearmament of Germany must be the moral rehabilitation. The sentences of the military courts pronounced against the German military chiefs and above all the sentence imposed upon Marshal von Mannstein for alleged crimes against the partisans must be revised.'

"General Dittmar was the chief radio spokesman for the German Wehrmacht during the war."

Press Items

WILHELM VOCKE, who was a character witness for Hitler's economic expert on armaments, Hjalmar Schacht, at the Nuremberg war crimes trial, is at present German representative on the Board of the Bank for International Settlements, which protected Nazi loot during World War II.

THE ANTI-ALLIED DEMONSTRATIONS on the Island of Helgoland, which was a major submarine base for the Nazis during the war, was supported by many Nationalist and Neo-Nazi elements, including the Pan-German Prince Karl Hubertus zu Loewenstein, who has dared to whitewash Nazi war crimes. (Prince Loewenstein enjoyed the hospitality of the United States during the war and was welcomed as a lecturer by many American universities.)

THE BROTHER OF THE GERMAN GENERAL HANS SPEIDEL, who is taking part in negotiations with Allied officials on German rearmament, was a General in the German Airforce and was sentenced as a war criminal for atrocities committed in the Balkans.

SOVIET SPONSORED EAST GERMANY is launching an ambitious program to strengthen the war potential of the East Zone, particularly in the Steel Industry, while British High Commissioner Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick, on January 16, declined to answer the question as to whether the Allies would approve West German Steel exports to the Eastern Zone.

THE BONN GOVERNMENT has appointed Arno Schieck, former Air-raid Chief for the German General Staff, to draft a new Air-raid law and make plans for its implementation along with its Allied authorities.

IN THE "NATIONAL FRONT," a Soviet sponsored movement in Germany, Generals Vincenz Muller and Korfes are in touch with several high ranking Nazis, including one Beust, former head of the Training department of the Nazi Party.

DR. WILLIAM HASS, head of the West German Government's new foreign office, admits that 14 out of the 31 senior members of his staff were members of the Nazi Party.

OTTO SKORZENY, former Hitler strong-arm man, now in Spain where he sees members of the British Embassy on a social footing, warned that if the 6 German SS officers, convicted of responsibility for the Malmedy massacre of U. S. prisoners, were executed, all former German officers would turn against the Western Allies.

THE CHIEF EDITOR of the German newspaper Der Fortschritt, Erich Schneider, who was formerly of Hermann Goering's National Zeitung in Essen, is reported to be on intimate terms with the Karlshorst Soviet headquarters in Eastern Berlin.

LEADING GERMAN GENERALS, including Blumentritt and Manteufel, have contributed a series of articles in the Irish defense journal, The Defender, which is publishes under the auspices of the Irish army.

MR. JOUETT SHOUSE, whose wife is chairman of the Clay Fund for German Youth Activities, has been elected to the Board of General Aniline & Film Corp. which, according to Government documents, is owned largely by I. G. Chemie, a dummy corporation acting on behalf of I. G. Farben.

THE RECENT TRADE TREATY between Eastern Germany and Communist China contemplates substantial deliveries of electrical equipment, precision instruments, iron and steel products from Western Germany.

HERMAN ABS, one of Hitler's leading financiers and whose Deutsche Bank ruthlessly looted German-occupied Europe, is endeavoring to sabotage the Allied program to smash the power of the German banking monopoly.

Never Again

It is our inflexible purpose to destroy German militarism . . . break up for all time the German General Staff. (Yalta Conference Communique.)

"Never shall Germans rearm!" they said,
"Never recall the High Command,
Never forge weapons for total war.
Never again shall Europe dread
The iron heel and the ruthless hand—
Hitler's Wehrmacht shall march no more.

"Never again while time shall last,
Never again shall that warlike race
Loose invasion or peace dictate;
Never, till many an age is past,
With neighbour nations resume its place—
Never again build a martial State."

Never again? Things are altered now:
They stand in fear of another foe.
Arm West Germans to meet the threat!
Who remembers the victors' vow,
Sworn and witnessed five years ago?
The dead are dead. Let the living forget!

Never shall Germans lead again?
But only Germans can Germans lead—
The Generals' honour must be restored;
Loyal servants of wicked men,
They shared no part of an evil creed—
The Wehrmacht offers a stainless sword.

Never again! And the stricken heard.
But what's more light than a statesman's oath?
On a million graves the grass is green,
And the dead rise not for a broken word.
Even though Germans themselves are loth,
Germans must man the war machine.

Germany rises, a sovereign Power,
Called to action and armed to fight,
From medalled Marshal to conscript clod.
"Never again shall Europe cower—
Under the menace of German might,
Never again, so help us, God!"

Sagittarius.

Opinions from France

"Clearly, all the efforts of the Kremlin are designed to secure a rapprochement with Germany, which it needs if it is to remain undisturbed in the West (while trying to expand in Asia). This inevitable rapprochement, dictated by geographic, demographic and economic conditions and by historical experience, does not imply any friendship between the Russian and German peoples. . . .

"All the Allied Governments agree that it would be folly to ask Germany to put forward the maximum effort of which she is capable, for they remember quite well what a powerful German army can lead to. According to the American proposal at the New York conference, the German contribution would be limited to ten divisions—a fraction of the total forces that must be organized in face of Russia's 150 divisions, but a dangerous embryo whose development nothing could stop if it dedicated itself to the cause of the German nation. More, this intended rampart would even serve as a filter if the attacking army were that of East Germany, for the West Germans consider their East German compatriots as victims rather than enemies. . . ."

(General Adolphe Aumeran, Republican Liberty Party of France.)

"Is the deepseated French opposition to German rearmament really justified?

"In the attempt to answer this question it will be helpful to review the figures of what the last three German invasions have cost France. . . .

"In the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, in which France was invaded and defeated, the nation lost 58,000 men killed. Paris underwent a 10-month siege. At the end of the war, France lost two of its richest provinces, Alsace and Lorraine, and had to pay to the new German Empire an indemnity of a billion gold dollars.

"In the first World War, France whose northeast quarter bore the brunt of the German invasion, lost 1,250,000 men killed. This represented for a nation of 40,000,000 a terrible toll. At the end of the war, France's claim to reparations was evaluated at 50 billion gold dollars.

"In World War II, France lost 560,000 men killed. As to material damage, the French reparations claims, as published by the semi-official Le Monde on Aug. 4, 1945, are illuminating indeed. Direct damages to France are estimated at 13.8 billion gold dollars.

This figure includes: 40.7 billion francs damage to French agriculture; 41.8 billion to industry and commerce; 96.5 billion to transportation and communications; 17.4 billion to war materiel; 249.6 billion to real estate and personal property, of which almost two-thirds is in private dwellings; 30.6 billion in preliminary and accessory reconstruction charges, and 49.6 billion to special regions such as the east boundary departments and Tunisia."

(From D'Artagnan III [Paris] to The Daily Compass.)

". . . The unilateral rearmament of Germany is difficult to realize, certainly dangerous and would probably be ineffectual. . . . Germany is unanimous in refusing to be the mercenary of Europe which, after having prevented her from winning her war against Russia, now means to make her endure, in the name of liberty and democracy, a war in which she is not interested. . . . Those who (in Germany) accept or desire, without saying it publicly, the idea of rearmament, the military for example, propose unacceptable conditions. . . .

"Let us now consider the political dangers. . . . Is it in order to defend Europe that Germany desires to regain immediately a major portion of her military potential? In reality, she aspires to regain her lost unity, and that is the great danger of unilateral German rearmament. . . . Will we have to repay Germany's cooperation by promising to help her reconquer her lost territories? . . . Finally, is it not a constant factor in German policy to seek in the East a counterbalance to the strength of the West? So it was in 1813, 1814, 1815, 1863, 1873, 1881, 1887, 1918 with Brest-Litovsk, 1922 and 1926 with Rapallo, 1939 with the German-Soviet agreement.

"Are we so sure that by favoring German rearmament without integrating it in a real European organization, we will not supply Germany with the means of changing sides effectively?"

"In 1951, more than half a million young Germans who once belonged to the old Hitler Youth and were indoctrinated in early adolescence in the cult of racism, of a fierce will to power and of the most primitive kind of militarism, will reach voting age. . . . Are you not afraid that to give arms back to them in any form whatsoever will awaken in the entire German nation an aggressive spirit, dangerous for the peace of the world?"

(Charles Serre of the French Democratic Union of Independents.)

"Substantial elements of West Germany's press are conducting a vigorous campaign to treat the emergency measures of destruction taken by the United Nations forces in their retreat in Korea as substantially identical to the atrocities against civilian populations committed by the Nazis during World War II. The campaign is part of a broader effort, intensified since the West indicated its intention to seek German military manpower for European defenses, to repudiate the war guilt for which German leadership was tried and convicted by the war crimes tribunals at Nuremberg."

(From Ernest Leiser to the ONA)

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir:

"In common with most Americans, I have sat on the side lines during these past five years, believing that the complicated problems relating to America's foreign relations should be in the hands of professional diplomats.

"The bungling of our occupation in Germany, however, convinces me that the plain common sense of the average American and his strong attachment to moral principle would be far more effective guides in the conduct of foreign relations than the sleight of hand maneuvers of our leading officials in Germany.

"There is a great to-do today about appeasing Red China and, of course, the overwhelming majority of the American people would resent any actions that would compromise the basic principles of the United Nations and American security. Yet appeasement is the very 'policy' which is pursued by our leading officials in Germany with the apparent blessings of Washington.

"Mr. McCloy has gone so far as to assure the Germans that the Allies will make every effort to prove our good faith to the former enemy. In other words, the German tactic of maneuvering us into a position where we ask for forgiveness is making alarming headway, thanks to our own 'experts' in Germany.

"In effect, this so-called policy of accommodating the Germans is strengthening their plan to rewrite the history of the past ten years. The Allies become the culprits and are accused of besmirching the 'honor' of the German militarists. General Eisenhower is viciously attacked as a leader of the 'hard peace' school. The Allies are charged with strengthening the hands of communism in Europe, because they defeated the Nazi aggressors.

"This rewrite job of recent history has its willing hands in the United States. One only needs to refer to 'The High Cost of Vengeance' written by the ex-communist, Freda Utley, and to William Henry Chamberlain's new book, 'America's Second Crusade.' The Utley book is a clumsy defense of German war criminals and a vicious attack against the principles of the Nuremberg Charter. Chamberlain's book is a bit more refined. As far as Mr. Chamberlain is concerned, the 'arch villain' who dragged us into war against those peaceful Germans, was President Roosevelt.

"In addition to these 'masterpieces,' the country is being flooded with books glorifying Nazi generals. Only recently, the 'romantic' memoirs of Otto Skorzeny were published in this country. Skorzeny was Hitler's strong-arm gangster.

"This new outburst of the German 'version' of the history of the past ten years is directly connected with the tendency, to say the least, of our policy makers in Germany to bend over backwards. If some of our policy makers are aghast at the resurgence of neo-Nazi and militaristic trends in Germany, they have only themselves to blame. It all goes back to the old saying, that 'he who sows, shall reap the whirlwind'—and the American people will have to pay a heavy price for the 'mistakes' of our policy makers.

"The only consolation in this fantastic picture is the existence of a magazine such as 'PREVENT WORLD WAR III,' which insists on keeping the record straight."

New York

Dear Sir:

". . . In the first place we wish to thank you cordially for having placed our name on your regular mailing list. A complete set of your MONTHLY BULLETIN from its inception to No. 34 of March/April, 1950 has now arrived here and will be displayed in our periodicals reading room in a prominent place so as to attract a maximum number of readers.

"We should be glad if we could help you in your efforts so important to mankind. . . .

"Looking forward to the regular receipt of your MONTHLY BULLETIN and with repeated thanks I am."

DR. C. WORMANN, Director
Jewish National Library
Jerusalem, Israel

Dear Sir:

"Thanks for fine letter. Enclosed is a contribution to help such a worthy cause, wish it could be more.

"My interest in your literature has continued ever since I received the first copy, some two years ago. You are doing a remarkable piece of work."

HELEN R. MERRY
No. Edgecomb, Maine

Dear Sir:

"Ever since the time of my association with the International Military Tribunal sitting in judgment over the major German War criminals at Nurnberg, Germany, I am called upon to address lodges, civic groups, etc., regarding the 'Problem of Germany.'

"Now I am being asked with increasing frequency to speak on the problem of Renazification and Remilitarization of Germany. While I am trying to keep more or less abreast of the news, I find that I am running out of facts and documented authentic material. The research facilities in Chicago are inadequate and it happens that I find myself embarrassed for want of answers to specific questions put to me by the audience.

"Will you please help me by sending me some of your material? Some years ago, I used to receive your excellent bulletin but I have not seen it in a long time. I would also appreciate receiving occasionally some of your other literature on the subject of Germany to help me get the point across that Germany is still (or better: again) threatening the peace of the world and that the policy of rearming the Germans may be disastrous for the United States."

PETER LESS
Chicago, Illinois

Dear Sir:

"Thank you for your letter and the parcel containing the copies and other publications of the Society for the Prevention of World War III.

"How necessary your work is, becomes more evident day by day. One has only to look at the news from Germany. Here is a small collection of items within my own limited reach: . . .

"(a) The German language newspaper 'Aufbau,' in New York, reprints the text of two anti-semitic poems of the Sturmer type, distributed with exposed swastikas to the population in Bonn.

"(b) 'The United Nations World' published an article entitled 'New Watch on the Rhine.' This most informative report (after yours) should be reprinted widely. It reveals once again Germany's 'double soul.' The world, in spite of all, seems not to understand that Germany is the tinderbox of Europe. Democracy is offered to a people, who, since 1848, openly despised and spit on democracy.

"(c) The magazine 'Reporter' of New York, devoted one of its issues to Germany. It was entitled 'The New Germany.' Nevertheless, the picture on the cover of the magazine still symbolizes the old Germany. Who will understand that the German soldier is waiting for his time?

"As a reader, I have sent a contribution to the editor of the 'Reporter.' But there is something wrong in principle with all these publications. They explain Germany and make her popular again, while they should condemn her for her crimes and tear off the mask from her sanctimonious face, as it is done in PREVENT WORLD WAR III."

JOSEPH J. BASCHINSKI
St. Louis, Missouri

Dear Sir:

"Your publication is of very great interest to our library, and I am taking this opportunity of asking you whether you would be kind enough to present it to us as from January this year.

"As we are most anxious to have as complete a collection as possible of your publication, might I further ask you whether it would be possible to send numbers 1-27, and 29-34 in order to complete our existing collection."

NORMAN S. FIELD
Chief Assistant Librarian
United Nations Library
Geneva, Switzerland

Dear Sir:

"Quite by chance a copy of your excellent publication came to my hands yesterday. I was enthralled. It is the only thing I've read that makes 100% common sense. . . .

"May I ask if your publication has been brought to the attention of the 'League of Women Voters'; an organization certainly trying to keep its members informed."

JULIE M. GERECKE
Webster Groves, Missouri

Dear Sir:

"It was kind of you to send me the advance copy of the magazine with the chapter from my book. The issue as a whole struck me as exceptionally interesting, and I read with special attention the article on Back-Door Trading Between Ruhr Industrialists and the Iron Curtain Countries—a fine and useful piece of reporting."

Where Are We Going?

Six years ago Nazi Germany's bid for world conquest was thrown back and defeated. The U. S. A. with its mighty power and prestige possessed the unprecedented opportunity to rid the world of the scourge of German militarism. Indeed, the U. S. A. was the only nation that had the means to enforce that policy.

Did we seize that leadership? Have we blazed new paths to peace for a war-torn world? Have we discarded the discredited formulae which the Allies applied to Germany after World War I? Today the answers are crystal clear. We are forfeiting the unique position we held at the end of the war. The fruits of our victory have been squandered and once again we are turning our backs on the lessons of history.

We pledged that Germany's vast economic power would be reduced to genuine peacetime requirements. We pledged that Germany would never again be permitted to use her economic might to over-lord her neighbors.

> TODAY Germany's industrial production rate is rapidly approaching the level of the armament boom under Hitler, and is outstripping the economic development of her former victims.

We pledged that the Allies would not subsidize the resurgence of Germany's war potential.

> SINCE VE Day the American taxpayers have poured billions into Germany, which are partly subsidizing the tremendous flow of strategic materials from Western Germany to the Soviet Bloc.

We pledged that the Nazi and criminal elements, which had led the conspiracy against the peace would be uprooted.

> TODAY millions of Nazis have regained their former positions. Leading Hitler supporters are back in their key posts in government and in industry. Notorious war criminals like Alfred Krupp, Flick, Von Weiszaecker and the Farben gang are freed.

We pledged that the German trusts and cartels which provided the sinews of Hitler's war-making power would be broken up.

> TODAY the German cartels are flourishing because Military Government advisers sabotaged the decartelization program.

We pledged that German militarism would be stamped out.

> TODAY Hitler's generals are rapidly regaining their former estate and are trying to dictate American policy.

We pledged that an end would be put to German chauvinism and Pan-Germanism.

> TODAY these forces are in the open again. The minions of these pernicious influences have declared their intention to attain that place in the sun which Hitler, the Kaiser, and Bismarck had long promised the Herrenvolk.

We pledged the carying out of a positive program of democratization and education, particularly among the German youth.

> TODAY large sections of the German people, as recent election returns show, are evincing the same conditioning of mind which made them pliable tools of aggression.

The deteriorating situation in Germany is not the product of uncontrollable inanimate forces. It is the result of man-made blunders and vested interests which have neither forgotten nor learned from the lessons of the past.

The original policies of the United States were sound and realistic because they truly corresponded to the needs of our security and the interests of our most reliable friends in Europe. That is why the Society for the Prevention of World War III gave unstinting support to that program.

The Society supported measures to exact stern punishment against those Germans who were responsible for the devastations which had engulfed mankind. We were not guided by motives of vindictiveness. We believed and we still do that this was necessary so as to bring home to the German youth the supreme lesson that "crime does not pay."

The carrying out of this objective was a basic prerequisite in preparing German youth for education in democracy, thereby creating a generation which could be trusted.

The Society supported measures to break up the huge landed estates. The creation of family-sized farms in the democratic tradition of the West would have reduced the present burden of American taxpayers. But the German officials defied these measures and the occupation authorities allowed them "to wither on the vine."

The Society supported a program to develop the potential of German light industries and to de-emphasize German heavy industries. We foresaw that the re-emergence of German industrial might would create one of two dangers to the free world. Either German heavy industry would once again upset normal commercial relations through cartel and undercutting practices which were its hallmarks—or that German heavy industry would turn its face to its Eastern hinterland and thereby build up the war potential of the Iron Curtain countries.

But influential men in Military Government with close ties to German cartelists took the "easy way out," and launched a plan to revive Germany's heavy industrial power. The result: hundreds of millions of dollars worth of strategic materials are being shipped to the East with the connivance of the German authorities.

As we build up Germany's power more and more, what will be the end result? As all political parties in Germany are clamoring for the return of their lost Eastern provinces, will Germany make a deal with the Soviets at the expense of Poland and Czechoslovakia, or will Germany drag the Western world into a new catastrophe for her own ends—the recreation of a new German Reich?

THERE ARE HONEST GERMANS . . .

"To the Editor of The Saturday Evening Post
"Philadelphia, Pa.

"Dear Sir:

"Having read the article 'The Germans are Allies now' I can only warn you not to fool yourselves! We Germans have not the slightest intention to fight for anything else but our own country and our own national interests. We will fight for Danzig and Koenigsberg, for Stettin and Breslau, but we will not fight for Brussels and Paris, not for Churchill's London and for Morgenthau's Washington!

"You may fool yourselves in thinking that a few job-hungry generals and the Quislings in Bonn represent the will of the German people; you will soon be awakened of this dream, if you dare to make a plebiscite in Western Germany. As long as we are still refused our liberty and national unity, we patriotic Germans have only one answer: 'Ohne uns!' (Without us!)

"Sincerely yours,

"Dr. Otto Strasser"

TO PRESERVE THE PEACE

In the No. 36 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III the late Secretary of the Society, Mr. C. Monteith Gilpin, discussed the proposals of Secretary of State Acheson to set up a Peace Observation Committee responsible to the General Assembly of the United Nations and whose basic mission is to, "observe and report on the situation in any area where there exists international tension, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security." Mr. Gilpin characterized this proposal as one which, "gives clear expression to the determination of the United States to truly make the United Nations the all-embracing force for peace and security which it was originally intended to be."

The Peace Observation Commission is a sort of permanent trouble shooting agency covering the entire globe and acting as a preventive rather than as a curative operation. It consists of 14 nations, including the most powerful, namely the United States, Britain, France, China and the Soviet Union. As one experienced observer pointed out, the rest of the member nations were chosen with the greatest care: "Three prominent neutrals were chosen—India, Israel, and Sweden—and rigid geographical representation was observed in the other selections."

The Commission, which may have the biggest assignment in U. N. history, is one of the best rounded the Assembly has ever set up. It is important to reiterate the mission of this Commission, namely that it endeavors to prevent rather than cure tensions which could explode. Undoubtedly, nations guilty of creating great dangers to world security and peace will look with disfavor on this Commission, for in effect, the P. O. C. becomes the eyes and ears of all of the members of the United Nations, which means the overwhelming majority of the peoples of the world. It is not hamstrung by artificial impediments, and if its powers are wisely used, it can do a great deal to alert the world before damage is done.

Mr. Gilpin was not only speaking for himself when he praised the initiative of the Secretary of State in this matter, but he also reflected the general sentiments of the Society. Ever since the German situation became explosive, the Society has endeavored to find ways and means whereby disaster could be averted in that part of the world. With this in mind we communicated with the Secretary General of the United Nations in August, 1950, recommending that the Security Council empower his office, "to form a fact-finding committee to investigate the four zones of Germany on the specific problem of industrial rearmament and remilitarization." We suggested that the report of this committee should then be submitted to the Security Council for further action. This proposal was prompted by the reports that in the Eastern and Western zones of Germany tension was mounting as numerous reports in the press indicated that there are movements afoot to revive Germany's war arsenal and her military power.

We declared that it was our considered view that, "a race to rearm the Germans by the occupying powers will inevitably increase tensions to a point where the smallest incident could set off a new conflagration." (See No. 36 PREVENT WORLD WAR III, p. 17.)

It may or may not be true that the specifics of our proposal are feasible, but certainly the principle deserves the attention of our security-minded peoples. This is where the Peace Observation Commission, established on the initiative of the United States, comes in. It is our firm conviction that one of the great public services this Commission could render to humanity would be in Germany. We think the time is long overdue for an objective report regarding the question of remilitarization in Germany. In view of the impact of such a development on world security and peace, can anyone deny that the P. O. C. would be discharging its proper responsibilities by an on-the-spot investigation of industrial rearmament and remilitarization in the four zones of Germany?

Whatever the substance of P. O. C. observations, we have no doubt that the result will be a salutary one. The peoples of the world are entitled to know the truth, and their opinions, in the long run, are a far more trenchant corrective than is generally realized. The P. O. C., therefore, should receive the warmest support in all of its endeavors, and as it starts its work, we hope that one of the first items of business will be Germany.

NEW GENERATION—SAME METHODS

On March 6, 1924 Chancellor Gustav Stresemann told the German Reichstag, "International debt does not merely mean debt slavery; it also means an interest on the part of the creditor nation in the well-being of the debtor nation." This cynical view was to govern Germany's tactics in dealing with the Allies who were in the process of doling out huge sums to the Germans, ostensibly for German rehabilitation. Herr Stresemann, however, seized this opportunity to exploit politically the interests of the creditor nations to Germany's advantage and to the disadvantage of the peaceable development of Europe. But the advantage of maintaining the slogan, "debt slavery," to whip up the fires of German nationalism, was never surrendered by Stresemann and company. It worked.

Stresemann's line was pursued with great success by Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's rearmament wizard. And now it seems that the present lot of German politicians, including Chancellor Adenauer, a close friend of the late Stresemann, are attempting a repeat performance. Ever since the end of the war the Germans were given to understand that their rehabilitation came first and that such a policy would have the full support of the Allied powers, come what may. This provided the Germans with ample room to conduct economic policies at home that were not so much designed to effect a rapid recovery and thereby reduce Allied expenditures to a minimum, but on the contrary, to place the greater burden of "rehabilitation" on the Allies. It is true that the Allies have made some claims on the Germans for services rendered. But they become insignificant when compared to what the former enemy has managed to extract from the occupying powers to date. (See p. 8 Editorial, "They Dine—and Whine!") Thus the West German government is not at all adverse to going into debt, since it feels that the Allies will do everything to guarantee ultimate repayment.

A hint of things to come in this connection may be seen in the current situation with respect to the operations of the European Payments Union Plan. This Plan is an extension of the Marshall Plan concept of encouraging inter-European trade, establishing salutary export-import relations among the countries of Western Europe, and relaxing trade controls with the ultimate purpose of developing free convertibility of European currencies.

The United States has strongly supported the objectives of this Plan because it was our government's hope that the ultimate result would be to reduce the economic dependence of Western Europe on the United States. Indeed, the United States went so far as to agree to put up 600 million dollars as a reserve fund for the stimulation of the functioning of the Plan. Western Germany was invited to participate on the alleged grounds that European recovery cannot be achieved without that much talked-about German "efficiency," etc. Each country pledged to do everything in its power to make the Plan work.

Unfortunately it appears that Allied economic experts have not read up on the Stresemann tactics during the days of the Weimar Republic. Western Germany entered the Plan with a great deal of publicity and fanfare, and the German politicos announced to the world that they would "carry the ball" toward reviving European trade and reducing the burdens of the American taxpayers. The deeds of the Germans, however, are in sharp contrast to their professions of cooperation.

It wasn't long before the Germans began to utilize the E. P. U. Plan for their own selfish purposes. In the first place, Western Germany began to import a flood of luxury goods which had little to do with "rehabilitation." Secondly, German importers conducted an orgy of speculation on raw materials hoping to corner huge amounts in the face of the rearmament programs of Western Europe. Germany's debts began to snowball, thanks to these reckless activities. Thus, by November of last year, after only five months of the E. P. U.'s existence, Western Germany ran through its initial credit quota of 320 million dollars. The question then arose as to whether Germany should pay for future purchases in gold, which she is supposed to be without. It soon became clear that German trade during the past few years had been built up for the most part on I. O. U.'s based on the handouts of the occupying powers, in spite of the fact that the West German Economics Minister, Ludwig Erhard, had at one time challenged other countries of Western Europe to join the Germans in making their currencies convertible. The fact of the matter is that this crisis proved conclusively that Erhard was bluffing and was merely trying to ingratiate himself with Allied officials, particularly with the Americans.

But this debt of 320 million dollars did not phase the Germans, because they were confident that their creditors would take additional measures to keep that debt liquid. Hence the other members of the E. P. U. agreed to provide the Germans with another 120 million dollars which was supposed to last until July 1951. This new credit was given on condition that the Germans would place their financial transactions in good order. However, by the end of February of this year the Germans had ignored these conditions and the credits were wholly committed. Thus, as the Manchester Guardian, March 15, 1951 states: "But Germany now had a wealth of raw material stocks in a time of growing shortage, while her creditors had only money on account. Her purchases in this period will take months to liquidate. To be blunt, she has been financing her industrial expansion out of her neighbors' pockets. Her neighbors, who have been caught in this trap before—in the 20's, and by Dr. Schacht—are not pleased."

But this is only part of the story. It is no longer a secret that German exporters are salting away abroad a substantial part of the proceeds of the sales which ordinarily should have been utilized to pay back the approximately 500 million dollar debt. One authority claims that about 120 million dollars has been illegally exported. It wouldn't surprise us if this was a gross understatement. In discussing this matter, the London Economist (March 17, 1951) observes that other member nations are "in effect financing a substantial export of capital from Germany." The New York Times (February 26, 1951), reporting on French opinion, says: "In France there is some tendency to wonder whether the Bonn Government has been going into debt on purpose, as experience in the pre-war period might indicate."

Supposedly the Germans are now trying to correct the situation, but the measures she has taken have merely intensified the commercial crisis in Western Europe. The Dutch have been particularly hit by the tactics of the Germans who have abruptly cut off agricultural imports from the Netherlands. The worsening of the economic situation in the Netherlands may result in deferring "still further the few remaining hopes of completing the Benelux Union." (London Economist, March 17.) In other words, the economic master minds of Germany are not helping to strengthen Western economic solidarity, but on the contrary, they are ruthlessly undermining the economic strength of their neighbors.

In all this it is appropriate to ask, where are the occupying powers—are they going to be fooled all the time—why don't they do something about it? That the most that can be expected from our officials in Germany is merely an expression of a pious wish that the Germans will behave, can be seen from the latest report of Mr. John J. McCloy on this subject. He speaks vaguely about a program to alleviate the economic crisis brought on by the Germans and concludes his remarks with the following gem: "It must be hoped that the Federal Government will pursue the necessary course in a serious and responsible manner."

But why should the Germans take any action in a serious and responsible manner to correct this dangerous and malignant economic development? Time and again they have sabotaged Allied policies, and the end result has always been capitulation on the part of our policy makers.

DOES CO-DETERMINATION MEAN FREE ENTERPRISE?

In his informative study, "German Industry on the Warpath, 1860-1939," Bernhard Menne discusses the growth of German monopolies and cartels on the eve of World War I. In this connection he observes: "While the Imperial Secretary of State, Count Posadowsky, taking the cue from his imperial master, praised the process of industrial concentration as 'a step in the progress of civilization' the central organ of the German Social Democratic Party, the Berlin Vorwaerts (in 1905), described the same process as 'a great step in the direction of socialism.' During the discussion on the cartel question the attacks and arguments of those hostile to the cartels filled volumes of debate, but there were no socialist arguments among them."

As far as the German Social Democrats were concerned, the amalgamation of smaller industrial undertakings into big concerns was regarded as an important move toward socialism. This attitude on the part of the German Social Democrats at the turn of the century was a great influence on the thinking of the German trade union leadership, which in many cases sought to defend Germany's growing industrial concentration and her imperialist bid for world hegemony. During the first world war a leading German trade unionist, W. Jansson wrote: "Our trade union successes are based on the fact that German industry has become an industry working for the world market. The ruin of German industry would be the ruin of the German working class." The Nazis took advantage of this traditional approach to the development of the German economy by an important section of the German trade union leadership, and under the pretext of defending German independence against alleged enemies, they accelerated the development of industrial concentration and cartelization.

This brief summary of the way important elements in the German trade union leadership have dealt with the problem of German monopolies and cartels may help to explain the great desire of the German trade unions today to exercise co-determination in the heavy industries of the Ruhr. The Germans have a name for that policy. It is called "Mitbestimmung." According to this view the trade unions believe it is their duty to participate in the determination of policy in private industry. Therefore, they have insisted on representation on the highest levels in the various industries and made it a paramount issue, even going so far as to threaten a general strike to achieve this objective.

It is undoubtedly true that a vigorous trade union movement in Germany, democratically organized and run, can, together with other elements of society, be of value in fashioning a democratic structure both industrially and politically. Whether this policy of co-determination will accomplish this goal is open to question in view of the past attitude of the German trade union leadership, which has displayed servility to the German monopolies and cartels and has indeed defended them.

The fear lest this policy of co-determination may turn out to be a weapon of the German cartels has been expressed by American trade unionists. Certainly American trade unions at home do not condone monopolies and cartels. The question arises, what about their counterparts in Western Germany? According to the United States News and World Report, February 23, 1951, Allied officials are suspicious, "that secret deals were made under which German labor will back the industrialists against American 'trust busters' in the final Ruhr re-organization." The report went on to say that these same officials expressed the fear that, "the plan means the end of real unions in Germany, that the unions will collapse eventually when their strength is most needed as a democratic force." The U. S. News and World Report broached the subject with a leading American trade unionist in Germany. According to the magazine, the American trade unionist contended: "that experience in the German steel industry shows that labor leaders who have become salaried corporation directors tend to take the management viewpoint . . . they develop a vested interest in their management jobs and in the earnings of their companies. . . ."

On the basis of the past record of German trade union leadership, this danger cannot be overlooked, especially when it is noted that among those who have been most insistent on obtaining the German "price" for joining the Schuman Plan, have been the German trade unions. The Manchester Guardian of March 15, 1951 disclosed that Herr August Schmidt, leader of the Ruhr miners, wrote Chancellor Adenauer insisting that before the Germans agree to the Schuman Plan, four conditions must be met. These conditions are as follows:

1. A decisive portion of Ruhr coal should be kept under control of the German steel industry.
2. The German coal cartel must be preserved.
3. The Germans are to pay but a minimum in the common pool to be established to equalize economic conditions throughout Western Europe when the Schuman Plan comes into operation.
4. The High Authority to be established under the Schuman Plan must be deprived of "excessive powers."

These demands, as a matter of fact, are precisely the same conditions put forth by the Ruhr barons as their price for accepting the Schuman Plan. This striking identification of interests lends further weight to the caution expressed by Allied officials with regard to the policy of co-determination.

> (By Drew Pearson in "The Washington Merry-Go-Round.")

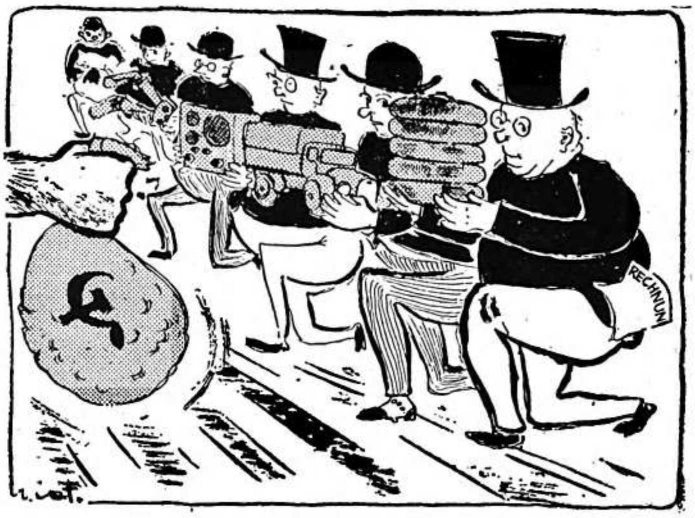
It should be pointed out that the Ruhr industrialists and the Adenauer Government have not been opposed to this so-called co-determination program, in principle. They are interested, however, in seeing to it that co-determination develops in a way which would guarantee the support of the German trade unions, regardless of the policies the Ruhr industrialists pursue in the future. The London Economist, in discussing this question, says outright that: "the union leaders support cartels and vertical trusts in the Ruhr" (February 10, 1951). The letter written by Herr Schmidt seems to support this observation.

It goes without saying that a free enterprise system is at complete variance with the policy of co-determination in industry. In this sense co-determination runs counter to the stated objectives of our government to democratize the German economy. We have always been skeptical about the Germans' pretensions to free enterprise. Many of our leading officials in Germany have tried to convey the impression that the Germans were expiating their past sins and for all intents and purposes were determined to become genuine proponents of free enterprise.

We will not attempt to predict the outcome of this so-called experiment in partnership with the Ruhr barons. Nevertheless, we would remind our readers of the report appearing as early as April 11, 1950 in The New York Times, where comment on the principle of co-determination concluded with these words: "Observers note that both trade unions and employers apparently agreed in principle on the creation of organizations resembling those sanctioned in Mussolini's corporate state." If co-determination works out that way, the hopes of democracy in Germany will become black indeed.

Money Doesn't Smell for West German Industrialists



Welt der Arbeit, Köln

PAN-GERMANISM VIA ARGENTINA

The announcement of Argentina's President, Juan Peron, that his scientists have unravelled the secrets of atomic energy is a momentous event which should be pondered by all security minded Americans.

To understand the significance of the Peron boast, it is important to grasp the fact that South America and in particular, Argentina, is a decisive link in the German plan for resurgence. This is the view of many astute students of Pan-Germanism, including Professor Frederick Wilhelm Foerster. It is also the judgment of the famous Blue Book prepared by our State Department in February, 1946.

The State Department's Blue Book revealed the close ties ideologically, militarily, politically, and economically, between Nazi Germany and Argentina. The information contained therein was supported by incontrovertible documentation. "In Argentina," the Blue Book states, "the Germans have constructed a complete duplicate of the economic structure for war which they had in Germany. . . .

"The industries essential to warfare in which experimentation in the weapons of future wars may take place and in which prototypes may be developed, exist in Argentina and are controlled by Germans."

This charge is amply supported by lists of prominent Nazis who dominate the major industries of Argentina. The Blue Book declares that the Germans not only dominate, but control the electrical machinery and equipment industries in that country. They also dominate and control the metallurgical industries, and the influence of I. G. Farben in the chemical industry is beyond question.

Writing in the Washington Post of March 10, 1946, the newspaper correspondent, Sigrid Arne, reports that Nazi domination of Argentine heavy industry "would about tie together the major industries needed to turn out atomic bombs."

During the war the United States was quite aware of the Nazi influence in Argentina and the threat it presented to the Allied cause. The Government had conducted detailed studies of the tactics of the Germans in preserving their scientific knowhow after World War I. These were valuable studies, because they were intended to serve as guides for the future policies of the United States in coping with whatever plans the Germans had to evade the consequences of their aggressions.

Among the government agencies which pioneered in these investigations, was the Enemy Branch of the United States Foreign Economic Administration. In its definitive report on a program for German economic and industrial disarmament, the FEA revealed how the Germans fooled the Allies after World War I. When the Germans, according to the FEA, realized that their scientific research would be supervised by the Allies, they immediately developed cunning methods by which they could thwart Allied supervision. "Appeals abroad for help led to a flow of funds, food packages, laboratory equipment, and scientific publications. I. G. Farben and other German firms contributed equipment and materials . . . although these humanitarian activities ostensibly were for the purpose of preserving learning in a disrupted society, it may be noted that the organizers were five prominent scientists known in Germany for their Pan-German views or their long collaboration with the General Staff. Military research in the post-war period (after World War I) appears to have been started with the support of these funds." In other words, the Allies, by grabbing the German bait on the alleged grounds of humanitarianism, started the ball rolling for German science which was dedicated to their destruction.

Another ruse employed by the Pan-German scientists consisted in establishing research centers in other countries. In this connection the FEA report disclosed that: "In the post-war period the active planning to rebuild the German war machine extended outside Germany. Some plants and many German scientists moved to foreign countries beyond the jurisdiction of the Allied Military Control Commission to experiment with and produce military products." In this way German scientists and technicians were able to experiment in agreement with the Russians on Russian territory while similar activities went on in Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland and Spain. In Spain, for example, the Germans constructed submarines which had been prohibited under the terms of the treaty of peace. Thus, through subterfuge at home and in covert agreement with other countries, German science and technology dedicated to destruction were able to keep abreast of new military techniques and indeed to surpass the Allied powers.

The FEA, cognizant of these past activities, and alert to the dangers of the atomic bomb in the post-war period, pointed out the imperativeness of controlling German scientific research, particularly with regard to atomic energy. It recommended that the Allies and the United Nations "control the disposition and use of German industrial properties and the activities of German technical personnel beyond the borders of the Reich." It urged that the United States insist that all neutrals and former neutrals cooperate with the Allies toward accomplishing this objective. "Surely in the sharp glare of the atomic bomb," the FEA stated, "the spectre of German technicians free to utilize their material resources and industrial facilities as they will outside Germany, cannot be viewed without the greatest concern by the Allies, the United Nations or the neutrals themselves."

We have quoted extensively from the FEA report so as to anticipate excuses by our leading Government officials that they were not properly advised regarding the problem of controlling German scientific research, particularly in the atomic field. Yet the bitter fact is that practically nothing has been done during the past five years to halt the influx of German Nazi scientists to Argentina and to its Axis partner in Europe, Franco-Spain. It is a matter of public record that Spain and Argentina have served as safe havens for Nazi war criminals, including Hitler's leading scientists, ever since the end of the war. Indeed, while our Government has remained silent since the publication of the Blue Book, some courageous Argentinians have dared to expose the Nazi nest in Argentina.

We recall, for example, the courageous voice of Silvano Santander who delivered a devastating exposé in the Argentine Congress in July, 1949 on the infiltration of key Nazis. He named 40 odd individuals including former High Luftwaffe officers, technicians and scientists who were employed by the Argentine Government in one capacity or another. In the January-February, 1950 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III further revelations concerning "The Case of the Nazi Big-wigs in Argentina" were made public by Juan Acevedo. Acevedo mentions the report of Seften Delmer of the London News Chronicle, who estimated that there were at least 300 German technicians "working on atomic energy research and new designs for jet propelled aircraft"—and still the U. S. A. remained silent.

The man whom President Peron introduced to the press as the supervisor of atomic research in Argentina was one Dr. Ronald Richter who allegedly came to Argentina from Austria. Dr. Richter denied that he was a Nazi but he did admit, according to the New York Times of March 26, 1951, that, "He had worked on nuclear fission in Germany during the war." Whether Herr Richter carried a Nazi party card is basically irrelevant, because we now know that many Nazis were deliberately kept out of the party for strategic reasons—among which was their possible usefulness in the post-war period. Whether Herr Richter falls in this category is not yet known, but we do know that the shadow of Nazi scientists looms large over scientific research in Argentina.

To understand, however, the future implications of the Peron announcement, whether it be true or plain bluff, it is necessary to comprehend the fact that Pan-Germanism is a driving force which has never given up its dream of world domination. It operates on all levels as can be seen in the case of Argentina. The Germans believe in the future of Argentina. They regard it as the nucleus for the advancement of their Pan-German dream of outflanking the United States from the south. The penetration of German capital in that strategic area reflects the over-all strategy.

In 1918, for example, German capital invested in Argentina was estimated to be around 250 million dollars. In 1926 it reached the figure of 375 million dollars, or an increase of 50% in eight years. Immediately after the end of the war one authority estimated that big business in Germany and in its satellite countries invested and deposited some 1 billion 500 million dollars in Argentina as a safe haven. This huge stake in the destiny of Argentina cannot help but shape the policies of the Peron regime. From the point of view of ideology there is overwhelming evidence, official and unofficial, demonstrating that the leading members of the Argentine military and economic setup have absorbed Nazi indoctrination. Peron himself is a great admirer of the German General Staff and sympathized with the Nazis until he saw the handwriting on the wall. Then, for public consumption, he switched sides.

Argentina, as the future bulwark of Pan-Germanism, was noted by a leading Nazi writer, Dr. Thierfelder. In his booklet published in 1939 he wrote: "It is Germany's decisive advantage over Britain and North America that she can rely on a strong German element in those countries." Dr. Thierfelder looked upon South America and Argentina as "a bulwark of German kultur."

Another German publicist wrote in 1938 about the Nazis in South America, "if they changed their nationality that change had no effect upon their inner attitude toward the German people." The London Times of 1938 reported that in Argentina the children of German parentage were taught in private schools to say, "Heil Hitler," but had never heard of San Martin, the liberator of the Argentine and of half of South America. All of these facts go to explain the meaning of the persecution, for example, of independent newspapers in Argentina. The celebrated case of La Prensa represents the climax of such persecution—for La Prensa dared to remain independent and time and again exposed Nazi influence.

In contrast, the organ of Pan-Germanism in Argentina, Der Weg, continues to pour out its spleen against the Allied cause. The magazine openly defends Pan-Germanism, the German officers' cliques, certain features of Nazism, etc.—all under the cover of a pseudo European ideal. It has been authoritatively reported that Der Weg is the principal propaganda sheet of powerful Nazi circles in Germany. It speaks for Nazi militarists who have been sheltered by the Peron regime, including Goering's leading flier, Hans Ulrich Rudel, and General Adolf Galland, who headed Goering's Fighter Command. (More detailed information on Der Weg will be found in the No. 35 issue, 1950 of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, under the title: "Der Weg—Mouthpiece of Pan-Germanism.")

All these facts should be carefully considered by our diplomats in their efforts to strengthen hemispheric solidarity in the face of totalitarian dangers. They must ponder the fact that in the heart of the Freedom Camp is a new bulwark of Nazism which has or may in the near future split the atom.

The Society for the Prevention of World War III was long aware of the Pan-German plans to rebuild their war potential abroad. In a New York Post ad dated February 5, 1946 the Society warned: "At this very moment the secret of producing the atom bomb is being feverishly sought in Spain, Argentina, Portugal, Turkey, Sweden and Switzerland—where banks and industries are infested with Germans. German scientists, German technicians and German industrialists are at work everywhere to rebuild Germany's war potential."

We do not take pride in this prophetic statement. We would have much more preferred that we were wrong. Yet, like so many other times when we have been right, our warning has gone unheeded.

THEY DINE—AND WHINE!

The potentialities of television were recently demonstrated during the Kefauver Committee investigations concerning connections between racketeering and political machines. Now millions of Americans have received an education which we are certain they will not forget soon.

It is too bad, indeed, that TV has not yet been employed to spotlight the many debates which go on in the German Bonn Parliament. Yet, if the American people were given the opportunity to witness at first hand the antics of the German politicians, they would raise questions which would embarrass a policy that places the Germans on a special pedestal.

The Bonn Parliament has become the scene of bitter tirades against the occupying powers, which were accused of placing "undue burdens" on the German people. The unanimity among all the politicians regardless of party affiliation was most striking. True, the Bonn Parliamentarians have their own special axes to grind, but they invariably join hands when it comes to sniping at the Allies.

The question of Allied occupation costs, like all other issues, has been skillfully propagandized throughout Western Germany. Far be it from the politicians in Bonn to denounce this propaganda. On the contrary, they surreptitiously encourage the press and private vested interests to whoop it up, and when the fires are well fanned they step out in their august robes and carry on the scurrilous attacks in more refined and dignified language. This is the kind of leadership they give to the German people.

Chancellor Adenauer leads the pack, but he is by no means the only one to express indignation over these American "burdens." His Minister of Finance, Dr. Schaeffer, made a long speech in Parliament in which he took issue with the occupation costs. He questioned whether the funds made available to the occupying powers were utilized in a way which would justify what he termed the heavy burden imposed on the population. And while he expressed some appreciation for what the Allies had done for the Germans, he nevertheless insisted that his people had the right to impugn the motives of the occupying powers with regard to the occupation costs.

His speech was a signal for additional attacks by other politicians. Frau Meyer-Saule deplored the Allied "spirit of conquest." Carlo Schmid joined the attack by demanding: "a reduction of obsolete Allied administrative machinery" and "full respect for international law" (sic) ! The politicians further criticized the Allies for suspending the magazine, Stern, which deliberately distorted occupation costs and helped to spur nationalistic sentiment.

All of this makes fine propaganda for the Germans, who are apparently convinced in their own hearts that they are a martyred people. One would think that U. S. officials in Germany would counter this propaganda forcefully and effectively. We hear much criticism of the fact that certain countries which receive Marshall aid have been derelict in their responsibility by failing to let their peoples know where the money came from. Somehow or other these criticisms are never directed against the Germans. Yet, in the face of the latest attacks, it became impossible for the office of the American High Commissioner to remain silent. And so, for the first time our officials set down on record what the Allies have done for the Germans since the end of the war.

These facts appeared in the January issue of Information Bulletin. Unfortunately, while the information contained in this article is most enlightening, its general tone is apologetic. It is in effect a plea to the Germans to understand how hard the Allies are trying to please them! Thus the game continues. The Germans attack and the Allies take a defensive position.

Nevertheless, the statistics cited in this article are in themselves sufficient grounds for putting the Germans on the defensive. More than that, they could impel American taxpayers to ask why the United States alone will have handed over to the Germans the sum of three billion 969 million dollars from May 8, 1945 to May 31, 1951. This figure, of course, does not take into account the huge sums expended by the British and French for German "rehabilitation." Included in the American aid are surplus materials turned over to the Germans amounting to 236 million dollars, but the article did not say that the original cost of these materials was over one billion dollars! On that basis the total sum poured into Germany by American taxpayers is close to five billion dollars. But this is not the whole picture, as the article itself points out. For example, large sums of foreign exchange credit are accumulated in West Germany when U. S. occupation personnel shop and travel. It is estimated that their total spending amounts to at least 50 million dollars per year. In addition to this expenditure, many millions are spent by the United States State Department on the so-called exchange program, whereby German scientists, farmers, students, etc., "gain subjective knowledge and understanding by valuable practical experience which can sufficiently be applied in reconstructing the homeland."

There is another sum which the article does not mention but which nevertheless is part of American generosity. We refer to the counterpart funds which the Germans place at the disposal of the United States on the basis of their dollar receipts from the Marshall Plan. According to an ECA press release dated January 16, 1951, the total Marshall Plan counterpart funds "authorized for release is now more than 4 billion DM." Roughly, this figure amounts to one billion dollars. And the reader should bear in mind that these counterpart funds are ever increasing. They are invested in the German economy, by the United States and represent a permanent increase in German capital formation.

The article does not rest on this point. It observes that, "Germany does not by any means forfeit the use of the money she pays out for the occupation. Every penny of these costs remains inside Germany and is channeled right back into the German economy." In support of this contention, the article examines the occupation costs for the fiscal year ending March, 1951, which amounted to 1 billion 300 million dollars. Of this amount 415 million dollars "is going into the pockets of some 471,000 Germans, who are employed by the three Allied powers." Other large sums are invested in capital expenditures in the three zones, i.e., the rehabilitation and building up of the German economy, such as utilities, railroads, buildings, etc. Consequently, 854 million dollars of the total occupation costs are channeled right back into the German economy for productive purposes. In addition, 60 million dollars of the occupation costs have been used to pay for restitution claims and the support of D. P.'s—as though this weren't a German responsibility in the first place! In short, about 900 million dollars out of the occupation costs of the fiscal year 1951 have been plowed back into the German economy.

Since the end of the war the United States alone has expended 4 billion 140 million dollars to support its occupation, exclusive of the German contributions. Thus, it is painfully obvious that the amount of money which has gone into the support of the Germans directly and indirectly is astronomical. The overwhelming portion of these billions accrue to the benefit of the Germans. In this connection, it is well worth noting that the Germans do not have a defense budget as such. They pay an infinitesimal amount to the Allies who are protecting them against possible threats from the East. As a result, the German contribution to their Allied defenders is estimated to be about 25% of the federal and state budgets. But the Allies themselves do not get off that easy. In the United States at least 42% of the federal budget is devoted to defense purposes. In the U. K. it is 25% and in France, 35%.

But the story is by no means complete, because, believe it or not, "Germany ended the war with practically no debt." In contrast, the United States debt was increased to 220 billion dollars during the war years, and this excludes the interest charges which run to more than 5 billion dollars annually. The article concludes with the half apologetic statement none the less true: "With these considerations in mind it can be legitimately pointed out that the most recent U. S. appropriation for defense is 42 billion dollars. This represents 14% of the gross national product of the U. S. Under Hitler's Reich 19% of Germany's gross national product went into rearmament. Germany today pays for the total of Allied occupation costs, about 5.5%. There you have it, Mr. and Mrs. Taxpayer!

These dry statistics show how far we have travelled away from our stated objectives. We have not only poured billions into the camp of the former enemy, ostensibly for rehabilitation purposes, but we have in effect provided them with an enormous fund of investments free of charge, but at the expense of the American taxpayer. The enormous sums funnelled into Germany by the United States since the end of the war become all the more fantastic when one ponders over the fact that of the billions of dollars in gifts, grants and loans to Marshall Plan countries, the Germans received roughly one quarter of the total amount.

Yet the Germans complain and whine as though they were being crucified. The German Bundestag has now gone so far as to pass an inter-party motion rejecting German "responsibility" for that part of the federal budget dealing with occupation costs. But no one should be fooled by these antics, for behind these whinings the Germans are laughing up their sleeves, and this can be seen from three facts:

Fact 1—Hundreds of millions of dollars worth of war potential equipment have gone from West Germany into the Soviet Bloc.

Fact 2—German reparation payments have been a drop in the bucket compared to their original obligations.

Fact 3—The Germans are not only accepting our aid for "rehabilitation" but they are sending part of it back to the United States at enormous profits. This was recently revealed by a Congressional committee under the chairmanship of Congressman Bonner of North Carolina. What the Germans have done is to resell back to the United States, surplus equipment which they had originally received for purposes of rehabilitation.

This, in brief, is how the Germans express their gratitude to American taxpayers.

"PRUSSIANS ARE PRUSSIANS"

"Former German army officers are trying to give currency to a dangerously smooth misconception. Eberhard Boehm, a former German General Staff colonel who was brought to this country under the auspices of the Moral Rearmament movement, characterized himself at a Washington meeting as a 'soldier who was punished for being a soldier by the same people who now ask me to go back into uniform.'

"The fact of the matter, of course, is that neither Boehm nor any other German officer was punished by the United States for being a soldier. They were punished for committing crimes against humanity under a cloak of military obedience and duty.

"The more German officers indicate by talk of this kind that they still have no conception of what the last world war nor re-education was all about, the more reason there will be for adopting as many of the French-sponsored safeguards against renascent German militarism as are possible in building a West European army. Some Prussians, at least, are still Prussians, and the people of the world should be grateful to Frenchmen for remembering it."

A Bold Policy for Peace

by

DEWEY ANDERSON

(Executive Director, Public Affairs Institute)

In doing the two-fold job of preparing adequate defense and negotiating for peaceful solutions of world problems, America needs the guidance of a great declaration of purpose. It must state our aims clearly and challengingly enough to appeal to all people everywhere.

Fundamentally, our purpose should be that of bringing about a necessary and peaceful change in the conditions and hopes of men throughout the world. This is in the great liberating tradition of our country. The peaceful revolution in the American process of liberation is too little known or felt in the world today. It should be given a chance to reshape the character of men and events everywhere as it is doing at home. It is more needed today than ever before.

In order that the constructive and dynamic forces of our American achievement may become effective in the affairs of nations, we call for a new American policy in the world today. We call for a truer and more adequate expression of our deep longing for peace and our belief in freedom and human dignity. We must make it clear that our necessarily great rearmament does not blind us to the need for economic and political aid to others.

Specifically, such a new U. S. policy should make several things clear to the people of the world, and thereby bolster their faith in our sincerity and strengthen their will for cooperation and the peaceful adjustment of differences. These things are:

1. That the American people realize that peace and freedom cannot forever survive want and hunger. We know that men must eat before they can even dream of freedom, and that without food and freedom there can be no good hope for peace among men. We therefore accept the obligation of devoting a considerable part of our daily earnings to help other people start on their march toward freedom from want. We ask only that this contribution be used effectively for those who need it most.

2. That the American people seek no control of other governments or destinies. We repudiate any efforts to use the contribution of the American people for such purposes. In evidence of our good faith we offer all this portion of our daily bread, in whatever form it is given, for distribution through the United Nations, and not through agencies of our own government. In further evidence we offer to share this contribution with people whose governments are antagonistic to our own government.

3. That the American people can always be counted on to help our fellow men achieve political independence. This tradition is evident in our recent efforts on behalf of the people of India, the Philippines and Indonesia. We are aware, too, that independence is not enough; we are interested in helping other people obtain, in addition to political independence, those conditions of security and economic improvement upon which both their national independence and their individual freedom must rest.

4. That the American people believe in the United Nations and want it to be strengthened. We believe the U. N. holds the world's best hope for resisting aggression, obtaining peace, and bringing economic strength and progress to all. So that this world organization may truly represent all the people of the world we ask for a return to the Jeffersonian principle of recognition by the United States of all governments in actual power. We find that the new American doctrine of non-recognition has unnecessarily increased world tension, has aroused improper expectations that American recognition automatically brings financial aid, and has created an incorrect and unfortunate impression that our aim is world control. We believe that all governments which pledge themselves to the U. N. Charter should be admitted to membership in that organization.

5. That our fellow men are dealing at all times with an American people and an American government dedicated to peace. We want them to know this particularly in these times, when great military burdens are being laid upon them and upon us, and when irresponsible individuals in and out of our government are discussing preventive war.

We want them to know that the American people are in control of their own government. That they desire to be friends with all people, including those in Russia and China. That they do not want another world war. That present military preparations were called forth only by the Communist aggression in Korea. That those preparations are, and always will be, solely for resistance to aggression. That the moment our fears of further aggression are ended, if they can ever be, the American people will insist on world disarmament in all types of weapons.

We call for the revision in present policy which will accomplish these five objectives. We deeply believe that there can be unity among the peoples of the world, especially if America is allowed to contribute the human values and dynamic forces it has developed.

BLACKMAILING RUHR BARONS

"France and the United States are being blackmailed blue in the face by Hitler's former friends and money-bags, the steel barons of the Ruhr.

"These hard-eyed gentlemen have been growing noticeably cockier since last September when the Pentagon railroaded the American State Department into asking for the creation of ten German divisions.

". . . They have already compelled the Adenauer government to renege an informal agreement with the High Commission regarding the separation of the German coal and steel industries." (William H. Stoneman, "St. Louis Post-Dispatch.")

The Germans Call the Tune

It may well be that April 1951 will turn out to be a fateful month for Europe and, indeed, the world. Its significance was expressed in the word of the New York Times correspondent reporting from Bonn, Germany: "Formally wiping out virtually all prohibitions and restrictions on peacetime production in West Germany, the Western occupying powers opened the way for the restoration of Germany as the most powerful industrial nation in Western Europe."

As the Times correspondent further observed, this far-reaching decision involves the scrapping of all limitations on German steel production which can, under favorable conditions, easily outstrip the production of steel by her neighbors. But this is not all. The Germans have been granted the right to resurrect key war potential industries ranging from the production of synthetic gasoline and rubber to the manufacture of a variety of electronic tubes. In truth, there is now very little left in the way of limiting Germany's war-making power.

This radical departure from original Allied policy occurs at a moment when the Schuman Plan has received preliminary approval by the participating states and when the decartelization Law No. 27 has undergone significant revisions. One is obliged to raise the question whether the scuttling of the regulations governing the prohibited industries are organically related to the adoption of the Schuman Plan and the further undermining of the decartelization program. We have not seen any official answer to this question. However, the Wall Street Journal of April 2, in discussing the breakdown of controls over the prohibited industries, notes: "The Allies have found it necessary to use their remaining controls to bargain with Germany in the process of getting her cooperation in political developments."

Philosophers are constantly debating the question of means versus ends. In our judgment dishonest means can never produce praiseworthy ends. If it is alleged that Germany's cooperation hinges on the Allies' willingness to give her the opportunity to overlord her neighbors again, then there can be no genuine and real cooperation between the Germans and the West in the long run.

As regards the Schuman Plan, the Society has made it clear in previous articles that it does not oppose it in principle. In the face of Communist expansion, Western solidarity is an urgent matter. The strengthening and genuine integration of the economies of Western European countries can operate as an important factor in warding off the Communist challenge. Presumably many sincere supporters of the Schuman Plan believe that it serves this very purpose. On the other hand, should—as we fear—the Schuman Plan turn out to be an instrument enabling the Germans to once again become the dominant force in Western Europe, its primary objective would be defeated.

The possibility that the Plan could be perverted for ulterior ends was expressed by Mr. Walter Lippman as early as May 11, 1950, when he admitted that it "meant the revival of the political and economic influence of Germany in Europe. In any such equal industrial regime as the French are offering, the Germans are bound by their technological and administrative gifts and discipline to play a leading part." The principle of integration is sound providing that the industrial potentials of the countries involved are relatively equal to each other. However, a plan which would enable Germany to become the preponderant factor is not integration, but suicide.

Tied in with the Schuman Plan and therefore with the decision to emasculate the regulations governing the prohibited industries, is the decartelization program. It will be recalled that before the Communist attack in Korea, the Germans were enthusiastic about the Schuman Plan, for they saw in it an opportunity to evade the consequences of their military defeat and to regain their former status in Europe. Jacques Chastenet, in discussing the Schuman Plan (Harvard Business Review, March, 1951) says: "As a matter of fact there was perhaps a German idea at the very base of the scheme." The Germans regarded the Plan as a method by which they could gather up juicy political and economic plums at wholesale prices.

Prior to Korea there was a distinct danger that there would be an overproduction in steel. Therefore the cartel interests in Germany looked upon the Schuman Plan as the modern version of the old steel cartel which would be able to regulate production, prices, and markets. After Korea, when the defenses of the West had to be rebuilt, the Germans turned the other way, for they saw in the new crisis an opportunity to get everything for nothing. Thus, to the German tacticians it wasn't a question of joining the Schuman Plan or opposing it, but rather how much they could get out of the Allies. It wasn't long before they began to put the screws on the Schuman Plan. German industrialists began to insist on more "equitable" terms for participation in the Plan. First of all they wanted to take the teeth out of the decartelization law. They insisted on maintaining the vertical trusts in the steel industry which controlled a decisive portion of Ruhr coal. In that way the Ruhr barons would be able to control the industries of other countries as had been done prior to World War II. The Germans opposed the liquidation of the German coal sales organizations which are nothing less than "up-to-date" cartels. They wanted to put a brake on the liquidation of the six major steel and iron combines which had dominated the lives of the European peoples and had provided the sinews for Hitler's war-making power.

But they were not alone in these outrageous demands. Indeed, they were encouraged to take this position by influential circles in the United States who were more interested in developing an entente between the German cartelists and themselves than in the development of a healthy Western European economy which would preclude Germany's resurgence.

This is where the former Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson came in. In the last week of February he arrived in Frankfurt with a number of other American corporation lawyers announcing that they were representing German interests in opposing the decartelization law. In Mr. Patterson's opinion, the Allied trust-busting program was "arbitrary" and damaging to the rights of the German stockholders. Mr. Patterson and his lawyer colleagues admitted that they represented some of the most powerful German cartels, including I. G. Farben. It turned out that Mr. Patterson had misjudged the mood and temper of the American people. It appears that he was convinced that the American people and their Allies were now so conditioned to appeasing the Germans that they could get away with their brazen activities. We have no doubt that if Mr. Patterson had been able to anticipate the storm of disapproval over his actions, he would have made doubly sure that a minimum of publicity would have been attached to his activities.

Mr. McCloy was embarrassed, as were other American officials. They let it be known through the press that Mr. Patterson's mission would not check their determination to carry on with the decartelization program as originally conceived. The proof, however, is in the pudding, as the saying goes. Two weeks after the Patterson visit, the New York Herald Tribune, March 12, reporting on American efforts to obtain German approval for the Schuman Plan, said: "But in return the Allied trust-busting campaign against German steel and coal combines would have to be modified seriously." The Tribune reported that compromise proposals had been made which were "American sponsored." The record shows that this is not the case, for actually the so-called compromise worked out was based on a letter written by Chancellor Adenauer March 14, 1951. The so-called compromise involved the following:

(1) The six major iron and steel concerns and the six smaller firms dominating the heavy industries of the Ruhr would be broken down into 24 companies rather than the 29 which were originally scheduled.

(2) The German steel industry with some exceptions would be allowed to control a maximum of 75% of its present coal needs. This is in sharp contrast to the original decartelization policy which seems to have contemplated the divorcing of the ownership of the steel industry from the Ruhr coal mines.

(3) The German sales cartel would remain intact for at least three years before future action could be taken against it, if any.

Dr. Otto Lenz, one of Adenauer's negotiators on the German demands, bluntly stated that unless this was accepted, the Boon Government "probably would feel it was pointless to go ahead with the Schuman Plan because the decartelization sections of the program would never be implemented in Germany." For once the Germans dispensed with the silk glove and showed the mailed fist. The German ultimatum was further confirmed in a report to the Herald Tribune, March 30, which disclosed that so-called modification of the decartelization law "was an essential pre-condition of West Germany's acceptance of the Schuman Plan."

The Manchester Guardian of March 22 predicted that the Germans would go further and demand the dissolution of the International Ruhr Authority as a condition for accepting the Schuman Plan. In the past we have criticized the International Ruhr Authority because of its many weaknesss. Yet, it did attempt to allocate equitably Ruhr coal to all the nations of Western Europe. The Germans resented this. Only recently they refused to meet coal allocations fixed by the Ruhr Authority for the second quarter of 1951! If the Germans rejected the decisions of the Ruhr Coal Authority, which by no means were severe as far as German interests were concerned, who can expect the Germans to be more yielding with the establishment of the High Authority as envisaged by the Schuman Plan?

If the German cartelists are permitted to continue control over a decisive portion of Ruhr coal, the organization of the Schuman Plan will inevitably turn out to be a weapon of German hegemony. This is true not only because Ruhr coal is the basic element for the industries of Western Europe, but also by the fact that labor costs in Germany are far cheaper than in the other countries which have consented to join the Plan. One authority estimates that a ton of coal produced in Belgium costs 700 francs, of which labor costs 430 francs. In France the costs are 500 and 295 respectively, but in Germany the cost of producing a ton of coal amounts to only 425 francs, while labor is but 192. This must ultimately result in the shutting down of many Belgian and French coal mines, which will therefore strengthen the position of those in control of the Ruhr coal. Could anybody ask for a better club with which the Communists can beat the democratic cause?

Finally, in connection with this three way victory for the Germans, is the return of that merchant of death, Alfred von Krupp, to power. Here again decartelization Law No. 27 comes in for a licking. It is admitted that Krupp cannot automatically regain his properties under Law 27, which prohibits individuals from ownership or control "who have been found or may have been found to have furthered the designs of the Nazi Party." But the United Press of March 23 reported: "Allied authorities said today a study may be done on whether a change is advisable in the laws (No. 27) barring Alfred Krupp and other Germans from returning to positions of industrial ownership and control."

The concessions already granted and those contemplated in the near future are supposed to convince the Germans that the Schuman Plan defends their basic interests, and that therefore they should give it their wholehearted support. However, there are strong undercurrents on the German political scene, which promise to embarrass Allied strategy no little. Prominent politicians like Kurt Schumacher are boasting that the Schuman Plan will never be ratified by the Bonn Parliament. If this should actually come to pass, then the Germans will have indeed succeeded in duping the Allies once more.

There you have it in its totality. As we mentioned above, unpraiseworthy means invariably produce unpraiseworthy ends. This may all go down as a calculated risk on the part of those who believe that by such means we can "win over" the Germans. But it is doubtful whether the peoples who have been ravaged time and again by the Germans can afford or will be able and willing to withstand the consequences of such a risk.

The Protected and Their Protectors

When U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy granted a series of commutations to 78 of Germany's leading war criminals, and freed that merchant of death, Alfred von Krupp, and his cohorts, decent people the world over expressed their horror. Mr. McCloy not only freed Krupp but also nullified the original order of an American court which confiscated the Krupp properties. Simultaneously with McCloy's decision, General Thomas Handy informed this same horrified world that the six Malmedy war criminals who had been found guilty of murdering Belgian citizens and American G. I.'s taken prisoners during the Battle of the Bulge, would be spared.

The political motives guiding the decisions of Mr. McCloy and General Handy are not beyond question by any means. Indeed, the New York Times of February 2, 1951 observed: "There is politics—or, if one likes, diplomacy—in these decisions." But aside from the basic reasons which impelled Mr. McCloy and General Handy to treat these leading war criminals with such shocking leniency, there are a number of questions which remain to be answered with regard to the so-called review of these war criminal cases. The U. S. Information Bulletin of February contains the text of the McCloy and Handy decisions together with the recommendations of the Clemency Review Board which had been appointed by Mr. McCloy. A careful study of these documents strengthens our own conviction that these decisions, as set forth in our open letter to John J. McCloy on February 9, 1951, "undermine the foundations of international law as implemented by the Nuremberg verdicts and run counter to the expressed determination of the President of the United States to punish international lawlessness."

MR. McCLOY'S RATIONALIZATIONS

We find that in each of the 12 cases wherein Mr. McCloy explains his reasons for the commutations and the freeing of many of these criminals, his justifications are not only vague but dubious in the extreme. For example, in the case of Erhard Milch, Herr Goering's key official in the German Luftwaffe, who had originally been convicted for advocating and exploiting slave labor, Mr. McCloy excuses Milch's heinous crimes in the following words: "His petition for clemency urges instability of temperament due to nervous strain, aggravated by a head injury. The Board has recommended a reduction of sentence from life to 15 years. This is a sharp reduction considering the high responsibility of this man, but I am prepared to follow it." This kind of explanation would strike one as comical, were its implications not so tragic.

Yet Mr. McCloy's reasoning for the leniency in the Milch case is more or less typical of his rationalization for the other cases. The pattern is as follows:

(a) A vague reason for mitigating the original sentence.

(b) Complete acknowledgment by Mr. McCloy of the guilt of the party concerned.

(c) An admission that the Review Board found it difficult to find "room for clemency."

(d) The Review Board's recommendation to grant clemency.

(e) Mr. McCloy's reluctance to carry out the recommendation.

(f) Mr. McCloy's decision to carry it out.

In other words, in each case there appears to be a feigned attempt to give the impression that much thought and perspiration went into the making up of the final decision! Could it be that Mr. McCloy endeavored to find arguments to convince himself that he was right?

Aside from the general method of de-emphasizing the enormity of the crimes perpetrated by these war criminals, the documents are so loosely drawn up that one cannot help but ask a number of pertinent questions. They are questions which have not as yet been answered, and frankly, we doubt whether Mr. McCloy and his colleagues would be willing to do so. Nevertheless, they deserve to be presented herewith, because they will provide food for thought for all Americans who are interested in preserving America's moral leadership during the present international crisis.

UNANSWERED QUESTIONS

1. How could the Clemency Review Board make a thorough study of the 12 trials and the petitions within a brief period of 40 days?

2. Did this Review Board which claimed to have read some 3000 pages consisting of the judgments of these 12 cases also examine in detail the 330,000 pages of testimony, exclusive of documentary exhibits, on which the judgments were based?

3. Why were the representatives of the prosecution staff in each of these cases ignored by the Review Board in the process of the review?

4. Why did Mr. McCloy, in defending the original sentences in the case of German military officers, declare that such sentences did not reflect "upon the honor of the German military profession"? What "honor" did Mr. McCloy have in mind when he talked about the German military profession?

5. Why did Mr. McCloy commute an additional number of death sentences, "although," he confessed, "the Board in its report found no grounds for clemency"?

Since Mr. McCloy was even more lenient than the Clemency Board, why did he go to the trouble of setting it up in the first place? Could it be that Mr. McCloy had made up his mind in advance of the recommendations of the Board?

6. In discussing the Hostages case where German generals were charged with violating civilized rules of warfare with respect to hostages and civilians, why did Mr. McCloy apologize for the Nazi practice of massacring innocent victims as indicated in the following sentence: "In spite of an effort to give full weight to the harassing character of local partisan and guerilla warfare which these and other officers had to face in this campaign . . ."

7. In the case involving the Ohlendorf criminals who had been guilty of exterminating millions of people, Mr. McCloy said the following: "Though guilt still attaches to them, the directness of their connection with the crimes is substantially lessened by this evidence."

What is this "evidence"?

8. In discussing the Krupp case Mr. McCloy declared: "The judgment does not indicate that several of the defendants were involved with certain of the illegalities, but it is extremely difficult to allocate individual guilt among the respective defendants." Why?

9. In nullifying the confiscation decree involving the properties of Alfred Krupp, Mr. McCloy said: "I am disposed to feel that confiscation in this single case constitutes discrimination against this defendant unjustified by any considerations attaching peculiarly to him." How could Mr. McCloy regard this as "discrimination," when an American court found it to be entirely legal and justified?

10. Commenting on the case of the German High Command, Mr. McCloy remarked: "With every disposition to grant consideration because officers are impelled to take measures calculated to protect their country and their command. . . ." Does Mr. McCloy believe that Hitler's generals were protecting their country?

CLEMENCY BOARD'S LOGIC

1. Why did the Clemency Board say: "We have felt that the authority to review sentences required a differentiation between specific facts found and established in the evidence and the conclusion that may have been drawn therefrom"? Was it the role of the Clemency Board to cast doubt on the wisdom or integrity of the American military courts?

2. On what authority did the Clemency Board take it unto itself to duplicate the work of the American courts?

3. The Clemency Board stated that these individuals were tried as individuals. Is this not in contradiction to the Board's admission that: "All were integrated in a massive design which despite its madness was thoroughly worked out to incorporate every endeavor"?

4. How can one justify these commutations when the Clemency Board itself admits that: "The main impression given, and one that is most disappointing, is that the majority of the defendants still seem to feel that what they did was right, in that they were doing it under orders. This exaltation of orders is even more disturbing as an attitude than as a defense."

THE MALMEDY CASE—A LESSON IN HAIR SPLITTING

The report by General Handy on the Malmedy case can best be analyzed by a brief examination of what he said. For the record it should be borne in mind that there had been 13 investigations of the Malmedy case, none of which cast any serious doubt as to the essential guilt of the said criminals. This was admitted by General Handy himself when he said: "The commutation of the death sentences does not mean that there is any doubt whatsoever that each was guilty of the offenses charged." This equivocation is similar in form to the kind of double talk that we find in Mr. McCloy's report. Indeed, in both Mr. McCloy's and General Handy's decisions, there are profuse admissions that the war criminals whose cases they were reviewing were guilty, but there is always the big "but."

Although General Handy was convinced that SS Leader Peiper was the ring leader in the crimes against the American G. I.'s, he nevertheless characterizes Peiper as "a remarkable leader." (sic) General Handy devotes several paragraphs to describing the evil deeds of Peiper, yet he commuted his death sentence because "the offenses are associated with a confused, fluid and desperate combat action, a last attempt to turn the tide of Allied successes and to re-establish a more favorable tactical position for the German army." If this excuse were accepted as the basis for future precedent, then the most barbaric crimes could be committed in wartime. As a matter of fact, however, General Handy's description of the character of the combat conditions during the Battle of the Bulge are at variance with authoritative information on this subject.

The Battle of the Bulge was a desperate move on the part of the Germans, but the cold-blooded crimes committed by the Malmedy war criminals had no organic relationship to the German attack during the Battle of the Bulge.

An added reason for sparing the Malmedy criminals, according to General Handy, was based on the "fact" that "the crimes are definitely distinguishable from the more deliberate killings in concentration camps." It is remarkable how one can play on words. What is meant by more deliberate and how can one distinguish between less deliberate and more deliberate? General Clay himself characterized the Malmedy gang as "cold-blooded killers."

Defending Peiper and the other Malmedy criminals on the basis that they committed crimes in the heat of battle ignores the report of the Baldwin Committee of the Senate which proved that the members of the Peiper SS team had a long and notorious record of rapine and murder both on the Eastern and Western fronts. Indeed, the battalion commanded by Peiper was given the quaint appellation, "Blow-Torch Battalion" because it received a well-earned reputation for German "efficiency" in burning villages and duplicating the infamous massacre of Lidice.

General Handy also commuted the death sentences of three criminals who had been guilty of murdering American and Allied airmen after they had parachuted from disabled planes. As in the Malmedy case, General Handy does not deny the Germans' responsibility "for these murders." However, as in the Malmedy case, General Handy found what he called mitigating circumstances—"such as the excitement resulting from the aerial activity, the offenses being committed after heavy bombing, and the fact that their crimes did not show a pattern of their character. . . ." While we do not condone air bombardment for its own sake, and hope that someday the world will be free from that ordeal, General Handy unwittingly is using the German defense for his own reasons which impelled him to commute these sentences. Significantly, we know of no case where the German bombings of England, for example, resulted in the lynching of any German airmen. Certainly General Handy's rationalizations will not serve as a source of encouragement to our heroic airmen, should they find themselves in distress at any future date in enemy-held territory.

Walter Winchell notes: "Correspondent Drew Middleton reporting John McCloy is the most villified American in Germany. The oh-so-kind Germans are abusing him for not releasing more Nazi war criminals. Middleton adds: 'If this is the way Germans treat their friends, it is not surprising they have so many enemies.' Hmf! . . ."

Policy versus Myth

Myths are stubborn things. They have a way of surviving and spreading even though an avalanche of facts are brought to bear upon them. One of the most carefully cultivated fables of our time is the shibboleth that Germany was and is a bulwark of democracy against Russia and Communism.

When Hitler made his first major thrust against the West it seemed as though that grand illusion had been shattered; but apparently this myth has many lives. Distinguished citizens of our country, who have been in public affairs for many years, are now waving this tattered banner before the American people as though it possessed some occult powers that could disintegrate the threat of Russia and Communism. Mr. Ferdinand Eberstadt, a former leading official in the War Production Board, and prominent banker, told an audience of the World Affairs Council of Seattle in the University of Washington that, "we destroyed Germany and thus opened up that country and its former sphere of influence to Russian infiltration in Western Europe and in the Balkans." Therefore, in order to resurrect this "Bulwark" Mr. Eberstadt advocated bringing Germany back into the family of nations "as a counterweight in the balance against Russian aggression." More recently (Feb. 9, 1951) Mr. Herbert Hoover made a similar suggestion, adding that "during 100 years... Germany was a great dam against these Russian controlled hordes."

From all indications it seems that our Government concurs with this view. About the same time that Mr. Hoover spoke his piece, Adrian Fischer, the legal adviser to the State Department, told the National Farm Institute that, "before World War II Germany and Japan were the bulwarks against Russian expansion." He then proceeded to express the necessity for rebuilding Germany to its former estate; presumably for the purpose of redressing the present disequilibrium in Europe.

The advocates of such a course of action are careful to avoid mentioning one important part of this myth; namely, Germany's "so-called" contribution to the strengthening of democracy and human freedom. It would be difficult indeed to prove this contention in view of the harrowing experiences of German aggressions and brutalities endured by the peoples of Europe in two world wars. Thus, we will only deal with that part of the myth, which according to its believers, rests on solid foundation.

Those who harbor the views expressed by Messrs. Eberstadt, Hoover, Fischer and others have accepted as fact something which they would like to believe and incidentally hope that it will be accepted in toto by the people. Yet it is well known to all objective students of history that the relationship of Germany and Russia cannot be characterized as being that of uncompromising and deadly opponents. The pages of history are replete with significant instances of Russo-German collaboration. This has been acknowledged by the United States Foreign Economic Administration in its exhaustive studies on the German problem following the end of the war. In one of its reports, the F. E. A. states: "When it is remembered that Ludendorff had not hesitated to send Lenin and Trotsky into Russia in the hope that revolution would paralyze Russia and there is excellent evidence that General Von Seeckt for years collaborated with Russia secretly, probably subsidized them, and certainly provided them with experts"—Germany's profession as a bulwark against Russia "is seen for what it was, an empty propaganda device useful both at home and abroad."

Several weeks ago the State Department published an interesting pamphlet entitled, Confuse and Control—Soviet Techniques in Germany, which pointed out that: "Hitler made much of Germany's position as the defender of Europe against the barbarians from the East. But ever since Napoleon had conquered Germany and attacked Russia, there had been much in common between the upper military and social classes in Germany and in Russia. The Tsar was closely related to the Kaiser. Bismarck's policy was always to cooperate with Russia. Now that Russia has a new ruling class as dictatorial as the old aristocracy, some of the old feeling of kinship is still to be found among extreme conservatives in Germany, from the Junkers to the ex-Nazis . . .

"There is some feeling among the aristocrats that they might make terms with the Soviet aristocracy and because of their experience and ability might become indispensable and powerful members of the Soviet ruling class."

There are several facts which should have been added to the above statement to make it more comprehensive. For example, most people have forgotten the Treaty of Rapallo in the early 1920's which strengthened the ties between the Soviets and the much vaunted Weimar Republic; nor are many people familiar with the fact that during those days the Ruhr Barons, including Krupp, received the cooperation of the Soviets in experiments with new techniques connected with war potential industries—a brazen violation of the Versailles Treaty. Furthermore, while it is true that Hitler posed as the "shining Knight" against Bolshevism, he did not hesitate to sign a pact of friendship with the Kremlin when it suited his needs.

It is significant that leading German militarists were planning an alliance with the Soviets at the close of World War II. PREVENT WORLD WAR III in its September-October 1949 issue printed a secret document under the title, "Germany Looks to the East," initialed by Field Marshal Keitel and Grand Admiral Doenitz which called for "an alliance between the Young Socialist forces against the old-rotten entrenched powers of the West."

In the post-war period this collaboration continues, as can be seen by the enormous quantities of war potential materials smuggled into the Soviet bloc from Western Germany. The hard truth of the matter is that there are powerful elements among the various social groupings in Germany who firmly believe that a tie-up between Russia and Germany is of prime importance and would confront the world with an invincible force.

Far be it from us to say that the Germans have a congenital love for the Russians, or vice-versa, but there is no evidence to show that the Germans are falling all over themselves in order to become a faithful and reliable bulwark for the Western democracies. Then what is Germany's preference? The answer to this question, surprisingly, is very simple: DEUTSCHLAND UBER ALLES! This has been the theme song of the foremost German leaders, military and geopolitical, since the days of Bismarck. It was succinctly described by the late Chancellor, Gustave Streseman, who was a close friend of the present Chancellor of the Bonn Government, Herr Adenauer: "The question of a choice between the East and the West does not arise as a result of our joining the League of Nations. Such a choice can only be made when it is backed by a military force. That, alas, we do not possess. We can neither become a continental spearhead for England, as some believe, nor can we involve ourselves in an alliance with Russia. I would utter a warning against any Utopian idea of coquetting with Bolshevism . . . That we are perfectly ready to come to an understanding with the Russian State, in whose evolutionary development I believe, on another basis, and my contention that we are not selling ourselves to the West by joining the League, is a matter on which I would enlarge to your Royal Highness (the former Crown Prince) in a personal talk."

It shouldn't be hard for realists to draw the necessary conclusions from Streseman's views as to what German policy should be at all times. It is a policy which aims to take advantage of all differences between their former and prospective opponents, be they the Russians or the Western democracies. This was clearly understood by the Elder Statesman, Mr. Bernard Baruch, when he testified before the Kilgore Committee in 1945. "The occupation of Germany," Mr. Baruch warned, "will be difficult enough at best. In the absence of common policy as to the long range fate of Germany, the Soviets are bound to question Allied moves as dictated by a desire to rebuild Germany into a buffer against Russia. In turn, the Western democracies will suspect Russia of seeking to communize Germany. The Germans can be expected to resort to every imaginable trick to foment discord among the four occupying nations. They will play one nation against the other, one zone against the other, hoping to break the common unity of the Allies, so controls will be permitted to lapse, giving her a chance to recoup as after Versailles."

Mr. Sumner Welles, former Under-Secretary of State during most of World War II, was among the key officials in the Government who equally understood the Streseman policy. In his brilliant book, The Time for Decision, he warned the West of the machinations of the German General Staff which, "considers the Anglo-Saxon powers the only antagonists that would be permanently and inevitably opposed to it." He warned that the German General Staff in driving for the resurgence of Germany after the war would "try to create doubts among the people of each country as to the ability, integrity, wisdom, or loyalty of their leading statesmen; in critical moments it will attempt to paralyze or to diminish the capacity for cool thinking by the people as a whole; and it will search in each country for men who, through ambition, vanity, or personal interest, will be disposed to serve the causes which the German General Staff desires at that particular moment to further."

Mr. Welles knew whereof he spoke, since few men have had access to the information upon which his book was based. He understood the nature of Pan-Germanism, observing that there was "no real deviation for nearly fifty years in German policy which had been consistently directed toward world hegemony."

The realism which helped shape American policy toward Germany during the war has now been substituted for a series of incantations which in truth would be more fitting for primitive people than for an enlightened and powerful nation like ourselves. The real bulwark against Communist expansion is the very reverse of our present program for Germany, which is based on a myth. The more we build up Germany the easier it will be for the Soviets to strengthen their grip over satellite countries and increase the alarm among our Western allies who have a justified fear of a resurgent Germany. This can only redound to the advantage of Soviet Russia.

Only if the Western allies would agree to reverse the present program for Germany, could effective unity be developed in the West, which would be a positive answer to Soviet ambitions. This policy would be based on strict control over Germany's war potential, and a prohibition of the revival of German militarism. It would be based on concrete controls over Germany's economic development visa vis the East, and the prevention of German economic and political domination over the Western Allies. It would be based on the strengthening of the economic and military potentials of the North Atlantic nations, and by the same token, of the United States. It would be based on a firm policy of breaking up the German cartel octopus and would eliminate Nazis and former Nazis and former Hitler supporters from important positions, public and private. Under these conditions much of the tensions in Europe could be relaxed and economic progress for all nations, including Germany, be developed.

Such a positive program would prepare Germany to ultimately enter the family of nations as a peaceful member. One must always bear in mind that the factors which are the sine qua non to the security of the United States are by no means necessarily identical with what the Germans consider as essential to their security. If the history of German foreign policy over the past fifty years is any guide to what the Germans consider as their security, then we would say, America Beware!

Seven Decisions That Shaped History

by

SUMNER WELLES

There are few men in our country today who have had the wealth of experience in international affairs as has Mr. Sumner Welles. For many years, going as far back as 1915, Mr. Welles served the U. S. A. with distinction in diplomatic posts throughout the world. Because of his profound knowledge of the basic forces at work in the international arena, Mr. Welles from 1937 to 1943 served as Undersecretary of State, in which position he literally had his fingers on the pulse of our foreign policy.

In 1944, having left the diplomatic service, he wrote a remarkable book entitled: "The Time for Decision," in which he discussed the basic problems of American foreign policy. That book, in our considered view, should be read and re-read by every thinking American today. Mr. Welles knew whereof he spoke, for as was stated in the introduction to this book: "Only a handful of men in the world have had access to the information on which this book is based."

For some years since the writing of this book Mr. Welles took to semi-retirement, but his mind was never distracted from the field with which he was so intimately acquainted. Undoubtedly his latest book, "Seven Decisions that Shaped History" is the product of deep reflection since his retirement from public office.

Is is a book which in many ways is a sequel to his first. But in addition, it is a recapitulation of the negative and positive aspects of the key decisions which our Government has taken since the end of the war. Mr. Welles devotes many pages to Far Eastern Policy, to the development of the United Nations and its relations to the United States, and to the question of Allied agreements made during and after the war. Every chapter contains valuable information and important judgments on the part of Mr. Welles which no student of International Affairs can ignore.

Mr. Welles is a realist and a keen student of history. These two admirable traits equip him to dissect American policy and to propose what course of action our country should take in these dangerous times. His last chapter entitled: "Policy for Today" is an essay on realism which should become part of the literature read by our own diplomats. In discussing what our policy should be for today, Mr. Welles brings out the fact that the United States, because of its prestige and strength on the eve of the war's end, had the great opportunity of hammering out a program for peace that could have won the hearts and minds of all peoples. As he states: "Yet at Potsdam an American President representing what was then the mightiest power on earth could still have secured from Stalin an agreement upon the major provisions of the peace treaty ultimately to be negotiated with a new German government."

He reveals that Stalin had agreed with President Roosevelt's own view that Germany should be decentralized as a means of thwarting the revival of a new Reich. He deplores the fact that President Truman's advisers did not take advantage of this situation since it should have been clear to them: "that any future developments that made possible either the resurgence of a militaristic pan-German Reich or the amalgamation of German technical skill and industrial capacity with Communist dominated manpower and natural resources, would inevitably end all of mankind's hopes for a peaceful Europe or a peaceful world."

We missed the bus, so to speak, and as a result, we face great dangers today. These dangers are being met by the Atlantic Defense Pact, but plans have gone further, and as Mr. Welles points out, the English speaking peoples are pressing for the rearmament of West Germany on the "pretext that German manpower is required if the Atlantic Pact is to be successful." This issue, in Mr. Welles' judgment, is "even greater in its implications than the issues that have recently arisen in this country's relations with the Far East."

Thus, Mr. Welles once again displays his ability to focus attention on the crucial issues which will affect the ultimate question of war or peace.

Mr. Welles regards the Schuman Plan as being originally conceived to control Germany's propensity for dominating her neighbors. In his view, without adequate safeguards, "a rearmed Western Germany will become the ally rather than the opponent of the Soviet Union. Nothing, therefore, could be better calculated to inflame French sentiment against the English speaking peoples and to increase the popular strength of the French Communist party than the Anglo-American plan for German rearmament."

It is undoubtedly true that proper safeguards over Germany's economic and political power are of the greatest necessity. Whether the Schuman Plan in its ultimate operation will meet its requirements, remains to be seen, but in any event, as Mr. Welles rightly observes, German rearmament can only give more ammunition to Communist propaganda, and thereby serve as a self-defeating act in thwarting Communist expansion.

Mr. Welles, in examining the need to strengthen the military might of the West, never loses sight of the ultimate objective, namely to prevent rather than to provoke war. But, as he says, "If we are to be realistic, given the acute tension now existing in our relations with the Soviet Union, how can we fail to admit that any Russian government, even a government far more pacific and conciliatory, must inevitably regard as a threat to Russian security our rearmament of the country (Germany) that in 1917 forced them to accept the shameful peace of Brest-Litovsk, and in 1941 invaded and ravaged their homeland." Mr. Welles therefore, in common with other keen students of this problem, including Mr. James P. Warburg, says the rearmament of Germany is not only an issue which will increase the influence of Communists in the West but at the same time may indeed turn out to be the casus belli for the Russians.

These two factors far outweigh the doubtful military assistance which could be gained from a rearmed Germany. This is Mr. Welles' judgment. Mr. Welles knows Germany like few people do. This was proved in his earlier book, "The Time for Decision." And he continues to enlighten the people in his latest work. He discounts the theory that the Germans are permanently sick of war. This theory was also held by the Western Allies during the years of the Weimar republic: "Over the same French opposition that we see today," he points out, "Great Britain then not only permitted but actually connived at German rearmament. We Americans poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Germany in the form of loans. It was those policies which were directly responsible for the Second World War."

When the West woke up it was too late, and the war-weary German of 1919 turned out to be the SS fanatic of Hitler's marching armies. Thus, Mr. Welles declares that: "German rearmament today before the German people have shown any change of heart, before any adequate safeguards have been set up to control Germany's capacity to make war and at the precise moment when a rearmed Germany may well become an asset rather than an obstacle to Soviet expansion, seems to me, I must confess, an exact repetition of the fatal blunder which England and America committed a scant 30 years ago."

We have taken the liberty of quoting extensively from this last chapter, because its message is one which must be pondered with the greatest seriousness by all of us. Mr. Welles is acutely aware of the dangers which grow out of Soviet ambitions, but by rejecting the formula of rearming Germany he merely refuses to have our people jump from the frying pan into the fire. He recognizes that in the 1920's, leading English statesmen such as Winston Churchill, "believed that in rearming Germany we would be erecting a barrier to the spread of Soviet Communism." But he replies in terse words: "The fatal outcome of that policy we have all witnessed."

Thus it is clear that Mr. Welles has posed the question whether we are ready to take the same gamble with the same people and suffer the same consequences. It is hard to know whether the great majority of the American people are ready for this calculated risk, but Mr. Welles knows how some of the great leaders of the American people have felt about this issue: "Franklin Roosevelt," writes Welles, "often declared that whatever the nature of the peace it must at least provide for German disarmament until such time as the German people have offered a practical demonstration of their spiritual regeneration. Remembering this I cannot for one moment imagine that he would now join his wartime colleague, Winston Churchill, in supporting any policy that calls for German rearmament."

As we said, "Seven Decisions that Shaped History" is a remarkable work from a remarkable mind. We recommend it highly.

Justice vs. Germany's War Crimes

by

SIR HARTLEY SHAWCROSS, K.C., M.P.

There has been some discussion recently about the position of the war criminals who were dealt with and sentenced either by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg or by other Military Tribunals subsequently set up in the different zones of Germany. Indeed there have been some who have suggested for one reason or another the exercise of some sort of wholesale act of clemency towards these individuals, grave and odious though the crimes were of which they have been convicted. I would not, for my own part, question the propriety of exercising clemency in a particular case on some humanitarian ground such as grave illness—although I would not see any special reason for treating war criminals more favorably in this regard than ordinary and respectable criminals, many of whom are ill and some of whom die in prison.

But speaking as one who during his six years' membership in the Government has, both before various International Tribunals and at the United Nations, had something to do with the efforts which suffering humanity has made to assert the rule of law in international affairs, I should certainly view with grave concern anything which might tend to undermine the principles of individual criminal responsibility for crimes against humanity and for war crimes which we have succeeded in laying down.

It is not perhaps surprising that some individuals in Germany and Japan, members of the elements from which most of the notorious war criminals were recruited, the Nazis, the militarists, the reactionary industrialists, should now be seeking to discredit the war trials. As after the 1914-18 war, so now, those elements in Germany who were responsible for the war now seek to deny their guilt—although if they had won they would have gloried in their victory. But this is a time when the United Nations, with America and ourselves in the lead, are doing our utmost against heavy odds to assert the principles of law and order in Korea, and to suppress the crime of aggressive war which is being committed there.

Speaking for myself—and in what I say here I am putting forward simply my personal view—it does seem to me disquieting that at such a time there should be those who, either because of mistaken ideas of political expediency or because of the wholly false view that these sentences were no more than vengeance wreaked by the victors upon the vanquished, would seek as a matter of policy to take action undermining the validity of what has been done.

I say little about the question of political expediency. And it is a matter which should enter little into the administration of justice. This is no doubt a time when we all desire to secure the cooperation of Germany in international affairs, when we desire her gradual restoration to equal sovereignty with the rest of us and when we are unfortunately compelled to consider the expediency of some measure of rearmament in Western Germany—I say unfortunately because it is a tragedy that any of us should be forced, as we are being by the Communists, into the necessity for rearmament.

It is true that some consider, and they may well be right, that the Communists were themselves guilty during the war and since, of crimes similar to those for which they joined in condemning the Nazis. Be it so. Two wrongs do not make a right. The fact the Communists have also committed black crimes does not make the Nazi criminals benefactors of the human race. If it turns out that on some Tribunal which has condemned a criminal one member or another was himself guilty of similar crimes—and such things have happened—we may deplore the hypocrisy of the member concerned but we do not exonerate the criminal who has been convicted. We must avoid getting so worked up about Communism as to identify every person as a friend of law, order and democracy because at one time he was a foe of Communism.

There are some who remember that the Nazis fought against the Russians and think therefore that they are friends of peace and democracy, forgetting both that the Nazis did not hesitate to ally themselves with the Russians when it suited them or that we ourselves were allied to Russia in the war. These Nazis were and are no friends of ours—simply because they fought against the Russians during the war.

Nothing could do a greater disservice to our cause, at a time when Germany is being led back into the international life of Europe, than at the same time to whitewash the Nazis and what they stood for. The continued enforcement of the judicial sentences against the Nazi war criminals involves no condonation of any crimes the Communists may have committed. On the contrary, unless we are to be utterly cynical about these matters, the very fact that other countries or individuals may be minded to commit like crimes is all the more reason why we should stick firmly to the rule of law which we uphold.

Any other policy in regard to the war criminals would weaken the cause of the free nations in any struggle in which we may be engaged by reducing it to the level of a mere contest for power, divorced from principle. That is not our position. We stand upon the rule of law. We vindicated that rule by enforcing the individual responsibility at least of some of those who broke it in the last war. We must assert it now. But these aspects of the matter are political. I am as everyone knows, no politician and I want to talk now of the legal status of this matter.

During the war the most solemn warnings were issued, in view of the information we had as to the infamous crimes that had been committed that those concerned would be brought to trial and if found guilty would be punished. When the war ended it was decided first by Mr. Churchill's administration and then by Mr. Attlee's that this country should join with the three other major powers in the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg for the trial of the major war criminals. The very distinguished British Judge, Sir David Maxwell Fyfe and I, as Attorney-General, took part in the actual proceedings. We did so because we were satisfied that they were both lawful and just. It is said that this was victor's justice; that it was a Court established by the victorious powers. That may be so but it by no means follows that the Judges who administered it were not able to administer justice with complete impartiality and according to law. I am confident that they did both.

In the absence of an International Criminal Court—and the question of constituting one is now being canvassed before the United Nations—any enforcement of the criminal laws of war is almost inevitable by the victorious powers. The Hague Convention against inhumane warfare did not even specify that individuals could be tried for breaking them or how they were to be tried. But it was always recognized that individuals who did break the laws of war were tried and in previous wars large numbers were in fact tried and punished.

There is no substance at all in the argument about the establishment of the Court. It is said that the procedure and evidence differed from the ordinary technical rules of English law. Why not? These were not ordinary English Courts. But the procedure was fair. And the evidence was more than adequate to prove the facts.

Then it is said that some of the laws enforced by the Court were what is called ex post facto law making.

International law corresponds to our common law in the sense that it isn't the result of any express enactment. It grows up gradually by treaties, by customs and by decisions of international bodies in particular cases.

In 1934, the great American, Mr. Justice Cardozo said that "the gap is not so great that adjudication may not fill it. International law has at times, like the common law within Statutes, a twilight existence during which it is hardly distinguishable from morality or justice, till at length the imprimateur of a Court attests its jural quality." That was what was done at Nuremberg.

It was not the Charter which created the crime of aggressive war. That's the mistake which these critics of Nuremberg make. Long before that, in the Pact of Paris, which Mr. Kellogg promoted in 1928, and which was signed by over 60 Nations, aggressive war was declared to be illegal. It was called the General Treaty for the enunciation of war, and it was entered into with especial solemnity. That is the way that International Law is formed. And the Kellogg Pact did not stand alone. In numerous declarations between the two wars, the League of Nations, Conferences of Lawyers, and other bodies expressly stigmatized aggressive war to be a crime.

The truth is that the whole basis of the principle against ex post facto legislation was lacking. These wicked men who were tried at Nuremberg could not say that they were innocent; that they hadn't known that to launch an aggressive war was wrong. They couldn't pretend that if they had know that aggressive war was criminal they wouldn't have been parties to it. They knew very well that it was criminal. What they did not know was that they could be beaten, and that the Allies would set up machinery to try them. But then, a criminal often thinks he will get away with it.

What was an innovation at Nuremberg so far as war crimes against peace and other crimes against humanity are concerned, was the actual trial—the setting up of the Tribunal to try the men. But that was a matter, not of creating the crime, but of providing the machinery for dealing with it. Methods of procedure, specific punishment: the appropriate Courts—these things can always be defined by a subsequent proclamation without conflicting with the real basis of the ex post facto rule.

Another criticism that is made is that soldiers were punished simply for obeying their orders. That is wholly wrong. These military officers really form an astonishingly strong international Trade Union, and one hears some astonishingly misconceived arguments. All I can say is that if, in any other war, any officers of ours did the things that Keitel and Jodl and Raeder did, they would fully deserve the same punishment.

This idea that a soldier must always obey orders and, anyway, that if he doesn't some one else will, is perfectly monstrous. A soldier is only bound to obey a lawful order. If a lieutenant orders a soldier to shoot, say, a major—that is murder, although the soldier is obeying his superior officer's orders. "The warrant of no man, not even the King himself, excuseth the doing of an illegal act." That is the maxim in England.

It would be a very salutary thing if politicians and staff officers knew that, once their Governments embark in courses of international criminality, they ought to resign—or share the criminal responsibility.

Some people are unhappy about these trials, I dare say, but I think it is because they don't understand how international law is built up. It is not a static thing: it grows and develops with changing circumstances. And, anyway, there is no occasion to be unhappy because of any feeling that injustice was done. You see—and this fact seems to be forgotten very often—all these men, in addition to being charged with crimes against the peace, were charged with war crimes against humanity; in other words with murder on a wholesale scale. Those things were criminal under any system of law—always up to the hilt.

Of those remaining under sentence at Nuremberg all but the psychopathic Hess were convicted of war crimes—that is to say, offenses against the laws of war as established by international law before the war took place. And that is true of all those convicted by the Military Courts in the British Zone.They were just ordinary criminals convicted of ordinary crimes. They deserve no more sympathy than any other criminal in any common jail and it would be wholly wrong if ideas—mistaken as I think—of political expediency led to any special exercise of clemency on their behalf. The crimes these men committed were sometimes of such enormity that they cried to High Heaven for redress. The processes to redress them vindicated the rule of law against the unrestricted barbarity of omnipotent force and brutality. We must and will stand by the rule of law in these matters.

Panzer General to Teach the West

by

B. REICHENBACH

Within a few months three books have appeared in West Germany dealing with General Guderian, Inspector General of the German tank forces, and after the plot of July, 1944, Acting Chief of Staff of the German Army. Two of these books are written by himself, the third being a eulogy based mainly on Guderian's Memoirs and designed to present the Panzer General as a shining example for future generations.

It is probably no coincidence that these books have been published just now. When Anglo-Saxon commanders and High Commissioners are coaxing the Germans into uniform again, German generals "scent the morning air" and publishers their business. Will it be profitable?

The reaction such books will meet among the readers may to some extent indicate the present trend of German mentality. These are not books about military subjects only, but history textbooks written to whitewash Hitler's generals from any taint of having been the tools of the Nazis.

This, of course, can only be achieved by a return to the old Nazi propaganda line that their war was not an aggression against Europe but, on the contrary, a war in defense of Western Europe against the East. This is Guderian's thesis, explained in his booklet "Can Western Europe Be Defended?" According to him, even Hitler's dictatorship was conceived and developed only as a means of saving Germany and Western Europe against an even more ruthless Russian dictatorship (cf. p. 23).

It does not occur to Guderian that, if Hitler wanted to save Western Europe, the best way to do it was hardly by concluding a pact with the rival dictator in order to free his hands against the West. Instead, the old Dolchstoss fairy tale is dished up: "The Western Powers made an alliance with Russia in 1941, landed in the back of the Germans and broke Germany's power when she was engaged in a bitter struggle against the Soviet Union, fighting for bare survival." Here we have, all over again, the German Siegfried, stabbed in the back! Naturally, Guderian blames the Allies for putting in the dock at Nurnberg the very defenders of Europe!

For Nazi-Soviet Pact

He leaves, however, no doubt in his "Memoirs," that he, like the rest of the generals, looked upon the Hitler-Stalin pact as a genuine pact of friendship. He condemns the German Balkans offensive in the spring of 1941 as a provocation to the Russians. It is interesting to remember that before the war, when his mind was untroubled by any thought of pleasing General Eisenhower, Guderian was well known for being "ostorientiert." He had then just returned from the Soviet Union, where he was sent by the Reichswehr Command to study, at Kazan, Russian Panzer tactics and where he assisted Marshal Tukashevsky in building up Soviet armour. Significantly, there is now in his memoirs not a word on this cooperation with the Russians.

Hitler's reasons for his preventive war against Russia which he explained to his generals on June 14, 1941, convinced nobody, says Guderian. What had been those reasons? "He would be unable to beat the English. Therefore, in order to find a way to peace, he would have to ensure a victorious end of the war on the Continent. But to be unassailable on the mainland he would have to crush Russia first."

But in this attitude of either Hitler or Guderian there is nothing which was in any sense concerned with the "historical task of the Germans to save Europe from the Eastern menace."

Again and again, in trying to distinguish between Hitler's alleged historical conception and his "terrible strategical blunders," Guderian is contradicting himself. He is balancing on a razor's edge, trying, on the one hand, to justify the faithful support of the regime and its war by the officers' military failures to Hitler. This ambiguity leads him into a rather tight corner when it comes to the plot of July, 1944. He himself rejects the Law of April 26, 1942, which removed the last check on dictatorial powers: "From that day, Germany ceased to be a modern Rechtsstaat." Yet when the plotting generals approach him, he refuses all help though he does not denounce the plot. Later he joins the so-called "Court of Honour," under the presidency of Field Marshal von Runstedt, which had to dismiss and surrender to the terror of the People's Court any officer in any way involved in the plot. In his book Guderian professes sympathy for the victims and especially their relatives who, through the terrible Sippenhaft, were equally held responsible and on Guderian's own testimony, suffered persecution and bitter hardship. Nevertheless the General, now duly appointed Chief of Staff, continues to travel on Hitler's bandwagon.

Hypnotised by Hitler

His memoirs end with profiles of some Nazi leaders. Hitler he describes as "a man of dominating cleverness ... his most obvious quality was his will-power ... many people were hypnotised by him. There was hardly anybody in the General Staff who dared to oppose him. Its members were either in a state of permanent hypnosis like Field Marshal Keitel, or of resignation like Jodl. But even men imbued with great confidence came under the spell of Hitler and were silenced when faced with his logic, which they found difficult to refute." Such was Germany's military elite. "It was, however, Hitler's misfortune always to be surrounded in his party by mediocre people," Guderian goes on, referring among others to Himmler, also Goering, who burst into tears when Hitler called him lazy and responsible for the Luftwaffe's failure.

Being so busy white-washing the honor of the Nazi Army, what has Guderian to say about the concentration camps, the D. P. camps, and the liquidation of millions of Jews and non-Jews? There is only one very brief passage confined to the now familiar pretext of having known nothing about it: "The atrocities perpetrated in the concentration camps came to my attention only after the collapse. The system of secrecy of concentration camp methods must certainly be called the work of a genius."

"Never Heard of Gas Ovens"

Similarly he had said on March 6, 1945, at a press conference in Berlin (which, of course, he does not mention in his books): "I have never seen anything of those devils' ovens, gas chambers and similar inventions of an insane imagination." Reports which were by then sufficiently substantiated to be taken seriously, he was pleased to dismiss as "atrocity stories against the Germans, set afloat with Jewish thoroughness." Even now, while he has to confirm these Greuelmarchen he, who belonged to the inner circle, plays the nobody who had not the slightest inkling of what in those days had already become the horror of the whole civilised world.

This General now poses as a teacher of Western statesmen. For him there is but one way out: If the Soviets are not to conquer the West, Germany must be restored as the most vital factor of Western Europe. This, he points out, includes not only equal rights and full sovereignty but the return of the former Eastern provinces as well as the Sudetenland. The French he tells generously: "We Germans are free from any resentment against France and we see no reason why she should have any against us." Britain, however, is blamed for having always opposed German-French understanding; she "ought to work for the consolidation of Western Europe in her own interest," he writes. So far, he finds, "British policy towards Western Europe has only been negative."

Taken all in all, these are the sort of books which, in the hands of the young and immature, are almost certain to have most dangerous effects. This probably is exactly what the author desires. Does Dr. Adenauer desire it too?

Was the Decartelization Program Sabotaged?

Part III

As part of its educational activities, the Society for the Prevention of World War III has held conferences with former decartelization employees and has made a study of their findings. The Profile following represents the collective viewpoint and expression of these experts.

Profile No. 3: General Lucius D. Clay

For some time it has been common knowledge that the United States decartelization program for occupied Germany has, for all practical purposes, been abandoned or reduced to a state of insignificance. We also know that a small group of former officials of the U. S. Military Government was active in seeing to it that the deconcentration of German industry would not be carried out even though this policy had been declared to be a basic objective and had been often affirmed in policy directives and statements by President Truman.

What is not so well known is the part taken by General Clay in formulating the "theory" which justified the abandonment of decartelization and his active leadership in preventing any implementation of the program.

The officials who supervised U. S. economic policy in Germany had little patience with the general intent of the U. S. occupation of Germany—the reconstruction of a peaceful and democratic German society stripped of its power to wage war and re-educated to a democratic way of life in which the autocratic influences of the past would be eliminated. Many of these officials were representatives of "big business" in the U. S. whose chief interest lay in rebuilding a strong German economy and at the same time protecting and advancing the vested interests of American companies in Germany. These industries were generally in the heavy goods and equipment categories and were the most cartelized and monopolistic. As such they were the primary targets of U. S. decartelization policy.

The U. S. policy respecting decartelization has been clear and consistent, and was first referred to in the Fourth Principle of the Atlantic Charter, August 14, 1941; it was restated in more detail in mid-1944 by Secretary of State Cordell Hull, when, at the direction of President Roosevelt, he set up a branch in the State Department to formulate a definite U. S. policy with respect to cartels and excessive concentrations of economic power. This clear policy was formally expressed in the declaration of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on April 26, 1945, and was reiterated in the Potsdam agreement August 2, 1945.

It was against this background that the plans and the program for decartelization in Germany were developed. Law 56, with which we are concerned in this study, was put into effect on February 12, 1947. The policy declaration of this law reads as follows: "This law is enacted, in accordance with paragraph 12 of the Potsdam agreement, in order (I) to prevent Germany from endangering the safety of her neighbors and again constituting a threat to international peace, (II) to destroy Germany's economic potential to wage war, (III) to insure that measures taken for Germany's reconstruction are consistent with peaceful and democratic purposes, (IV) to lay the groundwork for building a healthy and democratic German economy.

"To this end, concentration of economic power as exemplified, in particular, by cartels, syndicates, trusts, combines, and other types of monopolistic or restrictive arrangements which could be used by Germany as instruments of political or economic aggression, be eliminated at the earliest practicable date."

A subsequent official directive, issued by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, dated July 15, 1947, reiterated and restated the policy, after there had been a thorough re-examination of the whole issue at the highest government level.

During the period Law 56 was being negotiated, the Decartelization Branch of OMGUS was active in studying German industries. On the basis of these investigations, it was found that there existed within Germany 69 separate industrial organizations or combines which were appropriate subjects for deconcentration. In the U. S. zone alone, there were 28 such combines having their principal places of business in that zone. The duty of our military authorities was to carry out official policy. The Ferguson Commission, appointed by President Truman in 1948 to investigate our decartelization policy, stated in its final report: "We recommend no change in this policy; none has been suggested by us." (Page 20, April 15, 1949.)

Neither the policy, nor the Ferguson recommendations have been heeded by the Military Government officials.

The Gravediggers of Our Policy

These Military Government officials, headed by William Draper, vice president of the banking concern Dillon, Read & Co., disliked intensely the entire program. They looked upon decartelization as anathema and opposed all practical steps to implement the program.

To accomplish their purpose of blocking action against excessive economic power, they resorted to direct and indirect sabotage of instructions and policies and disregarded with unabashed arrogance high policy directives in order to render decartelization activities inoperative. They wept crocodile tears about the indigent American taxpayer who was compelled to support Germany because the "anti-trust" boys in the Decartelization Branch were interfering with German industrial recovery. They denounced James S. Martin, the first chief of the Decartelization Branch as a follower of the "Morgenthau

Plan" and the program he proposed as one of "ruthless deconcentration." Every influential visitor from the U. S., every group of newspapermen or editors, were not too subtly informed that the American taxpayer would immeasurably be relieved if only decartelization and its nefarious doings could be abolished.

General Clay, however, as Military Governor, was the man who gave the decartelization program its coup de grace. The method which Clay used to throttle decartelization was simple enough. It consisted in declaring the clear-cut provisions of Law 56—on excessive economic concentration—as inapplicable and substituting for it, arbitrarily, deconcentration criteria which completely reversed the principles laid down in Law 56.

Furthermore, the officials selected by Clay to guide and supervise the work were known adversaries of the decartelization program. They possessed neither the interest nor the experience for the job. Among the most important of these was Phillips Hawkins. An obscure patent attorney, he leaped into official prominence as a result of his marriage to General William Draper's daughter. As a top economic adviser to Clay he ruled, high-handedly, on questions that would tax the competence of leading economists, and was able to push into a position of importance as chief of the Decartelization Branch another obscure attorney, Richardson Bronson. (See Bronson's record in PREVENT WORLD WAR III, No. 36, page 31.)

General Clay's Record on Decartelization

It will be useful to begin with General Clay's own report as given in his book, "Decision in Germany." In this account of his stewardship of the American occupation, he describes in one paragraph, page 325, the achievements of decartelization under his direction, and we will quote, therefore, the essential parts of this paragraph:

"A third specific measure which the occupying powers considered necessary for security against Germany was the breaking up of cartels and excessive concentration of economic power . . . In the United States procedures under anti-trust laws are reenforced by court decisions rendered over a period of years. Many Americans will believe the process in Germany has gone too far while others will believe that we have hardly moved at all. Actually cartels are now illegal; hundreds have been broken up and any which exist will be broken up as they appear. The Big Six Banks, the I. G. Farben Empire and the twenty-six large coal and steel enterprises are in dissolution, and have been or are being reorganized into a much larger number of smaller enterprises . . . There has never before been a like effort to reduce concentration of economic power. Personally, I think the process has been carried to about the right point and further breakup of industry would result in its inability to compete in world markets . . ."

This is an unusually rosy picture of the remarkable achievement and progress of decartelization under Clay's regime, which in his opinion is just at the "right point" where it can be snipped off lest further deconcentration impair Germany's world market position. According to this account, Germany is decartelized, scores of new businesses are competing where only a few combines existed before, the big iron and steel trusts of the Ruhr have been smashed and the problem of U. S. security so far as Germany's potential and real economic power are concerned has been solved. An aggressive Germany resting on an economic foundation of cartels and large industrial concentrations is no longer possible, he intimates.

There is only one flaw in this idyllic account: It does not happen to be true.

Not a single, major industrial combine has been deconcentrated in the U. S. zone of occupation—not even I. G. Farben.

German cartels, it is true, are theoretically prohibited under Law 56, but in practice they continue to flourish and expand. The Decartelization Branch was never permitted to implement the ban on cartels. Its program for enforcement of the anti-cartel provisions of Law 56 was never approved, although a number of insignificant actions against minor trade associations took place.

General Clay, under pressure, agreed to only one major action against a large German company, namely, Robert Bosch of Stuttgart. However, the action against Bosch was rendered ineffective by a divestiture order which did not seriously attack Bosch's dominant position in the German economy. Moreover, with the help of Bronson and Hawkins, the Bosch company was able to make a dummy agreement with a Swiss company headed by an American ex-general Wilson which allowed Bosch to recapture its world market position and re-establish its international cartel agreements. (A detailed study of these phony happenings appeared in No. 37 of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, on page 23.)

With regard to Bosch, the High Commissioner's office reports (March 17, 1948) that action is now being completed against the company. More than three years have passed since the first draft order against Bosch was ready. At best, it will be a Pyrrhic victory for decartelization since the company will have retained the fruits of its decades of swallowing up its competitors.

On November 3, 1950, the Stuttgarter Nachrichten reported that the decartelization of R. Bosch was no longer the concern of the Allied High Commission.

The vigorous statement by Clay that the steel combines in the Ruhr are in a state of dissolution is the most astounding of all; that they have been replaced by a large number of small companies is not merely inaccurate reporting. It is more on the order of a grand deception, since it is a fact that under the Adenauer regime and with the full cognizance of the Allied High Commission, the steel combines in the Ruhr with the former Nazi industrialists, Dinkelbach, Pferdemenges, Reusch, et al in the saddle are recovering their economic power and are becoming a greater power than at any time in the past.

The steel combines of the Ruhr, guided by a Ruhr Steel Trustees Association composed of the former leaders of the old steel cartel and Nazi industrialists, are now able to present a monopolistic front in the field of European steel production more potent than that which existed in pre-war Germany, notwithstanding the controls established by Military Government and the Allied High Commission, which succeeded it. This newly reconstituted combine is ready to take on the world, and in particular, French and British steel producers. In view of Clay's own vigorous intervention on behalf of the steel cartelists in opposition to the British must we conclude that the General is extremely naive—which he isn't—or that he sought in his book to deliberately mislead American public opinion? Or else how can we interpret the following official account of the meeting between General Clay and his decartelization staff March 22, 1948, as culled from Exhibit 38 of the Ferguson hearings: "With reference to the steel companies, Clay raised the question regarding the number needed and remarked, 'you can't limit steel companies to the manufacture of a single product.' He stated that it was impossible to write arbitrary rules and that he was governing himself by the rule of reason and effects.

"At this point, staff member (Kobre) stated that the staff wished to continue to do its work on German heavy industry and Clay replied that 'he wanted primarily to break up the monopolies in the consumer goods field.' Clay said that: 'The job of deconcentrating heavy industry is a British job.' Clay said that only Bosch, Henschel and possibly Siemens and Halske were monopolies in the U. S. zone."

General Clay and the German Monopolies

That was Clay's statement on March 22, 1949. We assume that this statement was intended to be an order to his decartelization staff. If we are to take it at its face value, Clay plainly stated that Henschel, for instance, was a monopoly, hence subject to decartelization. Further, if we interpret Clay's famous "rule of reason" dictum seriously, we assume that he stood behind it and was ready to assume all responsibility for its execution. Here again we will let the official record answer General Clay. On March 10, 1948, or 12 days before the above-mentioned meeting took place, Richardson Bronson wrote a memo dealing with a conversation he had with General Clay (Exhibit 11-A) in which he reported General Clay as having told him that, "he was willing to make his decision right now, for example, that Henschel should not be decentralized." The question is, was Henschel not a monopoly on March 10, 1948? Did it become one on March 22, 1948?

And as regards the famous rule of reason, Richardson Bronson defined it as follows: "That we must examine all corporations in our zone of the 10,000 employees if we had not already so examined, and make up our decision as to whether they were or were not an excessive concentration of economic power, and, if they were not, we should and could and must inform the organization that it was not to be the subject of decentralization proceedings, and, if it was an excessive concentration, that we were to go ahead and take such action; that the whole policy of our program must be based upon a rule of reason and the rule of reason was our one and practically only yardstick; that the decision as to whether an enterprise should not be decentralized was to be made by me, concurred in by Mr. Hawkins, and, if necessary, concurred in by General Clay himself." In other words, the interpretation of General Clay's rule of reason was left to the discretion of Mr. Richardson Bronson and General Draper's son-in-law, Phillips Hawkins.

And since General Clay was so proud of our accomplishment in decartelizing the Ruhr steel industry, we believe it pertinent to quote General Clay's moral fortitude in this matter by further quoting from Bronson's memo on March 10, 1948. "General Clay stated that we should not assume any responsibility in the preparation of the directives against the Ruhr enterprises, but that we should be on the policy-making level and, for the American side, approve or disapprove of the determination of how the enterprises in the Ruhr should be decentralized when the British had prepared it; that as a matter of principle, insofar as the steel enterprises in the Ruhr were concerned, that he was for a vertical integration, but he was against horizontal integrations and therefore an enterprise should not be decentralized because it was a vertical integration of interests, and, as a matter of fact, the vertical integration of interests would be necessary in many instances; that he had gathered that the British were in contemplation of making 40 or 50 competing enterprises in the Ruhr and he was of the opinion that was making a number of such small ones that they could not successfully compete in the world market or successfully compete against the enterprises in the United Kingdom, and it might well be and more suitable that there were only five or six or ten or such number of enterprises competing out of the Ruhr combines." In other words, General Clay did nothing to break up the steel and coal industries.

General Clay's Fortitude

Furthermore, one would have assumed that General Clay would have been only too glad to affix his signature to a specific set of definitions and yardsticks as prepared by his aides, Bronson and Hawkins. The record, however, will reveal that this wasn't the case either. As reported by Bronson: "Mr. Hawkins then showed him the memorandum which he prepared dated March 9, a copy of which is hereto attached, and General Clay read it over and said that he did not wish to sign and formally approve of a series of definitions and yardsticks, but that he generally approved of everything contained in the memorandum and that it should serve WITHOUT BEING PUBLISHED AS SUCH (capitalization supplied) as the guide to the activities of the U. S. Decartelization Branch."

Why did General Clay not include in his book a copy of the oral statement he made to Bronson?

The picture General Clay draws in his book of his achievements in the field of decartelization is completely misleading. For the truth of the matter is that he carries full responsibility for scuttling decartelization and for disregarding U. S. policy directives never publicly repudiated by any authorized agency of the U. S. Government.

The principle which General Clay enunciated through his mouthpiece, Bronson, in March, 1948, was that German heavy industry was not a proper subject of deconcentration action and that he alone would be the arbiter as to what constituted an excessive concentration of economic power . . .

General Clay's Earlier Record

Clay's desertion of decartelization constitutes a complete "flip-flop" on his part since, in the beginning of his tenure as Military Governor he was a strong advocate of small business. He welcomed the decartelization program as a contribution to the democratization program of the American occupation and gave it his unstinted support.

For example, in a memorandum dated October 10, 1946, he informed William Draper: "I am convinced that the re-creation of small businesses in Germany will do more to revive the economy and to provide for a more satisfied population than the re-growth of cartels which, in many instances, with government support were able to dictate their own terms to their customers."

Clay approved a memorandum prepared by James S. Martin outlining the scope of decartelization in October, 1946, and certainly by no stretch of the imagination could Clay be accused of "ruthless deconcentration." Further, Clay fully backed Martin's effort to obtain a four-power deconcentration law with "mandatory" provisions knowing full well that the British opposed these provisions.

The opponents of decartelization in Military Government, Draper, Wilkinson, Spencer and others, never lost an opportunity, notwithstanding Clay's firm stand, to make underhanded attacks on the program to visiting editors and newspapermen. These tactics became so scandalous that Clay was obliged to intervene.

Then Clay reaffirmed his faith in decartelization and ordered Draper to toe the line or else. In view of Clay's subsequent conversion to the line of Dillon, Read & Co., it is worthwhile quoting this section of the memorandum: "It seems to me that a lukewarm attitude towards decartelization is certain to develop if we begin to preach that decartelization will stifle German economy. As you know, many sincere people believe that the foundation of free enterprise in America rests in small business, particularly where ownership and management are combined to work closely with employees. While I am not attempting to carry a brief for small business against big business in the U. S., I am certain that the revival of democracy is dependent on our ability to develop an economy which is not controlled by a handful of banks and holding companies."

In the fall of 1945 Clay showed a remarkable grasp of the real nature and intent of our economic policy toward Germany. During that period Clay supported the draft law of the Division of Cartels and External Assets.

Thus Clay's stand was a clear one. In those days in Military Government circles Clay was considered a friend of decartelization, and the Draper crowd, while not relaxing their efforts in opposing Martin, nevertheless were afraid to incur Clay's wrath. At this stage the opposition, so to speak, went "underground."

However, the anti-decartelization sniping continued. A group of businessmen reporting in May, 1947, on their impressions after visiting Germany, affirmed their belief that decartelization was injurious to German industrial recovery and addressed a request to Clay to postpone the entire decartelization program for the present.

In view of these facts the question arises, therefore, when did the Dillon, Read & Co. virus enter General Clay's body?

How did General Clay dissolve the large coal and steel enterprises? Did he break up hundreds of cartels? Did he carry the decentralization of the German industry "to the right point" as he claims in his book?

Clay's Change of Heart

After the Congressional elections of 1948 the spokesmen of big business on the staff of Military Government were openly jubilant and were predicting that this meant the end of decartelization.

General Clay, in a conversation with James Stewart Martin, informed him that the results of the November elections in the United States would mean increasing difficulties for the Decartelization Branch. The tendency in the future, Clay told Martin, would be away from deconcentration. Clay, too, was now getting lukewarm towards decartelization.

After more than a year of drafting, Law 56 was signed by Clay on February 24, 1947. However, it remained a paper document without a program of implementation. Martin experienced increasing difficulty in obtaining approval for his policies. In July, 1947, feeling that his efforts were completely stymied by the Draper crowd which ran the Economics Division, James Stewart Martin resigned and went home. With Martin out of the way no serious opposition existed to those who were determined that the program of the Decartelization Branch would not be implemented.

It was not possible, of course, for the decartelization program of Military Government to die by a kind of statute of limitation. Some new approach to decartelization would have to be found which would give the program a slow, but certain death.

The policy designed to strangle decartelization was evolved by Clay in consultation with Hawkins, Wilkinson and Bronson in a series of behind the scenes conferences. By March, 1948, this new policy was fully expounded by Clay and imparted to his lieutenants for formal presentation.

The basic tenet of Clay's new policy as expounded by Hawkins and Bronson was that henceforth decartelization was to be guided by the "rule of reason." This rule of reason was to be used in determining whether an enterprise was subject to deconcentration. The rule of reason, in turn, was based on the proposition that no action must be taken against any German company if that action injured Germany's chances to compete on the world market.

In practice, this meant that Germany's heavy industry, the big combines which financed Hitler's war and provided it with industrial sinews, could not be deconcentrated since, obviously, it would be these very industries which would have to compete on the world markets.

At a conference with Hawkins, Bronson, and Wilkinson, Clay further elaborated his "rule of reason" policy. He ordered that all enterprises previously on the decartelization list of firms subject to deconcentration in accordance with Law 56, must now be re-examined to determine whether they were producers of heavy equipment or consumers' goods. Clay further stated that vertical monopolies would not be subject to deconcentration and that companies with subsidiaries from the raw materials stage to the final product could not be deprived of control over these accessory facilities insofar as no effort was made to "influence" other branches of production. In effect, this meant that the basic industries of Germany, its big steel and iron combines, its heavy machinery producers, its colossal and cartelized chemical industries could not be deconcentrated since they would all represent cases of vertical monopolies which Clay now excluded from decartelization action.

In the words of the memorandum submitted to Clay by 19 members of the Decartelization Branch, before their resignation, this new policy "excluded from decartelization action the principal group of monopolistic enterprises which the Law says must be eliminated."

The Henschel Combine

Of course, General Clay understood fully that his edict meant the death of the decartelization program. He immediately ordered cessation of all action against the great Henschel combine which provided Hitler with tanks and airplane engines and which now remained as the sole producer of locomotives in Germany. Henschel could not be deconcentrated because its only customer was the German railroads.

That was the official reason given by General Clay on March 23, 1948, when he appeared before the decartelization staff and ordered them not to proceed against the Henschel combine. The same thing happened to V. K. F. Were they proper subjects for deconcentration?

We will let the reader judge for himself by giving a few pertinent facts about these two companies. The Henschel combine is a holding and operating company with headquarters in Kassel, U. S. zone, and is controlled by the Henschel family. It has participation in about 20 German companies, some of which have participation in other companies. It owns and operates three main factories located in Kassel which are adapted to the production and repair of locomotives, trolley busses, trucks and other types of machinery and equipment. By reason of its ownership of these factories, Henschel now possesses between 70 and 80% of Germany's locomotive production facilities and between 90 and 95% of Germany's trolley bus manufacturing capacity. Moreover it holds commanding positions in several other fields of production.

The Kassel plant, producing standard locomotives, has a normal capacity of better than one new locomotive a day. Through the use of that factory Henschel became the dominant manufacturer of locomotives in Europe. Normally Henschel sold between 30 and 40% of its locomotives abroad.

There is another factory known as the "Mittelfeld Plant." This factory had never produced a single locomotive prior to 1948. It was built during World War II as a tank factory and produced the famous "Tiger" tanks up to the end of the war. But it was designed to easy conversion to locomotive production. It has a potential capacity of about two new locomotives a day.

There is also a third factory which was used primarily for the manufacture of boilers and locomotives.

The revised draft of the "determination and directive" in the Henschel case which was originally submitted by the decartelization staff to Mr. Bronson near the end of 1947 provided in part that Henschel should effect the complete and perpetual severance of any and all ties of ownership, control and management between it and two of the three factories mentioned above. Since the draft was prepared, opposition started immediately to emasculate the directive. Apparently the opposition was successful and General Clay took it upon himself to scuttle the work done by his own Decartelization Branch.

United Ball Bearing Works

In a similar manner, General Clay ordered the cessation of deconcentration procedure against the United Ball Bearing Works (VKF) ostensibly because it was the property of a neutral country. Beginning about 20 years ago it started a campaign of monopolization and acquired all of its German competitors, especially Kugelfischer. It had declared a price war on Kugelfischer and was employing the same tactics it had used in the acquisition of other competitors when Germany began her preparation for World War II. As a result of that, VKF and Kugelfischer entered into cartel agreements and Kugelfischer was allowed to live and operate independently.

Under the reparations program all of the machinery was removed from the Kugelfischer plant while VKF plants remained untouched and the company was actually allowed to keep approximately 2,000 machines idle in storage. The net result was that VKF was left to occupy a monopoly position in the anti-friction bearing industry of Germany.

In order to facilitate the final emasculation of the directive against VKF, Bronson and Wilkinson decided to make available the idle machines of VKF to Kugelfischer, thus giving the appearance that VKF had a competitor! The final coup de grace to the decartelization of the ball bearing monopoly was given by Clay when he stated that VKF was not a monopoly since Kugelfischer was operating again.

Who Is Going to Scream?

Having completed his somersault from an advocate of small business and democracy to a protagonist of big business and a strong Germany, General Clay, although a valiant soldier, thought it the better part of wisdom to hide behind the mask of anonymity. He preferred to let his lieutenants carry the onus of authorship and refused to affix his signature to the memorandum which Hawkins prepared outlining Clay's application of the "rule of reason" policy. He was aware, he stated, that his new policy would be disturbing to members of the staff of decartelization with a strong anti-trust background.

Clay's reversal of policy was so drastic and so limited in the scope of future decartelization activity, that even Hawkins and Bronson could not help but point out to Clay that the new yardstick was too "indefinite" for the Branch to come up with an "intelligent" answer on what they were now supposed to do.

Clay offered his harrassed aides no solace for their confusion. He refused to commit himself as to what the future activity of the Branch would be.

Instead, he offered this revealing comment: "He fully realized that when this program was made public that there would be a scream to high heavens from the strong anti-trust group, but that there had been similar screams before as exemplified by the soundings-off of Martin back in the United States, but that the screams had come and gone and that probably there would not be much more major interest to create a serious scream."

His volte-face completed, his own "screams" buried in political expediency, the man who so determinedly vowed to carry out the U. S. objectives on reconstructing Germany into a democratic society based on free enterprise now exposed himself as a ruthless exponent of cartels and monopolies.

How do General Clay's assertions about the "screams" of the anti-trust crowd stack up against his assertion in his book that "there has never been before such a like effort to reduce concentration of economic power...?"

I. G. Farben

In his book General Clay informed the American people that the great I. G. Farben chemical trust had been dissolved and that the steel combines of the Ruhr were already or in process of being dissolved into a large number of small companies. These two claims need closer examination, for nothing is further from the truth.

The infamous I. G. Farben chemical combine which used live human beings for experimental purposes, which sparked the entire war effort of the Nazis and which spread its sinister cartel tentacles throughout the entire world is today still the great chemical trust, remaining essentially intact and producing at a rate greater than that prior to the war.

The man appointed to carry out this ambitious and far-reaching program was none other than Richardson Bronson, appointed by Hawkins to the position of I. G. Farben Control Officer during the period the latter occupied the position of Chief of the Decartelization Branch.

As I. G. Farben Control Officer, Bronson achieved two things: he set up a system of German Trustees for each of the "independent" units and secondly, at an expense of 300,000 marks, he reconstructed a bombed out house belonging formerly to an I. G. Farben director, for his own personal use in the city of Frankfurt.

The plan for breaking up Farben looked good on paper. Pending ultimate sale of the "independent" units,

"HAVEN'T I SEEN YOU BEFORE?"

(By Vicky—Courtesy Daily News Chronicle, London) they would continue to produce for the peacetime economy of Germany. The flaw in the whole picture, however, was that the "independent" units were not really independent. They were a legal concept but nothing else. Moreover, notwithstanding that leading directors of Farben such as Herman Schmitz and Max Ilgner were under arrest as war criminals, the affairs of Farben were administered by a liaison committee which provided a common direction and a common policy for Farben as a whole. In very many cases the Trustees selected were administrators or technicians who themselves were formerly connected with the firm and slavishly devoted to restoring I. G. Farben to its former position.

On April 30, 1949, the Ferguson Committee reported that: "The U. S. occupation officials have failed to smash a single one of German's giant monopolies under a crackdown now two years old." (New York Times, April 30, 1949.) On that very day, April 30, 1949, General Clay was quoted in the official army newspaper, Stars and Stripes, as saying: "Germany's largest industrial combine, the I. G. Farben enterprise, has been broken into several units, of which there are 50 in the U. S. zone alone."

Appearing before the Ferguson Commitee, General Clay stated: "The I. G. Farben as such no longer exists." (Page 24, Ferguson Report.)

Yet, on June 1, 1949, one month after the publication of the Ferguson Report, an Associated Press dispatch from Frankfurt, Germany, stated: "The major step toward breaking up the I. G. Farben chemical empire will be taken soon by offering one of its units for sale."

Recent reports from Germany indicate that not one of the units has been sold to the public although the intention to do so was publicized in the German press as far back as 1946.

Thus, I. G. continues to function under common direction as a series of "independent" units. Having suffered very little bombing damage, the Farben combine continues to remain a dangerous war potential aggregate. On General Clay's own admission, "some of these units are PRODUCING MORE THAN EVER BEFORE IN THEIR HISTORY, despite current adverse conditions." (Our emphasis.)

The recent decision of the Allied High Commission to restore the chemical industries to German control highlights the danger of a reconstructed Farben. Former Nazis are being appointed to high positions in the combine, while Farben's international cartel activities have already been re-established and are increasing. Although Law No. 9 is still on the books, correspondents report that the intention to sell Farben units to the general public is as "dead as a doornail."

In the face of these developments how can General Clay make the positive assertions, as he does in his book, that I. G. Farben is dissolved?

The Record Is Clear

Clay's role in restoring the power of the steel and coal barons of the Ruhr is particularly pertinent in view of the current plans to merge the French and German steel industries.

The British, in whose zone the major steel and coal companies were located, originally prepared a plan for deconcentrating these companies in an indefinite number of smaller corporations. The exact number was not predetermined. Had this plan been carried out, Germany's capacity for satisfying the domestic market would not have been impaired. When the British plan became known, General Clay "was quite horrified." In his opinion, if the British plan was to be carried out, "we would create a steel industry in Germany which could not possibly compete with the remaining industries of Europe." Clay cautioned his economic advisers to keep a close watch on British activities with regard to steel and had to bide his time until the two zones were merged.

Discussing the steel situation with the 19 members of the Decartelization Branch who questioned the wisdom of reversing U. S. policy on decartelization, Clay told them bluntly: "A great many people believe in small business but it doesn't happen to be that that is a policy of our government . . . I would never go along with the idea of breaking up the steel companies into lots of companies . . ."

After the merging of the American and British zones into a bizonal administration, General Clay was able to force the British to abandon their plans for deconcentrating the Ruhr industries. Under Clay's guidance an innocuous Law 75 on deconcentrating steel was approved, which affected mostly the peripheral subsidiaries of the big companies and problems of compensation for owners, but left the big combines intact. The only thing the British won out of the deal was that the question of future nationalization of the Ruhr industries was left open to be decided on at a future time by the Germans themselves.

The abandonment of their control plans for the Ruhr was the price the British had to pay for continued Marshall Plan aid. The British plan for the level of steel production and the organization of the steel companies would not have interfered with German industrial recovery. It would have made it impossible for the German Ruhr magnates to again become a threat to Germany's neighbors or to dominate the European economy. Clay's stand that Germany must be able to "compete" on world markets meant simply that the German steel industry would have to be built up as a major force in the European economy.

General Clay informed the American people in his book that the Ruhr steel combines had been broken up, notwithstanding the fact that he himself had blocked the carrying out of this very objective.

Summing up, the record of achievement in decartelization as presented by Clay is at complete variance with the facts. It is, in reality, the record of an able administrator who started off to carry out, diligently, the objectives and policies of his government, but who rapidly resorted to political expediency under big business pressure, and who, once turning his back on his original mission, left no stone unturned to undo that which he started to build.

Under his aegis as Military Govnor, the great German steel, iron, chemical and heavy equipment industries became power weapons in the Bonn Government's struggle for economic domination over Europe. It is General Clay who must carry the major responsibility for the U. S.'s failure to carry out our mission in Germany in one of its most important aspects—the deconcentration and decartelization of German heavy industry.

General Clay's record on decartelization naturally found favor with Dillon, Read and Co., which now can resume its past policy of expanding the German steel companies. General Clay's "achievements" have been duly recognized since his retirement from Military Government. Besides his directorship in the Marine Midland Bank and Continental Can, the General was recently elected to the Board of General Motors, which has a long record of tieups with German industry.

A Letter to the President of the United States By the Belgian Resistance Movement

(We received from Belgium a copy of a letter recently sent to President Truman by eight Belgian Resistance organizations which heroically fought the German occupation. This message clearly shows that patriotic groups in the allied countries are alarmed over policies which, in effect, ignore the past record of the Germans and grant unwarranted leniency to German war criminals. In order that our readers may be kept informed as to such grass-roots sentiments prevailing in Western Europe, we reprint below the text of this letter.)

Antwerp, April 16, 1951

To His Excellency,
Mr. Harry Truman,
President of the United States of America

This message is directed to you by the United Resistance Movements of the Province of Antwerp, including:

the National Conferedation of Political Prisoners,
the General Sabotage-group G,
the Belgian Army of Partisans,
the Secret Army,
the Independence Front,
the Patriotic Militia,
the Union of the Intelligence and Action Services,
the White Brigade Fidelio,
all of them officially recognized by the Belgian Government, and honoured with the greatest praise by General Eisenhower in his well-known message at the liberation of Europe.

The United Resistance Movements want to express their profound disillusionment, their anxiety and their disapprobation concerning the policy which is conducted by the representatives of the United States with regard to the German criminals of war and the still prevailing national-socialist tendency.

After the Allies had proclaimed to the world that fascism would be extirpated root and branch, and after they had shown in a series of notorious trials how the crimes against humanity were punished, the United States are now retracing their steps and they are alarming the victims of the last world war by an attitude which has been altered totally.

The ever growing concessions in every sphere towards Germany, culminating in the reprieve, nay, the release of the numberless hangmen of a Europe crushed and struggling to the death, and the recent declaration of General Eisenhower according to whom the crimes of a few do not injure the honour of the German army, rouse the defenders of the Free Democracy to the sense that the realities of the past have been forsaken.

For those who have gone through war under the knout of the most atrocious of all oppressors, for these who have been the witnesses and the victims, during five long years, in their own country and in the concentration camps, of the oppression, the terror, the violence, the corruption, the torture and the murdering of countless millions of people, for those it is totally out of the question to consider either the German people which in its greater majority together with its leaders has watched and supported with satisfaction and pride the unworthy actions of its government, or the German army which as a whole has brought this policy to an end, as an honourable people and an honourable army, to which they ever could reach their hands during this generation.

Nothing shows them that the German people or the German soldier and the traitors who in the various countries of Europe have been at Germany's side, have come to the understanding of their mischief and to better opinions and intentions. That is why those who through their attitude and their action have resisted the oppressor, although they are not less humane and forgiving than the others, consider it to be an unpardonable failing against humanity of their own or other friendly governments, to grant a free place and consideration to those whose crimes are graver beyond compare than those of ordinary malefactors whom everybody would shun.

The United States to which went our confidence, our admiration and our gratitude in those hours of distress, should know that nobody can sue for the friendship of Germany and its accomplices without losing ours; they will understand this when they remember the documentation which they possess about the German atrocities in Europe and of which the marks have been burnt in our flesh and minds, never to be effaced.

They hope that you will be fully alive to the concern which is in their minds and that you will help preventing that the old and well-tried ties of friendship and love should be broken for the sake of misunderstood unity, and they present you, Excellency, the expression of their profound respect.

Which Is the Truth?

"'. . . I realize,' McCloy continued, 'that a lot of people claim we are relinquishing too much power to the Germans but whom are we relinquishing it to?—to the men who have spent their lives in jail or in exile because they dared to oppose Hitler—to the men who have their roots deep in the principles of the Weimar Republic. We are not relinquishing any Allied powers to the Nazis. Of course, you may read in your paper about some dogcatcher or minor official who is a former Nazi, but you won't find any former Nazis at the top. . . .' "

(Drew Pearson's Washington Merry-Go-Round, March 22, 1951)

"... Critics of the denazification program also point to the presence of former Nazis in important positions and in the public service generally. It is true that there are many former Nazis in public positions. Many are school teachers, mail carriers, policemen. Some few occupy higher positions, even in the state and Federal governments. Many business men holding important posts were once members of the Nazi party. Millions of former Nazis are re-employed, most of them in their former vocations . . ."

"After detailed study of this case, I could not convince myself that Alfred Krupp deserved the sentence imposed upon him. There was certainly a reasonable doubt that he was responsible for the policies of the Krupp Company, in which he in fact occupied a somewhat junior position. It was also very doubtful that he had any responsibility for the use of slave labor in the Krupp plant."

(From a letter from U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy to Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, published in the May 1951 issue Information Bulletin)

"Western Germany has refused to submit a proposal for allocating Ruhr coal exports among the receiving countries for the third quarter of 1951.

"Normally the proposed German allocations would be received by the Coal Committee of the Economic Commission for Europe through the Allied authorities in Germany. "As the tribunal of able career judges from the appellate benches of Connecticut, Tennessee, and Washington found, Krupp cooperated with the Nazi government's slave-labor policies, not reluctantly or under duress, but willingly.

"... In fact, abuse of slave labor was no mere 'consenting part.' Krupp, like I. G. Farben, undertook the construction of a plant near the Auschwitz concentration camp, with the avowed expectation of using the inmates as a labor supply. And in June, 1944, at a meeting attended by Alfred Krupp, it was decided to explore the possibilities of employing 'prisoners and convicts' at Krupp's Geisenheim plant. 'Negotiations' to this end were carried on with the concentration camp near Geisenheim."

Neo-Nazism in Germany Today

by

ERNEST LEISER
(Correspondent for the Overseas News Agency)

It is more than two years now since Gen. Lucius D. Clay, then the United States Military Governor, made the emphatic public declaration that "nazism is completely dead" in West Germany.

If Gen. Clay was right, there are nearly a half million ghosts in the West German state of Lower Saxony alone. And they all trooped into the Lower Saxony polling-places the first Sunday of this month to cast their votes for the Socialist Reich party or the other, lesser splinter groups which had pridefully announced they were the inheritors of the National Socialist mantle.

For the past year, in their preoccupation with integrating West Germany into the Western European community, the Allied authorities have tended to overlook or to minimize indication of a neo-Nazi growth. Today, they have had those signs called forcefully to their attention. More than 14 per cent of the valid votes for the Lower Saxony legislature were cast for the Nazi "radical right." And the results have alarmed the Allies profoundly. British and French officials, especially, have asked this correspondent whether in his view it is safe, under the circumstances, to proceed to turn back full sovereignty to the Federal Republic here in Bonn.

Four factors have heightened that alarm:

(1) The democratic political parties took official notice of the nature of the Socialist Reich party and the lesser Nazi groups and warned the voters what they would be doing if they gave them their mandates. They warned, especially, what the effects on public opinion outside Germany would be if the neo-Nazis made a strong showing.

(2) The SRP and related parties themselves made no secret of their nostalgic admiration for Nazi ideology. Their spokesmen have denounced "our degenerate democracy" and have bluntly said "we want to restore the many good programs of National Socialism." They echoed all the slogans of nazism, they used almost the same symbols—the black eagle on the red-and-white ground with only the swastika missing—and their thugs used the same tactics of intimidation on their opponents during the campaign. Those who voted for them could hardly not have known what they were doing.

(3) The neo-Nazi groups were able to make their strong showing despite the fact that they were quarreling bitterly among themselves and jockeying for position. The Socialist Reich party won the lion's share of the "radical right" votes—nearly 367,000—but the German Reich party also got 74,000 votes and even the other insignificant Nazi splinters were able to attract some voters.

(4) The neo-Nazi groups were able to make their showing although their leaders were only second-rate demogogues. The bosses of the SRP—men like Otto Remer, the tough and unprepossessing Nazi who was made a major general by Hitler for blocking the July 20, 1944, plot against the Fuehrer's life, Fritz Dorls and Count von Westarp—do not even have the twisted brilliance which their Nazi predecessors like Goebbels, Goering and Hitler possessed. Remer, Dorls and Westarp are obvious smalltimers; yet just by waving the Nazi banners they were able to get into the big time.

In addition, the Allies are disturbed because there is strong evidence that the SRP bosses received clandestine support from the Communists (who were only able to pull down 1.8 per cent of the vote) and because they outdid even the Communists in their violent anti-Allied defamations (Dorls, for example, screamed at one meeting that a Socialist state official was a "pimp for the American terror regime in Germany.")

The leaders of the major democratic parties in West Germany are themselves alarmed. After a long period of hesitation, just before election day, the Federal Republic's Minister of the Interior, Robert Lehr, outlawed the SRP's strong-arm "Reichsfront." After the results were in, he expressed even greater perturbation and said the Government would act to declare the party itself unconstitutional as contrary to the democratic order.

His post-election perturbation was especially easy to understand. His own Christian Democratic Party was the one from which the SRP was able to win most of its votes.

But all the democratic party leaders are worried. They admit that the Lower Saxony election demonstrated statistically what has long been evident: that the democratic parties have not been able to win the allegience of a very substantial part of the German electorate.

They have sought some consolation by pointing out that, strong as its showing, the SRP emerged only in fourth place in the party standing and that it certainly will not be able to influence, much less dominate, major legislative decisions.

However, those who are not so easily consoled point out that the SRP is in a considerably stronger position than were the Nazis in the early days. These observers are not worried about the present. They have an eye to the future.

They are also concerned about the possible future development of a political group which no one has yet labeled neo-Nazi but which may very well demonstrate authoritarian tendencies in the future. That is the Union of the Homeless—the party of the 9,000,000 Germans who were kicked out of East Germany and East Europe when the Russians came in.

In Lower Saxony, this group nosed out the SRP for third place in the party standings. In the recent elections throughout the United States zone and, only a few weeks ago, in the French-zone Rhenish Palatinate, the refugee party showed similar strength drawn, like that of the SRP, from the middle-of-the-road parties.

What would happen, a number of Allied officials ask today, if—as is perfectly possible—there should be a combination between the neo-Nazi groups and the refugees, who represent the most underprivileged and discontented sector of the population? Would democracy in Germany be able to survive their onslaught, especially if there were an economic turn for the worse?

A great many Allied statesmen here would hesitate to answer that question in the affirmative.

"Every seventh member of the new state legislature in Lower Saxony," the editor of one of the leading conservative newspapers in West Germany has just written ruefully, "has dedicated himself to the resurrection of nazism."

It is shocking, the editor goes on to say, that so soon after Germany's inheritance of Hitler's legacy—"the endless rows of graves, the smoking ruins of our cities, the hatred of all the world"—more than 14 per cent of the electorate in the state of Lower Saxony should vote for men "who seek to march in Hitler's spirit."

What will the outside world think of us? he asks. How can nearly half a million people have forgotten so soon the atrocities of Auschwitz? How can they vote for the men who would seek to reimpose the system which made Auschitz possible?

Having thus bitterly assailed the strong showing made by the Socialist Reich party at the election in Lower Saxony this month, the editor proceeds to find some consolation in the situation. . . .

Lower Saxony, he says, is an isolated case. The growth of neo-nazism there does not reflect a similar growth in the other ten states of the West German Republic.

Officials of the three Western Allied powers, while sharing this editor's deep concern at the Saxony election results, declare today that they can not find the same consolation he has been able to. Lower Saxony may present an especially conspicuous case: it is not an isolated case. It is not only in this one state that neo-Nazi ideology has taken hold.

It is quite true that Lower Saxony is the only state, to date, in which a party which openly and proudly avowed its allegiance to Nazi ideas has been able to win strong representation in a legislature. However, Allied officials note, there are neo-Nazi groups of some kind operating in every state of the Federal Republic. To list just a few:

1. The League for German Revival, a half-clandestine organization headed in exile by Otto Strasser, one of Hitler's early henchmen, which calls for "national socialization," the elimination of the present "superfluous" political parties, and the like.

2. The First Legion, which avowedly aims to "do away with the old-fashioned 19th-century forms of parliamentary democracy" and "eliminate corrupt party politics," substituting the rule of an elite.

3. The Reichsjugend, a youth organization nicknamed the Hedler Youth after its organizer, Wolfgang Hedler, leading figure in the neo-Nazi German Reich party. It is a uniformed organization which has recruited young people principally in the state of Schleswig-Holstein and uses as its symbol the "Wolfsangel," closely resembling the Nazi swastika.

4. The Fatherland Union, a political group in Bavaria, whose leader, August Hausleiter, was jailed for his anti-democratic public speeches.

5. The Stahlhelm and the Bruderschaft, two groups drawing principally on former militarists. Both now operate on two levels—the open political and the clandestine—and leaders of both have expressed contempt for the infant democracy of West Germany.

The recital of all the neo-Nazi organizations would be a long one. It is only fair to point out that, to date, none has been able to attract a large membership. However, it must be also pointed out that most of them operate throughout all West Germany. Their activities—though less flamboyantly successful than those of the Socialist Reich party—penetrate into every single West German state, and are not limited to Lower Saxony.

It should be noted, too, that Lower Saxony is far from the worst of the West German states in the number of former Nazis holding top governmental office. Claimant for this doubtful honor is Lower Saxony's neighbor to the north, Schleswig-Holstein. There almost every single member of the Cabinet—including the Minister President or chief executive—was a Nazi. Two were officers in the ill-famed SS.

Finally, United States officials in the office of John J. McCloy, United States High Commissioner, have noted an even more disturbing set of facts. In basic political attitudes, their research has discovered, a very substantial part of the German population is easily vulnerable to the ideology with which the Socialist Reich party made its first bid to prominence in Lower Saxony.

Only about 30 per cent of the West German people think Nazism was altogether a bad idea. Thirty-four per cent still believe in "Aryan" race superiority. Only about half have confidence that the Germans are capable of governing themselves democratically. Six out of ten would be willing to sacrifice their civil liberties for economic security.

It is a knowledge of these facts which makes it difficult for the Western Allied authorities to find the consolations which the eminent German editor did. Almost none would say, as do the extremists, that Germany has been "renazified." But many have been deeply disturbed by the results of the Lower Saxony election, not only for themselves but as a symptom of present attitudes and a portent for the future.

APING THE FUEHRER

"Jakob Kaiser, West German Minister for All-German Affairs, asserted flatly today that 'the Saar is German.'

". . . They are the same words used as a slogan by Nazi Germany during the agitation before the Saar plebiscite of 1935. They are the words of one of the nationalistic songs of prewar Germany. . . ."

(From a Frankfort dispatch to "The New York Times.")

"A Congressional investigator said today that West German companies, some of which receive Marshall Plan aid, have made an 'alarming' increase in shipments of strategic materials to Communist China since the Korean war began. . . ."

PLAYING THE CARTEL GAME

From Business Week:

"West German labor unions have won their battle for 'codetermination'—an equal voice with management—in the Ruhr coal and steel industries.

"Chancellor Adenauer gave in to union demands rather than face a disastrous strike. But Adenauer managed to get these concessions from union leader Hans Boeckler:

"(1) Labor won't push its 50-50 policy in other German industries—except chemicals.

"(2) Labor will support management and the government against Allied plans for decartelization of the coal, steel, and chemical industries..."

GERMAN CHESTNUTS IN THE FIRE

Dispatch from Frankfort to The New York Times:

"The West German Government has claimed its right to the frontiers existing before Dec. 31, 1937...

"Specifically, the Federal Government claims East Prussia, half of which is now part of the Soviet Union; the Oder-Neisse territories in Poland; the Soviet zone in East Germany, now the German Democratic Republic; the Saar, at present considered an economic appendix of France, and the small border rectifications of the Western frontier in favor of Belgium and the Netherlands..."

MR. McCLOY'S COMMUTATIONS BACKFIRE

From Ernest Leiser to the ONA:

"'The Germans will not really rest quiet until every man is released from Landsberg and his "honor vindicated,"' a spokesman for Mr. McCloy commented bitterly the other day. 'Only a few Germans are still prepared to accept the facts that there were such things as atrocities committed by the Nazi hierarchy'...

"There could hardly be more cynicism attached to any political question today than there is to the whole business of war-crimes trials by the West Germans. Speak to any German privately—be he politician or man-on-the-street—and he will evince no gratitude at the clemency shown the war criminals. He will rather say, 'Those judgments were imposed simply because you beat us. You're reversing them now simply because you need us.'..."

"West Germans hope the western nations soon will allow their country to run its own air lines and build its own aircraft.

"Demands for independent West German air traffic are being backed by the Bonn government. Transport Minister Hans Seebohm has said German 'air sovereignty' should be recognized again because restriction of it makes a genuine partnership with the western nations 'impossible.'..."

A GERMAN DIKTAT

From Larry Rue to The Chicago Tribune:

"'We are willing at any time to put our entire industrial capacity and strength at the disposal of the western defense,' said a German official. 'But before we can do this, two conditions will have to be met by the allies—the lifting of all industrial and economic restrictions and prohibitions, and the supplying of copper, nickel, cotton, rubber and other raw materials.'"

From the J. T. A. News:

"Dr. Wilhelm Hoegner, Bavarian Minister of the Interior, announced that activities by the 'Nationale Sammelbewegung Deutschlands'—the 'National Unification Movement'—headed by Erwin Boerner, would be banned in Bavaria. Boerner recently founded his organization in Stuttgart and Munich and proclaimed a 16-point program calling for a return to a national dictatorship 'for the national renaissance of Greater Germany.' He denounced the present German government as traitors who are preventing the national awakening of Germany."

MEMO TO TAXPAYERS

From a Dortmund, Germany, dispatch to The Chicago Daily Tribune:

"American funds started construction today of a big new German rolling mill that will help the Ruhr produce more steel.

"The mill at Dortmund's Hoerde steel works is the biggest project to date in the new economic cooperation administration (ECA) program to rehabilitate the German steel industry. Only a few months ago the occupation was dismantling German factories...."

A "NEW" FACE AT BONN

From a Bonn dispatch to The New York Post:

"Former Gen. Werner Kreipe, once chief of staff in Hitler's air force and holder of one of the highest Nazi party awards, has been appointed an advisor on civil aviation in the West German traffic ministry.

"His task is to plan the training of civil aviators in preparation for the day when the Allied ban on German flying is lifted. He had a similar job in Goering's air ministry.

"Kreipe was given the Nazi 'blood award' with other officers in the Munich War College for their help during Hitler's 'beer hall putsch' in Munich in 1923...."

MAKING IT OFFICIAL

From a dispatch to the New York Post:

"Western Germany has hired a Washington attorney to make a last minute bid to save the lives of Oswald Pohl and six other doomed Nazi war criminals.

"Attorney Warren Magee admitted today that his fight to save the seven mass murderers of Dachau and Buchenwald from the gallows was being financed by the Bonn government headed by Chancellor Adenauer. Magee declined to state the size of his fee, but reliable sources said that his initial retainer was $10,000. . . ."

INNOCENT DR. SCHACHT

From Samedi Soir:

"Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's rearmament specialist who was tried for war crimes at Nuremberg, told a few selected newspapermen the following:

" 'I regret that between 1933 and 1939, foreign governments did not avail themselves of the opportunity to aid the Hitler opposition. I regret that I, myself, as an economist who had no connections with politics, have not been strong enough to prevent Hitler from carrying out his mad plans. I regret the fact that I have been misled by him to such an extent."

A SIGN OF THE TIMES

From an Associated Press dispatch:

"A West German police official announced recently that British authorities will be asked to prosecute Lord Edward Russell....

"British authorities previously announced that Russell and his wife were assaulted at Vlotho....

"... Russell had reported that he had been punched, and that his wife was scratched on the neck and back by members of an angry crowd who were shouting 'English pigs.' "

CELEBRATION AND COMMENT

From a United Press dispatch:

"Alfred Krupp, whose munitions family supplied the armies of Hitler and the Kaiser, walked out of War Crimes Prison....

"Two hours after his release, Krupp held a press conference in the Landsberg hotel. There he 'cleaned up' and drank champagne with his friends and his brother, Berthold von Bohlen, who had waited at the prison gates with a bouquet of tulips....

"Asked his opinion of Nazism, he said 'if you answered that question adequately, you would have to write a book about it and I do not propose to do this.' . . ."

FAMOUS LAST WORDS

From The Washington Evening Star:

"Senator McCarthy, Republican, of Wisconsin, whose charges of Army brutality against the Malmedy defendants prompted a Senate investigation, said yesterday the commutation of death sentences given Germans in the case was 'extremely wise.' "

FOR SERVICES RENDERED

From The London Economist:

"The Federal German Government took an important step last week towards rehabilitating the German professional soldier, both morally and materially. Though the facts that the Republic consists only of a fraction of the former Reich and that its financial position is weak do not justify generosity, the Bundestag has approved second reading of a Bill to pay full pensions to all former regular soldiers and members of the Reich Labor Service. Promotions for bravery are to be recognized and non-commissioned officers with long service are to receive special aid. The Chancellor himself declared, amid continuous applause, that the Allied laws had quite unjustly made professional soldiers 'partially responsible for the lost war,' although they had merely done their duty to the state. The Government, he said, would never support the real war criminals; but the percentage of such guilty men was so 'extraordinarily small' that it did not destroy the honor of the former Wehrmacht...."

FREEDOM VERBOTEN

From Russell Hill to The New York Herald Tribune:

"A Communist court in Potsdam has ruled in two recent cases that it is a crime to write the word 'freedom' in a public place.

"Two eighteen-year-old youths, Winfried Michaelis and Hans-Joachim Lewner, were convicted of having conspired to paint the word 'freedom' on a bulletin board in their home town...

"... In justifying the sentence to hard labor the court declared: 'The slogan "freedom" is without a doubt a tendencious rumor according to the purpose of its use. The word "freedom" is not of itself to be characterized as a rumor. However, in the present political situation, because of the misuse of this word by the imperialist warmongers, the writing of this word has become equivalent to spreading a rumor which tends to support the war aims of the imperialists and thereby endanger the peace of the German people.' "

A PAGE OUT OF "MEIN KAMPF"

From Herbert Roberts to the ONA:

"Fears are being expressed here that Prime Minister D. F. Malan of South Africa and his Nationalist party backers aim at quitting the British Commonwealth and establishing an Afrikaner dictatorship. . . .

"Already Dr. Malan has made much progress in this aim. A policy of 'selective immigration' has been established. Immigrants from Germany and the Netherlands are sought. German is the permitted language in schools in South-West Africa where many Germans have settled since the war. And less than one-third of last year's migrants were from Britain. . . ."

LOYALTY TEST—SOVIET STYLE

From Edward Crankshaw to The Washington Star:

"One and a half million Germans in the Eastern zone, members of the Moscow Socialist Unity Party, are to be examined individually to establish their loyalty to the Kremlin. . . .

"Past Socialists and Communists arrested by the Nazis are to be interrogated closely to see how they behaved under arrest. . . .

"In striking contrast is the attitude toward past members of the Nazi Party (as revealed by the following comment by the Soviet-sponsored Socialist Unity Party). 'It must be borne in mind that many prisoners of war from the Soviet Union were once members of Nazi organizations—and even occupied leading positions in them. But it must be remembered in each case that since then they have taken an active part in the fight against fascism and have proved their change of heart by attending anti-Fascist schools and engaging in active work.' POINT OF REMINDER

From the Swiss newspaper, Journal de Geneve:

"General Remer who once joined the resistance movement in Germany in order to betray it, is now one of the mainstays of the Socialist Reichs Party. General Remer, who on July 20, 1944 successfully quashed the military revolt against Hitler, is reported to have said publicly, 'When the Russians come we will show them the way to Bonn.' "

MAKING IT COUNT

From Ernest Leiser to the ONA:

". . . The Germans, for example, are "Totoists.' . . . A Totoist is a devotee of the "Football Toto' and the Toto is a complicated lottery based on the results of the major soccer games played weekly in the states of West Germany.

"Something like 300,000,000 tickets on the Toto were bought in thousands of cigar stores and newsstands throughout the 11 West German Laender last year. That makes more than six tickets for each man, woman and babe-in-arms in the Federal German Republic. And the Germans, deluged with the costs of reconstruction of war ruins, occupation expense, the care of nine million refugees from Russian Europe and sundry other items, forked over nearly 1,000,000,000 Deutsche marks—almost $250,000,000—for those tickets. That is more than the money the Allies are levying against West Germany this year for the increase in the German's share of the West's defense burden; and the outcries against the increase have been ear-splitting."

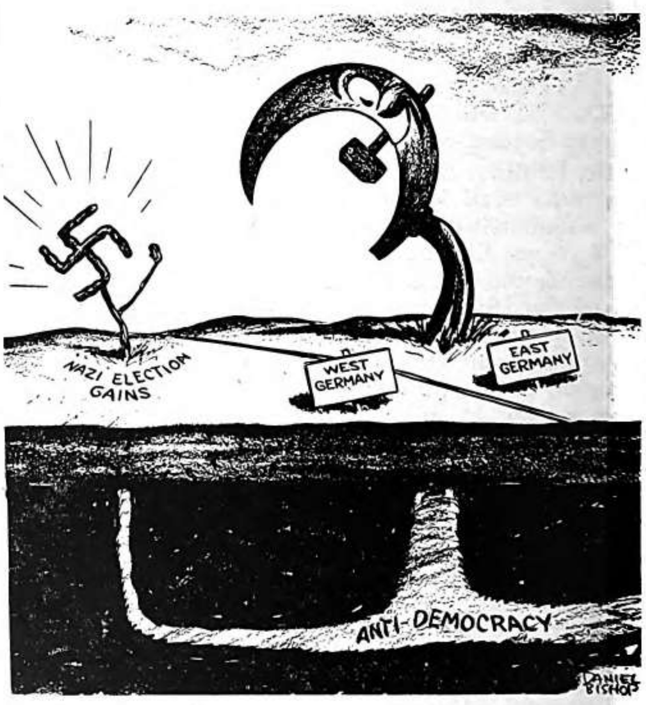
A ROUTINE REQUEST

From the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung:

"The Bonn Government has requested the High Commission authorities to put an end to the liquidation of German assets abroad. Specifically, the German Government is interested in abolishing Control Council Law No. 5 which forbids German representatives abroad from dealing with such matters directly."

SPROUTING IN ANOTHER FORM!



Daniel Bishop in The St. Louis Star-Times

The Case of Alfred Krupp

by

BERNARD B. FALL

(Former Research-Analyst on the U. S. Prosecution Staff of the Nurnberg War Crimes Trials.)

Of all the commutations of sentence against German war criminals that were pronounced by the U. S. High Commissioner in Germany on February 2, 1951, the one restituting Alfred Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach to the ownership of his munitions empire may be considered as one of the most decisive steps of U. S. policy in Europe.

In the High Commissioner's commutation order, Krupp is being erroneously compared to I. G. Farben and Friedrich Flick, the other German firms indicted for war crimes. Both of these are fundamentally different from Krupp's: I. G. Farben is a group of semi-independent corporations working under more or less close relations of cartel agreements; Flick's Mitteldeutsche Stahlwerke were of a much smaller scope than Krupp and their present ownership is purely academical since the bulk of the plants is located in the Russian zone of Germany.

On the contrary, Krupp represents concentrated economic power. The current estimate of his assets as $500,000,000 does not take into account Krupp's far-flung interests reaching from Finnish ore concessions to subsidiaries in Turkey and nickel mines in the Indonesian islands. Conservative Allied estimates place Krupp's total value near the one and a half-billion dollar mark.

Krupp's plants in Western Germany alone are capable of producing anything from battleships to milk cans and from locomotives and heavy tanks to movie cameras.

Furthermore, Krupp is not a corporation. Krupp is one single huge private "family property." By a special Hitler decree of 1943, the "Lex Krupp," the whole Krupp empire was concentrated in Alfred Krupp's hands and thus, Krupp is—for all practical purposes—the biggest single unit of heavy industry known today.

And yet, Krupp is more than just a mere armament plant: it is the very symbol of the old "steel baron" nobility of the brand of a Stinnes, a Mannesmann and a Thyssen, of those men who "made" German governments and openly plotted against the Weimar Republic. The same men that "paid Hitler"....

As Alfred Krupp's father once pointed out in a public speech—and later on in a book written by Nazi industry leaders on behalf of the Nazi Ministry of Armament—the Krupp plants continued to produce and carry on research on prohibited weapons during the whole post-Versailles period, without the help and orders of the Weimar Republic. In Gustav Krupp's own words, Krupp continued to train his staff for war production under the very noses of the Allied "snooping commissions." Krupp operated two dummy corporations engaged in submarine production in the Netherlands and in Finland where his engineers and key workers were sent to acquire training and experience. Krupp's engineers tested their first tank models on the Red Army's proving grounds in Kazan, U. S. S. R., as early as 1927 and continued to do so until Hitler's open violation of the Versailles Treaty permitted them to operate on German soil. The Soviet T-34 medium tank, of World War II fame, is a direct descendant of those tests.

The first Nazi submarines, commissioned hardly weeks after the ratification of the Anglo-German naval treaty of 1935, came from Krupp's Germania shipyards in Kiel. At the Nurnberg trial of Krupp and associates, a U. S. naval expert pointed out that at least three to four years of intensive preliminary research is required to build submarines of an entirely new type, as undoubtedly those were. Krupp was neither "compelled" nor "threatened" by the Weimar Republic to make illegal use of his factories. He did so of his own accord, freely and willingly. So much for the firm's past record.

Nevertheless, the findings of the U. S. High Commissioner were ". . . that confiscation in this case constitutes discrimination against the defendant unjustified by any considerations attaching peculiarly to him . . ."

To this, the record of U. S. War Crimes Tribunal No. 10 states as follows: ". . . Persons who assume . . . to operate a machine or guide the destinies of an enterprise—be it an automobile or . . . a corporation—are under duty so to exercise their power of control . . . that the enterprise under their conduct does not embark upon a criminal course . . ."

It is of public knowledge—and the trial record stands unchallenged—that the Krupp firm had embarked upon such a criminal course of conduct: foreign plants were pilfered and spoliated, slave laborers were beaten, starved and killed.

Although the "general confiscation of property is repugnant to American concepts of justice . . . ," to quote again Mr. McCloy, it is nevertheless an accepted feature of American jurisprudence. Any pernicious use of private property on U. S. territory (slot machines, firearms, etc.) may result in confiscation thereof. Likewise, Krupp misused that enormous empire of his for purposes that are beyond the law, both local and international. So much power in one man's hands is more than mere "private property," it is a public trust—and Alfred Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach proved himself unworthy of it.

Documented examples of Krupp's criminal activities abound. If a man's signature on a document means that he has at least held the piece of paper in his hands, the record of the Krupp trial shows beyond a reasonable doubt that through Krupp's hands passed requests for the looting of machinery from foreign countries, orders for the "integration" of foreign factories into the Krupp Empire, as well as requests for considerable amounts of slave manpower.

To quote but a few examples available in the official records of the Nurnberg War Crimes Tribunal:

1. The official document NIK-11504 reports that Hitler himself was against the allocation of foreign slave labor to Krupp, for fear of espionage, but gave way to Krupp's repeated demands;

2. Alfred Krupp personally inspected the Austin plant in Liancourt, France, in 1943, giving instructions for a "better coordination" with Krupp's interests;

3. It was Alfred Krupp again who signed personally an order allocating 2,000,000 Reichsmarks to begin anti-tank shell fuse production in the infamous Auschwitz death camp, in order to make the utmost of the cheap manpower available there.

Without batting an eyelash, the Krupp works used the poor wretches from the concentration camps for the heaviest jobs that were to be found. The whole town of Essen—Krupp's hometown—saw every day the rag-clad column of five hundred Czech concentration camp inmates, all girls from 15 to 20, march to their assigned place of work at Krupp's: twelve hours without food and without protective clothing in the armor plates rolling mill.

And what, Herr Krupp, happened to those girls? Is it true that, with U. S. paratroopers hammering at Essen's gates, they were hurried away to the extermination camp of Bergen-Belsen and murdered there, so that no tales of this your "private" concentration camp would leak out?

However, two girls survived, some of the female SS guards were found and the most subtle arguments of the defense failed to shake this terrible accusation.

As to Krupp's famed "social welfare" program, it included also the abortion station in Voerde, where foreign female workers were aborted so that they would not divert any of their time from Krupp's armament projects to the care of their newborn babies.

The record contains also terrible testimony against Krupp's private strong-arm squads, the Werkschutz, armed with Krupp-issued rubber truncheons and steel whips (whose chief, Von Buelow, was Krupp's counter-intelligence boss and liaison man with the Gestapo and the Nazi party; Von Buelow is also being released under the High Commissioner's clemency order). Their torture chambers were located in the cellars of the very same Main Administration Building in which Krupp and most of his co-defendants had their offices. Sometimes, the German employees on the first floor complained about the screams and cries that emanated from those cellars, but the directing members of the Krupp firm had their offices on the third floor. . . .

The defense's efforts to clear both the name of Krupp and the defendants themselves were of an eagerness bordering the grotesque: the head of the accounting department could not "remember"—under oath—whether the concentration camp inmates received any wages or not; likewise the personnel manager of the Krupp Bertha works in Silesia had no recollection of the nationality of the more than five thousand concentration camp inmates in his employ.

However, the mainstay of the defense rested upon the now-famous "element of coercion and compulsion." In other words, Krupp and his directors were threatened by the Nazis to spoliate plants (at a profit) and to maltreat and overwork their slave labor, or a fate similar to the one of their own victims awaited them around the corner.

To this, the trial record, quoting a universally accepted American legal authority, states that ". . . the fact that a crime is committed under coercion and compulsion may be set up as a defense . . . but . . . must be well founded and immediate and actual danger of death or great bodily harm must be present . . ."

No such instance of threat of death or mayhem against Krupp and his acolytes has been produced by the defense; better yet, the defense was unable to produce any such deterring examples of any comparative value in the whole Nazi industry.

Still, the human flesh may be weak, and along the probable line of thought of the U. S. Clemency Board which reviewed Krupp's case, he and his directors should be credited with having feared to oppose the Nazi regime.

However, if that was the case, where did Krupp and associates take the courage to jilt the Nazis of 162,000,000 Reichsmarks (about $32,500,000 of 1938) worth of Nazi war bonds which the firm illegally sold and converted into solid property when the heydays of the war were over and the doom of the Third Reich loomed over the horizon?

Of course, the slave laborers were a plentiful commodity—available for the asking—and, in Krupp's eyes, hardly worth risking one's safety for.

Still, it may be that Krupp's crime was just one of negligence, or in the words of Brigadier General Telford Taylor, former U. S. Chief of Counsel for War Crimes: ". . . of supreme indifference to the effect of their actions upon the lives and liberties of thousands . . . ," but that is exactly what brands Alfred Krupp and his staff as unworthy of guiding the destinies of tens of thousands of workers in what is to be a democratic Germany.

The problem is a serious one and requires an amount of political deftness heretofore seldom found in U. S. occupation policy in Germany. The return of Krupp into the Ruhr spells labor trouble in this vital area, and also troubles with the Western European allies of the U. S., since they feel that they have a direct interest in the matter but have been bypassed by the completely unilateral decision of the U. S. High Commissioner.

Reinstating Krupp in the Ruhr is politically as sound as making a major cash contribution to the Soviet propaganda war chest. Western German industrial productivity has made an amazing recovery through the Marshall Plan without the personal help of war criminals like Krupp, et al., and, therefore, stands no appreciable gain at this stage of the game from their reinstatement. The only real beneficiaries from this move would be the Communists on either side of the Iron Curtain who will be able to tell their listeners: ". . . Remember? We told you so . . ."

"Smuggling between East and West Germany has become an estimated billion dollar business.

"Huge quantities of goods flow illegally in both directions across the border between the Russian-occupied east zone and the western republic.

"This trade has been going on ever since the war ended, but 'since last fall it has assumed tremendous proportions,' a high West German customs official said. . . ."

Gleanings From Japan

by
ROBERT P. MARTIN

(The following piece is drawn from a series of reports to the Overseas News Agency by Mr. Martin, an outstanding reporter and expert on Far-Eastern affairs.)

There is a strong possibility the United States has been hypnotized by figures—that Japan has 84 million people who are opposed to communism, that Japan has nearly 5,000,000 veterans of World War II who could fight well, and that each year between 800,000 and 1,000,000 youths become job hunters and, theoretically, available for military service. Translated into military terms, these figures are awesome, and are one of the reasons Japan is highly regarded as an ally of the West.

A number of very wise and experienced Japanese, however, say that the figures can be misleading. . . .

If these Japanese can be believed, a new Japanese army would have substance but little spirit. They also believe that destruction of the "Tenno (emperor) myth" has removed the spiritual center needed for a strong army. . . .

"If a quick rearming of Japan is pushed through," according to a Nichi-Nichi article, "the army will be big but powerless; the nation will be flooded with gawky soldiers in smart-looking uniforms. This will be nothing but a huge waste of our limited national wealth.

"The traditional myth of the 'godly Emperor' and that ours was a 'land of the gods' has been smashed in the minds of the youth. They want freedom and peace now, and believe that money is the way to obtain them." . . .

The fact that there is considerable doubt among the Japanese about the spiritual qualities of a new army suggests that the West should not depend too much on the sheer physical fact that Japan has a population of 84 million people.

Japan prepares for an Allied peace treaty as the nation nears the end of the occupation rule. Final settlement may be reached at year's end but more likely by summer of 1952. A review of the country's position today shows it is better fed, clothed and more prosperous than any of its Asiatic 'conquerors' in World War II. . . .

Widespread building boom in Japanese capital today reflects astonishing degree of postwar recovery. Additionally, the people are better dressed, both men and women. They are fatter, healthier and certainly happier. . . .

Despite outward evidence of prosperity and rising standards of living in Japan, poverty and despair still dominate the lives of millions of inhabitants. Suicides continue at high level, violent crime is on increase, and there is widespread traffic in child slavery. . . .

Japan's slave-trade is by no means as large as it was before the surrender. But in the first half of 1950, 127 "brokers" were arrested and charged with engaging in human traffic. They purchased young boys and girls from poverty-stricken families, primarily in the rural areas, and then sold them in the larger cities.

The girls were sold into bondage as cafe waitresses, house maids and shakufu (sake-serving women). Most of them ended up as prostitutes. Young boys became factory or farm hands.

Most of the children came from exceptionally poor families, although many were orphans, sold by their relatives. Fathers who sold their children were day laborers, farm hands, unemployed workers or miners. They received from 3,000 to 10,000 yen ($8 to nearly $30) from the brokers. The youngsters were forced to work from one to two, and sometimes up to ten years, under the terms of their contract. Few of the children received any wages. . . .

The breadth of Japan's poverty is shown in the massive growth of pawnshops. Private pawnshops totalled 12,500 in 1948, and 16,600 at the end of 1950. The Government has 50 "welfare pawnshops" which charge only 3 per cent interest a month compared to 10 percent charged by private shops. . . .

Six years ago Japan was economically prostrate; today, the nation is producing at 110 per cent of prewar capacity and its people, for example, are best-clothed of all Asians. Unless there is radical change in U. S. policy, the country will be permitted to expand industrially as far and as fast as it desires. . . .

Some degree of a revived "cocky nationalism" is discernible in Japan as the nation sees an Allied peace treaty within sight. While the Shinto religion is no longer State-supported, more people flock to shrines than since war's end, while the Rising Sun emblem is flown from almost every household. How much Western-style democracy and culture will be retained is problematical. . . .

Those convicted of war crimes are being released long before their sentences are completed; many Japanese have been depurged and, once a peace treaty is signed, most if not all "purgees" will be permitted to return to public life if they wish.

It is much too early to say whether Japan has been able to absorb the philosophy and teachings of Western-style democracy. The framework of a democracy has been erected, but whether it will survive and become stronger is entirely in the hands of the Japanese. At this moment in history, one can not even say whether the Japanese people will fight hard to preserve what little they already have in the form of a democratic "way of life."

In the first two years of the occupation, labor was a direct beneficiary of the enlightened reform program. Workers were permitted to organize trade unions and bargain collectively. Japan was given a labor standards law. Food and cotton imports, paid for by the United States, brought prices under control and increased real wages almost to the prewar standard.

In the past two years, however, labor has lost or abandoned many of these gains. Japanese employers, taking advantage of an occupation- and government-sponsored purge, weakened trade unions by dismissing militant non-Communist as well as Communist labor leaders. The collective-bargaining law is virtually inoperative as far as government workers are concerned. . . .

Japanese business and industry have benefitted from the occupation. United States aid-grants paid for raw materials such as cotton, oil, coking coal and industrial salt. After some hesitation, the United States more or less abandoned plans for exacting reparations from this country. . . .

Big business interests which reaped huge profits from the war succeeded in escaping a large part of the burden of paying for a losing war. . . .

Physically, Japan's huge family trusts were broken up. But the American ideal of free enterprise did not really catch the imagination of Japanese industrialists and businessmen. Most economists now agree that, within a few years, interlocking companies, cartels, government subsidies, price and production controls and all other forms of former Japanese business practices will return in modified forms. . . .

The United States in 1945 and even in later years had two choices: Japan could be treated harshly, as a defeated enemy, or she could be built up as an "ally." Partly by chance, partly by design, Japan became the beneficiary of a modern innovation in victorious warfare: reform and recovery were given equal importance, and retribution was reduced to an outmoded Old Testament concept of justice.

The result is that Japan, after enduring the humiliation of defeat and occupation, is better fed, better clothed, less troubled by unrest and more prosperous and stable than any of the Asiatic countries that were arbitrarily classed as "victors" in World War II. . . .

After nearly six years of occupation, the Japanese have learned one lesson: if a war must be lost, lose it to the United States.

"American plans to permit Japanese rearmament could wipe out five years' progress toward democracy and give communism a great victory in the Far East, a Foreign Policy Association report said recently.

"Noting that Russia and the United States now are engaged in a world-wide battle of ideas, it said Japan—after conclusion of a peace treaty—'can be our best potential ally in an ideological rather than a military sense.

" 'If Japan takes on the aspects of a military power either through its own efforts or through ours, the hostility of Asian neutrals toward American policy in the Far East is certain to be augmented and the internal unity of Communist states like China increased,' it said.

"The report was written by Dr. Robert A. Scalapino, assistant professor of political science at the University of California."

(From a U. P. Dispatch.)

"A defeated nation can even better than a victorious nation be trained and prepared for the day of final victory. It may happen that I cannot win victory at once in this coming war; we may be forced to interrupt it. Then we will all be back underground. But after some years, when the weak and inefficient democracies will have utterly failed to solve the world's postwar problems, then we will suddenly break loose from underground and our stupefied enemies will discover all too late that millions of their own youth, misguided by weak education, disappointed by democracy's failure, will be on our side. Victory in this Third World War will be quick and easy."

A seasoned legislator and fighter for just causes evaluates the educational work of the Society for the Prevention of World War III in these words:

"Among these organizations which have come to my attention over the past few years and in which I have been particularly interested, is the Society for the Prevention of World War III. It is a unique organization. Indeed, I do not believe that there is any other group of its kind in this country today . . .

. . ."As is characteristic with most American organizations and groups, the founders of the Society for the Prevention of World War III came from all walks of life. I am personally familiar with their backgrounds, their complete devotion to American ideals and their high sense of honor and integrity . . .

. . ."Those who disagree with the Society's objectives, however, should stick to the issues involved. I say let the people exercise their free choice in a marketplace of ideas. Thy have always been able to discern truth from falsehood and when an idea runs counter to the needs and interests of our people, it is bound to wither and die. This is the way democracy works. It should be clear, however, that the American people will never support a campaign of calumny and smear which is intended to deliberately confuse the issues and thereby muddy the waters of public information. The people want the facts and not fairy tales . . .

Can Australia Risk A German Fifth Column?

by

CLIVE TURNBULL

Can we risk a German fifth column in Australia? Should we import German migrants wholesale? Some of us would not have Hitlerite Germans here at any price. Some of us believe that any danger is not so great as the danger of Communism.

Some community groups which were formerly opposed to German migration are now apparently swinging around in favor of it.

Varying figures are being mentioned. It is even suggested that the 200,000 migrants yearly, whom Australia can no longer hope to get from other sources, should be made up largely from Germany.

The Government has not committed itself to any figure.

The question is so important that it should be considered as far as possible without emotionalism and without prejudice.

To begin with it might be as well to decide what we are talking about when we speak of Germans, thereby avoiding the confusion which obviously exists in the minds of some Australians whose patriotism is not in doubt.

Days Before Bismarck

Various references have been made, for instance, to the fact that many men of German extraction and German names fought with the A. I. F. in the First and Second World Wars. From this it is assumed, apparently, that present-day Germans would fight with a third A. I. F., if necessary against Germany.

The trouble here lies in the use of the term German as if it were a constant—as if "Germans" of 1700 and 1850 and 1950 were all the same.

Any consideration of European—and Australian—history should expose such a fallacy.

Most of us, I suppose, knew personally plenty of men with German names who were members of our own armed forces in the two Great Wars.

One of my own most esteemed friends who was killed fighting for Australia in the last war bore a name that was German. But his ancestor had migrated to England in the service of the Hanoverians in the 18th century and his family had lived in Australia for a century and a quarter.

He had no more connection with present-day Germany and the people who are now called Germans than has the first man you might meet in the street named Smith or Kelly or McPherson.

So with a majority of others and with those Germans who played a distinguished part in the colonial story of Australia.

Theirs was the pre-Bismarckian Germany of small States, of poets and philosophers, the Germany which was destroyed and remoulded by Bismarck—"of the moral powers in the world he has not the slightest notion."

Liberalism to Blood and Iron

Harold Nicolson, in reviewing a recent edition of Erich Eyck's monumental work on Bismarck, remarks, "His belief in Real-politik, in Blood and Iron, in diplomacy as war by other means, in national egotism, in 'the destiny of the weak to be devoured by the strong'; his contempt for international faithfulness and contractual obligations . . . all these erroneous ideas . . . transformed the equable Germans within a space of twenty years into neurotic animals—restless, suspicious, discontented, envious, vaunting, and frightened of the violence which in their hysterias they had themselves provoked."

It is a poor compliment to Australia's German-descended soldiers to suppose that this was the Germany from which they sprang—and, that it was not, anyone with the slightest interest in the subject should know.

This later blood-and-iron Germany has always had its attractions for unstable and neurotic elements in other countries.

One of the most conspicuous of such persons was the renegade Houston Stewart Chamberlain, a member of a most distinguished English family, who, in 1899, published in Germany "The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century," which with its anti-Semitism, racism, and pan-aryanism exercised a deep influence upon Hitler.

The Fox and the Geese

With more blood and more iron Hitler built on what Bismarck had begun. He completed the transformation. Under him precisely those young Germans now of military age—or age to import to Australia—came to manhood.

To suggest that they bear any resemblance to some amiable early nineteenth century Teuton with his whiskers in a volume of Goethe is optimism carried to the point of folly.

Hitler was not so silly. As he reminded us, "Der Fuchs ist immer ein Fuchs, die Gans eine Gans, der Tiger ein Tiger, u.s.w."—(The fox is always a fox, the goose a goose, the tiger a tiger, and so on.)

Hitler thought the fox would go on devouring the foolish goose, and how right he was!

If we brought in, say, 200,000 young Germans, we should be bringing in a number roughly equal to a fifth of our population of military age.

It would be interesting to see how France, which has three times had the fox in the poultry yard, would receive a similar proposal.

There are, of course, some Australians who believe that it would be good policy to build up the Japanese and the Germans to fight Russia—that they would be a kind of obedient mercenaries whose interests would square with ours.

How little do Frankensteins know their monsters!

Muddle and Realism

Muddled thinking on these matters is not peculiar to our own time.

One Government of South Australia wanted to present the Northern Territory to the Japanese. Fortunately for

"What Schumacher is asking for Germany from the West is that her past be forgotten. The biggest stumbling block to such a policy is, of course, Germany itself, which has by no means made a clean break with its past. The current campaign to 'restore the honor of the German soldier,' the demand by all parties for the parole of convicted war criminals, the emergence of a former SS officer as Prime Minister of Schleswig-Holstein, only serve to emphasize the identification of many Germans with a great part of the unholy record of the Hitler years. It is part of the German tragedy that, were Kurt Schumacher to try to make this clear to the German people, he would soon cease to be the leader of Germany's largest party."

(John H. Lichtblau in the "New Leader.")

"In the event of Communist collapse, a political liability would be created, for the West German government inclines to the belief that the Allies will lose all interest in the fate of Germany unless they can be shown that the country is in constant peril from a Communist fifth column. That is why Chancellor Adenauer recently told foreign correspondents that they must not think that the Communist losses in recent elections are as significant as they look on the surface. According to Adenauer, Moscow had ordered German Communists not to vote the Communist ticket, so that the western democracies would be lulled into thinking they had nothing to fear from the West German Reds.

"The Germans are still busy at the old game of trying to frighten people into trusting them."

(From Alain Clemént in "The Reporter.")

you and me and the other potential white coolies the Japanese Government of the day didn't want it, despite the efforts of our suicidal fellow-colonists.

Such colonial statemen as Sir Thomas McIlwraith, of Queensland, alive to the German dreams of a vast South Sea Empire—dreams which we have no reason whatever to think abandoned—were realists. McIlwraith's attempted annexation of New Guinea was one of the determining actions of Australian history.

Should we, then, ban all Germans?

Few of us would go as far as that. We might say, "We shall admit some whose good will have been proved. But we shall have no mass migrations of these people. Better, if the worst comes to the worst, to fight an enemy outside than an enemy inside."

For if we do not go as far as Hitler in believing that the tiger does not change his stripes, we may believe that it will take as long to decontaminate the majority of Germans as Bismarck and Hitler took to pervert them.

(Reprinted from "The Argus," Australia)

WORTH PONDERING . . .

"Just when German politicians and Allied officials were exchanging congratulations on the peace and progress of German political life, the peace was ruptured and progress retarded by an event which The Manchester Guardian calls 'at once the most serious and significant political event in post-war Germany.'

"This was the very strong showing made by the Socialist Reichs party in the state election in Lower Saxony. . . .

"Dr. Fritz Dorls, one of the founders of the party, has the answer already! 'If they ban us now,' he said recently, 'it would make us martyrs, like Hitler and his followers after the Munich putsch.'

" 'We are ready to die for the good things of National Socialism,' he says. 'We are ready to be jailed and to be hanged to see that we get a German Reich again, loyal and honest, like we had, thank God, before 1945.'

"No one should be soothed by the belief that since Hitler and his followers fought the Russians, the new Nazis can be counted upon to be strongly anti-Communist and to fall in with Western policy. Nothing in the campaign literature or speeches of their leaders gives evidence of this. The Socialist Reichs party is full of opportunists ready to sup with the devil any time he picks up the check."

Snapshots

From time to time we obtain information regarding the background and present status of Germans who played a significant role in the Reich. We believe our readers will be interested, therefore, in the following information:

Among the members of the present Bonn parliament is one Karl George Pfleiderer. Pfleiderer was a member of the Nazi Party while working as a diplomat in Hitler's Foreign Office. He was considered to be "entirely reliable" by the Gestapo. In 1941, during the time of the notorious Soviet-Nazi non-aggression pact, Pfleiderer was a member of the so-called Resettlement Delegation operating in Memel. The innocent sounding title of this organization of course is misleading. Actually it consisted of a group of notorious war criminals, including SS General Heinz Brueckner. Pfleiderer worked with leading officials of the SS taking orders both from Ribbentrop and Himmler as "Reich Commissioner for the Strengthening of Germanism." In recognition of his activities in forcing the evacuation and resettlement of foreign groups of populations, which were carried out jointly by the Nazi Foreign Office and Himmler's SS agencies, Pfleiderer, as a member of the resettlement commission, was awarded the Honor Badge for "cultivation and fostering of ethnic Germanism." All in all Herr Pfleiderer received at least 10 decorations from the Nazis and their satellite governments. The Nazis appreciated Herr Pfleiderer's work, for in 1944 he was promoted by Ribbentrop to the important post of Consul General at Stockholm.

In the No. 37 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III it was reported that Dr. William Hass, head of the West German government's new Foreign Office, admitted that 14 out of the 31 senior members of his staff were members of the Nazi Party. The Bonn Government is very sensitive about the backgrounds of these men. Indeed, the Adenauer Government refuses to give the press pertinent information with regard to the key personnel in the German Foreign Office. However, among the 14 prominent Nazis who are in key posts in the Foreign Ministry is one Dr. Mohr, who in 1941 aided in the deportation of Jews from Amsterdam to the Mauthausen concentration camp for extermination. Another leading character in the present German Foreign Office is Dr. von Etzdorf, who in 1940 sanctioned in France the looting of works of art which were either public property or property belonging to Jews.

Finally, another Foreign Office specialist, Dr. von Rintelen, gave the order regarding the "special treatment" (extermination) of Jews deported from Rumania.

The New Yorker magazine of April 21, 1951, carried an interesting story on the German scientist, Dr. Wernher Freiherr von Braun, who is now in the United States working on research and development projects for the U. S. Army. For those who are interested, Professor Braun at one time held the rank of SS Sturmbannfuhrer. As a leading scientist for Hitler, he worked in the notorious V2 Bomb Project at Peenemunde. Braun admired the efficiency of slave labor which he used for his work at a sub-camp (Nordhausen) of the Buchenwald concentration camp. When troops of the U. S. Third Army liberated these concentration camps they were so horrified by the number of dead in the subterranean tunnels that a Congressional investigating team arrived on the spot to personally confirm these crimes.

Dr. von Braun, together with other SS officers, followed Himmler's neo-pagan "Gottglaubig" rites.

Dr. Paul Schmidt, who was Hitler's interpreter, recently published his memoirs, in which he tried to whitewash his past. Indeed, he declares that he was "forced to put on the SS uniform." Actually, Schmidt joined the SS at a very early date and was promoted rapidly. In November, 1940, he attained the rank of full SS Colonel and was assigned to the SS main office which closely collaborated wih the Nazi Foreign Office. Dr. Schmidt was Hitler's personal interpreter at Munich, but in his book he tries to convey the impression that he and Ribbentrop, who was Hitler's chief adviser on the Munich deal, were at odds. Conveniently enough, Dr. Schmidt does not tell us about his involvement in the murder which had been carefully planned in cooperation with the chief of the SS main office, of the French General Mesmy, while the latter was a prisoner of war in Germany.

". . . There is plenty of doubt whether the rearmament of Germany, moral or not, is necessarily a matter of self-interest to all Europeans.

"Edward Crankshaw, one of Britain's outstanding experts on Russian affairs, writes in the conservative Observer:

" 'What information can be gleaned from Russian sources suggests very clearly that while the Kremlin does not seriously believe in the alleged American threat, it does most strongly believe that once the West Germans get an army (which will draw largely on the embittered mass of refugees and those expelled from the East)—Washington and London, with the best will in the world, will not be able to control that army.' . . ."

(Percy Winner in the "New Republic.")

A LEADING APOSTLE FOR THE FATHERLAND

Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, the leading spirit of the Moral Rearmament Movement or Corps, as it is called, told one of his audiences in Caux, Switzerland, that: "The principles of Moral Rearmament can be the straw that will save Germany. The amazing response of the Germans may well prove that Germany is one of the nations that will teach the world."

Dr. Buchman is the gentleman who, according to the New York Sun of August 24, 1946: "had met Himmler and declared that he was a good fellow." Earlier, the New York World-Telegram (August 26, 1936) quoted Dr. Buchman as saying, "I thank heaven for a man like Adolf Hitler."

(For further details see PREVENT WORLD WAR III, issue No. 31, September-October, 1949.)

We Must Rule Europe—Says German Press

PREVENT WORLD WAR III (November-December, 1950 issue) carried an article dealing with the attempt on the part of Nazi industrialists to regain their hold on the German press. In the following issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III (February-March, 1951) we elaborated further on this ominous development in an editorial entitled: "Facts versus Words."

The information contained in the abovementioned articles has not been challenged by any official sources so far as we know. Indeed, what we said then is confirmed by the well-known English journal, The Manchester Guardian. In its issue of June 14, 1951, the Guardian begins a series of two articles entitled significantly, "Nazi Trends in the West German Press."

Among the interesting facts mentioned by the Guardian correspondent is one dealing with the efforts of Dr. Robert Pferdemenges, a leading official in the German steel trust, Vereinigte Stahlwerke, and financial adviser to Chancellor Adenauer, to subvert the independence of the German press.

He also mentions the fact that some of the pre-war press lords of the new Union of Newspaper Publishers "let it be known publicly that they intended to 'smash' the former Allied licensed press because it was democratic and 'collaborationist.' "

The growing influence of the pre-war press lords is also indicated by the fact that many German newspapers now carry stories which are hostile to the Allies and echo Nazi ideas. For example, Die Neue Zeitung of March 15, 1951 reported an attack against General Eisenhower made by August Haussleiter, head of the "Deutsche Gemeinschaft" at an electoral meeting in Wolfenbuettel: "I do not want to be taken for an anti-Semite, but according to my opinion, Gen. Eisenhower is nothing but a front for Frankfurter, Baruch, and Morgenthau, since in 1945 he had turned over tens of thousands of German soldiers to the Soviets as prisoners, and there is no guarantee that in the future he will not again sacrifice tens of thousands of Germans to the Russians, this time as cannon-fodder."

A periodical entitled: Nation Europa purveys the spirit of aggressive German nationalism under the cloak of advocating European unity. Here are some of the choice statements made by this neo-Nazi periodical:

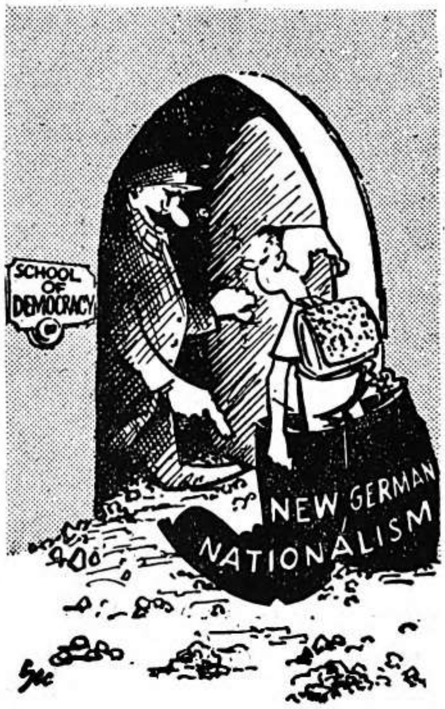
"We have no superstitious respect for dogmas, not even for those of the now ruling democratism. . . . We want to help prepare a genuine policy which is more in accordance with the will of the people than the schematic and bureaucratic party state which purposely silences the people. We are not afraid of the forces which stand in the way of a real and live democracy."

"Whatever may be the objections leveled against Hitler, until 1945 the German Reich fought for the integrity of Europe. The same cannot be said of his adversaries."

"A European alliance is the only salvation; everything depends, therefore, on the Germans assuming again their old role of being the most faithful guardians of the Occident. The world has sinned more against them than they against the world. Their cities were burnt down, their countries destroyed, many thousands of children murdered and women raped, the old frontiers arbitrarily narrowed; but they, purified by so much suffering, have remained steadfast. . . . They are entitled to demand a reckoning for the period since 1919. One should stop to count their crimes. Those who are still talking of German crimes are suspect of being desirous to salve their own bad conscience."

Another example of how the German press is beginning to help revive Nazi ideas and stoke the flames of hostility toward the Allies may be seen from the publicity given to the activities of the neo-Nazi Socialist Reich Party on the eve of the election, by Die Gegenwart (May 15, 1951): "Young people, physically and mentally fit, marching three deep, to the music of bands playing military marches, all three stanzas of the Deutschland song being sung instead of only the officially permitted third one. . . . There are statements and interjections during the meeting which are typical of the mental attitude: The present government is composed of criminals and traitors: the mass-murderer Clay, the American bandit, the servants of foreign countries."

AS A GERMAN SEES IT



"Back with the old boots."

Frankfurter Rundschau (U. S. Zone)

. . . "Well, the German problem is a completely and entirely different one from the Japanese problem. The German people were a mature race. . . .

. . . "The German was quite as mature as we were. Whatever the German did in dereliction of the standards of modern morality, the international standards, he did deliberately. He didn't do it because of a lack of knowledge of the world. He didn't do it because he stumbled into it to some extent as the Japanese did. He did it as a considered policy in which he believed in his own military might, in which he believed that its applicaiton would be a shortcut to the power and economic domination that he desired.

"Now you are not going to change the German nature. He will come back to the path that he believes is correct by the pressure of public opinion, by the pressure of world philosophies, by his own interests and many other reasons, and he in my belief will develop his own Germanic tribe along the lines that he himself believes in, which do not in many basic ways differ from our own. . . ."

(Testimony of Gen. MacArthur before the Senate Investigating Committee)

"Representative Kennedy, Democrat, of Massachusetts says he thinks Western Germany 'will be the most powerful country in Europe' within a few years. . . .

" 'In spite of the destruction by bombings, in spite of the dismantling policy, her national income today is greater than France's and with a few more years of peace, Western Germany will be the most powerful country in Europe.

" 'No wonder the French are wary,' he added."

(From the Washington Evening Star)

". . . An almost clinical case of what is wrong with this so-called policy of mercy was provided the other day by the release of General von Falkenhausen, Hitler's military governor in occupied Belgium. The very best that could be said for this general, whether rightly convicted or not, is that at least he should be no more seen nor heard upon the public scene. And yet the very day of his release he gives his views on German rearmament. He puts his terms at once. He couldn't imagine himself, he says, fighting or dying alongside the troops of foreign Powers 'as long as German generals are being sentenced to imprisonment by Allied courts.' In other words: go back on all your principles, spit in your own faces, and you can count on General von Falkenhausen! It is a pretty fair illustration of the parlous straits into which Western policy in Germany has brought the Western world. . . ."

(From "The New Statesman and Nation.")

"While East and West are arguing about the control of central Europe, an old contestant is seizing the opportunity to try to make a good claim. The tightly interwoven German upper class most Americans anathematize under the name 'Ruhr Barons' is seeking to reassert its power.

"Helped along by excessive United States pressure for immediate recruitment of German divisions, the men who controlled central Europe economically until 1945 are trying to break decartelization orders and re-establish themselves. . . .

"What next, if they are successful in these endeavors, can only be speculation. But their record gives no ground for confidence in them. . . ."

(From an editorial in "The St. Louis Post-Dispatch.")

". . . Among death sentences commuted by Mr. McCloy were those . . . of some of 'the SS Einsatz murderers, who "liquidated" over a million Jews in Russia. Among the nine reprieved we find, for example, SS Lieutenant Schubert, who confessed to supervising the shooting of 700 to 800 Jews and gypsies in the vicinity of Simferopol at Christmas time, 1941. His death sentence was commuted to ten years' imprisonment, and he will soon be out . . .' By what principle of mercy does one justify that? And what, may one ask, can German opinion make of it—unless that it confesses a miscarriage of Allied justice? . . ."

(From "The New Statesman and Nation.")

The revival of Nazism means the new Nazis are simply "the dreamers of the old Pan-German dream." But "the real scoundrel is . . . the eternal German soldier . . . the aggressive, warmaking marauder who periodically gets Germany in conflict with the rest of the world."

(From the San Francisco Chronicle)

". . . British and American statesmen have lately exhorted the Germans to make their choice between East and West. It would be well at this point if Mr. McCloy and other American leaders would make their choice between the German reactionaries and the rest of Europe. For they cannot have it both ways, as they seem to want to do. If Mr. McCloy and those who think with him are content to pursue their present road, they may well find partners among their former and despised enemies: in the measure they succeed, however, they will as surely lose their present allies. Step by step, as things go now, Mr. McCloy is undermining his country's cause and reputation in Europe. . . ."

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your courtesy in sending me a copy of your interesting, forthright letter to U. S. High Commissioner, John J. McCloy, together with other literature published by your organization.

You seem to be making a definite and positive contribution toward enlightenment on international problems, and I trust you will continue to keep me informed.

Mrs. Helen Hackett
New York City

Dear Sir:

Thank you for your letter of the 2nd of April. The literature you sent me earlier in the year was received, read, digested and forwarded to friends in the east. I agree with you regarding the danger of a remilitarized Germany. . . . I was astounded at the revelations contained in your literature.

. . . Yes, please, put me on your mailing list.

Irene Brandenburg
Los Angeles, California

Dear Sir:

I acknowledge with thanks the receipt of some of the literature issued by your organization which you kindly sent to me. I found it both interesting and illuminating. Most Jews in Britain are dismayed by the doctrine of "Let by-gones be by-gones," which is advocated by some prominent Americans. The lessons of bitter experience are evidently ignored by them. We on our part demand that the German people shall give proofs of genuine change of heart before military power is again restored to it.

A. Cohen, President
The Board of Deputies of British Jews
London, England

Dear Sir:

. . . I have read with much enthusiasm and interest the publications which you sent to me some months ago. At that time I asked that I be placed on your mailing list for any and all future publications, and was assured that my name was placed on your list and that I would be receiving all forthcoming material published by you. However, to date I have heard nothing further from you, and I would appreciate it very much if you would find out what happened in your circulation department that I am not receiving these publications.

Also would you kindly send me three extra copies of your Bulletin No. 36, November-December.

Thank you very much for your cooperation.

Melba Botkins
Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

I have received the very valuable literature which you have sent me. Besides being in sympathy with your aims, I have found your literature helpful in my graduate studies on Germany at Columbia University.

Lawrence Schwartz
New York City

Dear Sir:

I would like to be on your permanent mailing list, at least for your free publications. I am a student, and unfortunately, am unable to subscribe or contribute to your organization. In times when American policy is too often determined on the basis of sheer military strategy forgetting long-range political objectives, your publications with their emphasis on a realistic solution to the German problem are especially significant.

Thank you for your communication.

Arthur Emlen
Los Angeles, California

Dear Sir:

I have just made acquaintance with your magazine. I think your aims very laudable and that distribution of your magazine and viewpoint should be more widespread.

I would like to be placed on your mailing list for future issues, and, if possible, I would like to secure back issues.

Please continue your fine work of articulating the thoughts that so many of us have wanted to express on a wider scale.

Dear Sir:

I appreciate receiving the magazine and other literature of the Society. I have given most of it away to people whom I thought would appreciate its message as much as I did.

I should like to be placed on your mailing list for other publications.

I enclose a small contribution. Is there some concrete way in which I may help?

Joseph Stern
New York City

Dear Sir:

Through the courtesy of the San Francisco Town Hall, the February-March number of your remarkable magazine, some of the membership became aware of your publication, and an examination of same is convincing that such material is essential to awaken the public to current conditions and risks.

There does not seem to be any notation of the subscription price of the magazine, and your writer would appreciate receiving further copies. The Ocean View Branch of the San Francisco Public Library would also be enlightened as the people dwelling in that vicinity at 113 Broad Street, San Francisco, being of foreign extraction would welcome such information.

"Benny Buttenwiesser, U. S. deputy high commissioner for Germany, had a conversation with Chancellor Adenauer some time ago which illustrates one of the most important problems the U. S. faces in Europe.

"The new German Parliament had scaled down taxes on wealthier taxpayers about a year ago, leaving a proportionately heavy tax burden on labor and white collar workers. . . .

"Showing him the high tax scale prevailing in the U. S. A., Buttenwiesser argued that wealthy Germans also must shoulder their share of the tax burden. . . .

"Adenauer, however, remained unconvinced, and U. S. authorities finally permitted the German government to get away with its reduced tax structure, even though shot full of legal loopholes whereby high bracket taxpayers can dodge taxes. Result: Germany is now faced with a heavy deficit, is asking for more U. S. aid —which, if given, would have to come out of the pockets of Americans who do pay their taxes. . . ."

A Calculated Risk?

It is commonly agreed that foreign policies, no matter how well thought out, involve risks—risks which may produce results diametrically opposed to the objectives of such policies. A fiasco in foreign policy is a source of great embarrassment for diplomats, and may easily create a wave of indignation and resentment among the people whose hopes have been inflated by the speeches and essays of the diplomats justifying their policies. Yet, time and again, foreign policy experts have weathered these storms, thanks to the tolerance of the people in general, who must realize that diplomats, like the rest of us, are only human. Perhaps the people are guided by the saying, to err is human, to forgive, divine. But can one expect the people to forgive their experts on foreign policy when they discover that discredited policies which have in the past brought them to the brink of ruin have been rehashed and presented as something "new" and "far-sighted?" In other words, are the people expected to accept the rationalizations of statesmen who refuse to learn from past error and persist in pursuing policies which have proven disastrous? Policies which are demonstrably unsound on the basis of past experience do not merit a return engagement. Such policies merely help to repeat the same blunders for which the people have already paid a heavy price.

In this category of discredited policies one must place the Allied program for Germany as it is now developing. In the near future the American people and their Western Allies may be confronted with the fateful decision to rearm the Germans and release them from all basic and effective political and economic controls. In reality this is not a new policy which involves unforeseeable risks. Rather is it the "touching up" of an old theory which was tried after World War I and exploded into the most devastating war which mankind has experienced.

Millions of Americans instinctively fear the present trend in American policy toward Germany. Many of our foremost experts on foreign policy, including Mr. Sumner Welles and James P. Warburg, have warned against this policy. Experienced journalists are also alarmed. For example, Mr. James Reston, the outstanding diplomatic correspondent for The New York Times, noted that, "A Japan that is strong enough to serve as a bulwark against Communism is also strong enough to ally itself with Communism." Mr. Reston believes that this equally applies in the case of Germany.

Another well known Times correspondent, Drew Middleton, points out that the Soviets have many aces to play for the hand of the Herrenvolk, including the return of the lost Eastern territories now under Polish rule. "This may be dismissed as fantastic," writes Mr. Middleton, "but the idea of a German-Russian rapprochement would have been dismissed as equally fantastic in April, 1939." Mr. Joseph E. Evans, foreign policy expert for The Wall Street Journal, shares these views generally. In a penetrating analysis of the implications of restoring Germany's political and military power, he described how the Soviets could woo the Germans. As Mr. Evans points out, Western Germany may still refuse a deal with the Soviets, "but the point is not whether it would refuse or accept; it is that, sovereign and remilitarized, it would be in a position to accept." According to Mr. Evans, "The West is constantly admitting its need for German troops, as it is for German cooperation in the Schuman Plan. The Germans have already ably exploited this Western weakness to get as much sovereignty as they now have and to get concessions even on the troops question. They need only keep raising their price for cooperation to get complete sovereignty and a German national army if they want it."

Why do these seasoned observers make these admissions? It is because they have not forgotten the history of German diplomacy over the past 30 years, and fully understand the strategic position which Germany potentially possesses once the wraps are taken off. Thus Mr. Middleton reports that many believe, "The Federal Republic can get anything it wants from the Allies."

The Germans employed their strategic position with cunning and skill after World War I. They are at it again. A calculated risk assumes that there is an even chance that Allied policy will achieve its objective. But in the case of our present policy toward Germany, this assumption cannot be made. We do not only have the record of past German history, but even the present situation obtaining in Germany tells us that we are travelling along a road studded with pitfalls. The rise of neo-Nazism, the reactivation of Hitler's militarists, the deals between the Ruhr barons and the Soviets, the growing attacks by the German press against the Allies—all of these are danger signals, but more are in the offing.

According to two reliable European sources, namely the London Economist and the Manchester Guardian, we get the following composite of things to come: The Germans will demand political sovereignty over the Saar.

They will demand that the Bonn Government refuse to recognize the legality of the Nuremberg judgments on German war criminals.

They will demand that the Bonn Government deny the right of the Western powers to intervene in the Federal Republic if Allied interests, prestige and security are threatened.

They will demand a reduction in the occupation costs on the grounds that these costs have not been freely negotiated between the Bonn Government and the Western powers.

They will demand the emasculation of Allied laws dealing with the seizure of German foreign assets abroad.

They will demand the right to conduct their foreign policies with the satellite East without Allied supervision.

They will insist that the Allies help them to regain the territories in the East.

They will demand the categorical restoration of the honor of the German soldiers and the reestablishment of the German General Staff.

Already the newly formed veteran organizations have demanded that, "The men who fought for their fatherland and 'for Europe' and the officers who kept their oath to their supreme commander (Hitler), must be rehabilitated and the Allies' work of 'glorifying treason' must be undone." (London Economist, September 8, 1951.)

This is the price which the Germans will put on the table for "cooperation" against the totalitarian East. But this is not cooperation. It is German dictation. The London Economist, discussing this all-important issue, seems to be shocked over the German attitude. Yet it prefers to hope that somehow, some way, it will change. "If there is any common sense left in Western Germany" writes the London Economist, "a bargain can still be struck." Did we have to bargain with Britain or with France when the Western world faced the mortal danger of Hitlerism? How is it that we must bargain with the Germans in the face of the growing threats of Soviet totalitarianism? Those who believe we can bargain with the Germans and thereby obtain their cooperation, are projecting their own ideas of diplomacy and morality on the standards which have governed Germany since the days of Bismarck. Striking a bargain with Germany is, in effect, placing our security at her mercy.

The London Economist ignores this cold fact. It prefers to scold the Germans, telling them that while the Allies are willing to meet the Germans half way, "they will not be willing to put money down for nothing. The Germans will have to realize—to put the matter in its bluntest terms—that there is a question whether they can be trusted." Do not the scars of bomb-ridden Coventry serve as a grim reminder that the Germans cannot be trusted? We believe that most West Europeans share the same feeling of distrust for the former enemy.

They fear the duplicity of the Germans, who are old hands at dividing their foes. They fear the Germans, not only because they may join their forces with the Soviets, but also because they may well make a new attempt at dominating the West or provoke a new war for their own selfish motives.

Repeating the observations of American journalists, the New Statesman and Nation writes: "West Germany rearmed and independent, in fact if not in form, would be in a unique position to sell her favors to the highest bidder. . . . It is difficult to resist the conclusion that once sovereignty is restored to Bonn and rearmament becomes a fact, West Germany will become the harlot of Europe, the more exclusive and expensive because of her scarcity and the unsurpassed physical assets she enjoys."

It is our considered judgment that an investigation of present-day Germany is imperative. The American people have been told to invest their confidence in the present German leaders and the forces they represent. Common prudence requires investigation before investment. Until the people of the West are given the facts concerning the leadership of Germany, the state of its economy, the degree of democratization, only then should we consider the question of accepting Germany as a partner of the West.

"A tragic, but not unexpected chain of reaction and counter-reaction is continuing in West Germany. The more authority the Germans are given by the Western Allies, the more they tend toward dishonored men and ideas.

"Every Allied step in relaxing occupation controls over the past three years and more has been followed by the appointment of additional ex-Nazis to government positions, more brazen demands for the fulfillment of German 'honor' and more clamoring for further concessions to end the state of war with Germany, the blindness of our policy has again been demonstrated."

(Fred A. Stern in the Seven Arts Feature Syndicate.)

"The political leaders of the West German Republic have launched a concerted drive to force the Allies to end all controls over their former foe."

". . . Despite bitter personal animosity between Government and opposition leaders in West Germany, they both are attempting to prove that the Allies are now using their controls for their own selfish interests at the expense of the defeated Germans.

"Press and politicians are joined in a very systematic attempt to emphasize and exploit 'tension' and 'ill-feeling' between Allies and Germans. Political differences are being made 'political issues' and where none exist they are being made up."

(Ernest Leiser in ONA)

"You have returned you ghostly creatures"

In Mr. McCloy's Seventh Quarterly Report on Germany, a brief chapter is devoted to a description of the newly established German Foreign Office. The significance of this chapter lies not in what Mr. McCloy tells the reader, but in what he omits. We refer to the backgrounds of the key personnel responsible for the foreign policies of the Bonn Government. For months the Society has endeavored to obtain information regarding these individuals. We have communicated with Mr. McCloy's office and were politely told to forward our queries to the Bonn Government, but the Bonn Government would not divulge its secrets. Naturally the unusual reticence displayed over this subject heightened our curiosity. Could it be, we asked ourselves, that this veil of censorship was covering up a first class scandal? Bits of information finally leaked out inadvertently, presumably, which confirmed our worst fears regarding the character of the "new" Bonn diplomats.

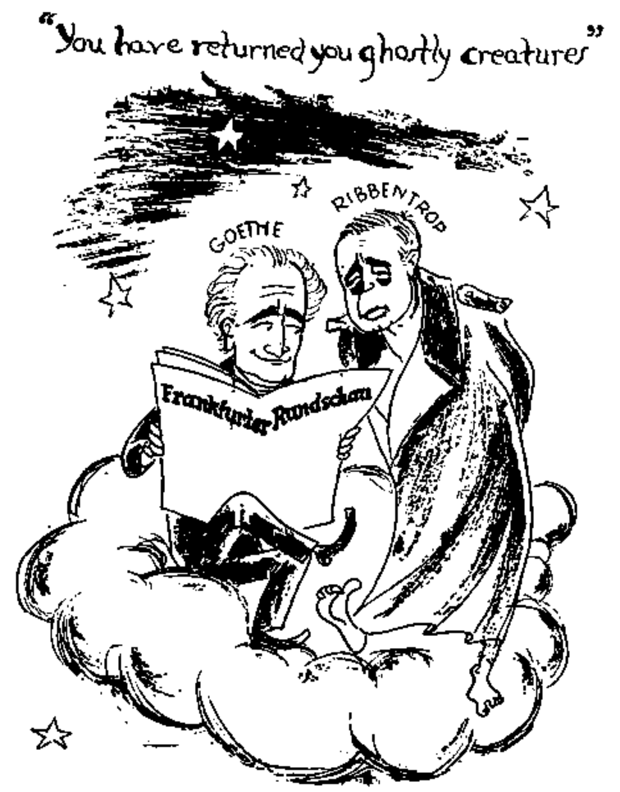
In an unguarded moment during the early part of this year, Dr. Wilhelm Haas, Chief of the Office of Administrative and Personnel Affairs in the Foreign Office, blurted out some revealing facts. Among other things, he admitted that fourteen out of the thirty-one senior members of his staff had been members of the Nazi Party. Haas' public admission did not stir Allied authorities to action nor did Chancellor Adenauer issue any statement expressing indignation. However, when the Frankfurter Rundschau, an independent German newspaper, recently ran a detailed expose of the former Nazis dominating the Bonn Foreign Office, the Chancellor feigned surprise and announced to the world that a full scale inquiry would be conducted on the basis of the charges made by that newspaper. This hypocritical gesture on the part of Chancellor Adenauer is underlined by the fact that the present members of the foreign service were appointed by an inter-party parliamentary committee on which members of Adenauer's own party served. Only a naive mind would believe that Chancellor Adenauer, who is the Foreign Minister for the German Government, is ignorant of the backgrounds of key German diplomats who have been working directly under him.

The return of the Nazis and their fellow-travelers to the German Foreign Office is an event which spells danger to the security of the free world. It is important to those of us who are accustomed to regard diplomats as specialists in foreign policy to stop for a moment and consider the real nature of the German diplomatic corps as it finally developed during the Nazi regime.

German diplomacy under Hitler played a unique role in helping the Nazis to prepare for their wars of aggression. The basic objectives of German diplomacy were to further the ends of the Nazi Party. Under these circumstances, the German Foreign Office, as in the case of the German General Staff, became an intrinsic part of the Nazi apparatus for war. The International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg was clear on this point. "Hitler could not make aggressive war by himself," the Tribunal noted. "He had to have the cooperation of statesmen, military leaders, diplomats, and business men. When they, with the knowledge of his aims, gave him cooperation, they made themselves parties to the plan he had intended. . . . The relation of leader and follower does not preclude responsibility here any more than it does in the comparable tyranny of organized domestic crime."

Mr. George S. Messersmith, who served as American Consul in Berlin during the years 1933 and 1934, stated in a duly sworn affidavit to the prosecution of the German war criminals at Nuremberg, "Military preparation and psychological preparation were coupled with diplomatic preparations designed to so disunite and isolate their intended victims as to render them defenseless against German aggression." Commenting upon Mr. Messersmith's observations, the detailed indictment against the Nuremberg war criminals states, "in other words, Nazi Germany was able to promote these divisions and increase its aggressive strength by using as its agents . . . men who on outward appearances were merely conservative diplomats."

Many statesmen in the West were tricked by the fact that the Nazis employed so-called old school diplomats to carry out their policies. There had been a great deal of wishful thinking in the chancellories of the world that this type of diplomat did not see eye to eye with the Nazis and could be influenced for the better. World War II proved how wrong they were. The Nazis, according to Mr. Messersmith, had no intention of permitting in-



Goethe: "That's my play."
Ribbentrop: ". . . But my cast!"
(Mussil in Frankfurter Rundschau)

dividuals to work in the German Foreign Office who were not Nazis at heart. As early as 1935, steps were taken to assure the loyalty and devotion of the diplomats to the Nazi cause. After 1936, Mr. Messersmith informs us, the Economic Division of the German Foreign Office "conducted the most sinister activities against foreign countries in furtherance of subversive activities of German agents abroad."

The German Foreign Office gave aid and cooperation to such sinister outfits as the People's Union for Germanism Abroad (VDA). One of the agents of the VDA, Dr. Steinacher, during a visit to Danzig, warned, "Danzig, just as Austria, is a state created by coercion of the treaties. Since a political union does not exist, this loss must be made up by a profounder sense of popular consciousness. With Adolf Hitler, the eternal force of Germanism has risen which is greater than the possession of a passport of citizenship. This Germanism has become the highest law for us. . . ." The mission of the German Foreign Office was to carry out the aspirations of Germanism as expressed by Herr Steinacher.

Of course not all of the diplomats carried Nazi Party cards. Indeed in many cases it was not required by von Ribbentrop for tactical reasons. Nevertheless, it would be looking for a needle in a haystack to discover those, who while members of the German diplomatic staff were genuinely opposed to Hitler.

The Nazi diplomats are back again. Indeed the number of Nazis in the Foreign Office is far greater than the modest admissions of Dr. Haas. According to the Manchester Guardian (September 20, 1951), 151 out of the 252 members of the new foreign service were formerly assistants of the war criminal, von Ribbentrop. Of these no fewer than 130 were former members of the Nazi Party. "Since December, 1950, there has been an increasing tendency to accept more ex-Nazis." When the Frankfurter Rundschau shattered the censorship surrounding the identity of these diplomats, the Bonn Foreign Office denied all and charged the newspaper with "lies, inventions, or citations from the Nuremberg trials." In other words, the Foreign Office was bold enough to equate the evidence of the Nuremberg trials with lies and slanders. This outburst is sufficient, we believe, to indicate the real nature of the present group of individuals who run the German Foreign Office. Is it any wonder that the Press Department of the Bonn Government recently released an article glorifying Otto Abetz, the Nazi spy-diplomat in France as a "genuine European"?

In the face of the historical record and the serious charges published by the Frankfurter Rundschau, why has Mr. McCloy failed to act? It may be that he harbors the illusion that the Nazi personnel in the Bonn Foreign Office have become ardent converts to democracy and have rejected the views expressed by Herr Steinacher. Regardless of Mr. McCloy's feelings, however, there can be no doubt that the reactivation of these striped pants Nazis bodes ill for democracy. In supplementing these remarks, we are citing below, a list which is by no means complete, of some of the key members of the German Foreign Office and their backgrounds. Let the record speak for itself!

I: Wilhelm Haas, chief of the Administrative and Personnel Division. The latest reports indicate that he has been replaced and will be sent as a diplomatic representative to Asia. In 1937, Dr. Haas was forced to leave the German Foreign Office because of his wife's non-Aryan origin. Thereupon he went to China and took on an important post as political observer for I. G. Farben. In this position, he collaborated on the closest terms with E. W. Bohle and the State Secretary in charge of German propaganda and Germans abroad. The entire work was supervised and directed by the Nazi Party and Haas, consequently, took his orders from the Nazis.

II: Dr. Theodore Kordt, chief of the Office of Commercial Policy in the present Foreign Office was a member of the Nazi Party. In April, 1950, when he joined the Bonn Government he conveniently overlooked his party card. This was found out later during a routine checkup at the Berlin Document Center. In December, 1939, he was counselor at the Berne Legation in Switzerland where he purchased documents stolen from the British Legation for his Nazi boss, von Ribbentrop. He was also involved in the procurement of bombing targets for the German Luftwaffe and spent some of his time spying for it. Dr. Kordt claimed that he was a member of the Resistance Movement. Yet, it is a fact that the real underground fighters who could testify against Dr. Kordt perished while fighting the Nazis.

III: Dr. Herbert Blankenhorn, chief of the Office of Political Affairs was also a member of the Nazi Party. He was the first ex-party member to become liaison officer with the Allied High Commission in 1950.

IV: Dr. Peter Pfeiffer, a brother of Dr. Anton Pfeiffer, former state minister of Bavaria, is the present director of the diplomatic school in Speyer, although he was a member of the Nazi Party. When the Allies landed in North Africa, it was Dr. Pfeiffer, then Consul-General in Algeria, who sent the following wire to von Ribbentrop: "The city is under artillery fire. This is my last telegram. Long live Hitler! Signed Pfeiffer."

V: Dr. Emil von Rintelen was a Nazi Party member and one of Ribbentrop's leading ambassadors. He was identified in the Nazi war crimes trials as the official who requested the deportation of Jews from Rumania to the Lublin Ghetto. Today, Rintelen is an important lecturer at the school for diplomats in Speyer.

VI: Dr. Herbert Dittman who is reported to have succeeded Dr. Wilhelm Haas, was supposed to have been ex-communicated by the Roman Catholic Church for his Nazi Party membership. He was a key figure in the Personnel Division of the Nazi Foreign Office during the years 1939 to 1945.

VII: Dr. Werner von Grundherr, who admitted at the Nuremberg Trials that it was he who at first bribed Quisling and protected the murderous activities of Dr. Werner Best in Denmark during the war, is the new German ambassador to Athens. At the Nuremberg Trials, he also admitted his participation in forcing the deportation of Jews and helpless women and children. On January 18, 1951, documents dealing with his nefarious activities were duly submitted to the proper German authorities dealing with state affairs. Excerpts of this evidence were read in the Bonn Parliament, but somehow they never reached the proper German authorities. Consequently, sincere anti-Nazis apprised President Heuss of Grundherr's record. Notwithstanding the fact that Heuss could not now plead ignorance, Grundherr was promoted from General-Consul to his present position in Athens. Despite his terroristic activities on behalf of the Nazis, he was graciously received by Chancellor Adenauer himself and now is an honored member of the German diplomatic staff.

VIII: Dr. Gottfried von Nostitz was a member of the Nazi Party, but nevertheless has been placed in the new Foreign Office. He was slated to go to Paris, but the French refused him a visa on the grounds that as Nazi Consul at Geneva, he collaborated on very close terms with the Nazi Security Service, a part of the SS. Von Nostitz, while serving as a political reporter for the Nazi Foreign Office during the bombardment of Warsaw in 1939, recommended that the Germans delay action with regard to the Pope's propositions for a truce, especially since Warsaw had been officially declared an open city.

IX: Dr. Herbert Schwarzman, another addition to the new Foreign Office was a Nazi and a collaborator of the war criminal von Ribbentrop. He was brought into the new Foreign Office by Dr. Herwarth. During the war, Schwarzman acted as liaison agent between von Ribbentrop and the notorious German spy, Otto Abetz, in their plan to murder the French leaders Georges Mandel and Paul Reynaud. Schwarzman conveniently forgot to mention these activities at his denazification trial.

X: Dr. Rupprecht von Keller, a colleague of Dr. Haas in the present German Foreign Office, was a member of the Nazi Party. Although he had difficulties during his denazification trial at Munich, he was finally absolved thanks to the good offices of Dr. Anton Pfeiffer.

XI: Dr. H. von Herwarth, former member of the Nazi Foreign Office is now Chief of Protocol in the Bonn Foreign Office. The Pfeiffer brothers were instrumental in securing this position for him.

XII: Hasso von Etzdorff was a Nazi Party member and a leading figure among the German storm troopers. He joined that outfit on January 30, 1933. Subsequently he was attached to the German High Command. He was an active participant in Kommando Kunzberg, whose purpose was the looting of art treasures. Thus, von Etzdorf violated articles 46 and 56 of the Hague Convention, but instead of being punished, he was appointed to a permanent post in the German Foreign Office.

XIII: Dr. Albrecht von Kessel, who is Deputy-Consul-General in Paris was counselor in Ribbentrop's Foreign Office and a close collaborator of the German war criminal, von Weizacker. One of his close collaborators was von Edtsdorf, who was also a leader of a prominent Nazi organization.

XIV: Dr. Wilhelm Melchers, a close collaborator of Dr. Haas in the new German Foreign Office was a Nazi Party member and Legation Counselor up to 1945. He was an active collaborator of von Ribbentrop in the latter's dealings with the notorious Nazi sympathizer, the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem.

XV: Dr. Kurt von Kamphoevner joined the Nazi Party in 1942 because he wanted to prove his patriotism since he had been rejected for service in the army. He served as Legation Counselor and Chief of the Telegraphic Censorship Office under von Ribbentrop. Today he is Consul-General in Turkey.

XVI: Heinz von Falkenstein was a member of the National Socialistic "Senior Association" of the German universities. He was an important figure in the Political Department of the Nazi Foreign Office from 1939 to 1945. He was responsible for the draft of white papers in support of Nazi Foreign Policy and the conduct of Foreign Press Propaganda. Today he is a member of the Commercial Department of the New Foreign Office.

XVII: Dr. Alois Tichy, a colleague of von Falkenstein under von Ribbentrop, was a member of the Nazi Party up to 1945. He served as counselor in the German Embassy in Tokyo. Between 1938 and 1943, he was a judge and high official of the Nazi Party. He has also been assigned to the Commercial Department of the new Foreign Office.

XVIII: Dr. Werner von Bargen is a leading officer in the legal division of the new German Foreign Office. He was a member of the Nazi Party and before the war served as counselor in the German Embassy in Brussels. Though he maintained his innocence with regard to the participation in war crimes, he would never produce the evidence to support his plea.

XIX: Dr. Ulrich von Marshthaler is now German Counselor at the Embassy in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. He was a Nazi Party member and served faithfully up to 1945 as a member of the German Embassy Staff in Tokyo.

XX: Herbert von Strempel, one-time top aide to Nazi Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop and First Secretary of the Nazi Embassy in Washington, where he supplied secret funds to American pro-Nazis, has been appointed to the German Consulate General in Rio de Janeiro.

NOTE:

Although this case is not directly related to the German Foreign Office, it is noteworthy that Dr. Mario Schubert, who served as the press spokesman for Ribbentrop's Foreign Office during the Nazi heyday, has been appointed Deputy Chief of UNESCO in Japan.

Germany Coyly Weighs Our Invitation to the Dance

Chancellor Adenauer of Germany has assured his countrymen that he is entering final negotiations with the Allies in a mood of "optimism and confidence." We wish we felt equal serenity about our dealings with the Bonn regime.

The paradox of contemporary Germany is documented each day in dispatches from that land. As of today most Germans seem torn between two dubious passions. There are some Germans who apparently feel that the free world is pressing too hard to rush German youth into uniform for the defense of Western Europe; there are others who complain that the uniforms we offer are not sufficiently gaudy to justify German enlistment in the fight for freedom. What seems almost totally missing from the German landscape is any awareness that Germany can only live down the hideous barbarism of Nazism by some selfless, ungrudging contributions to the defense of democracy. Nearly all the news from Germany is a mingling of arrogance and petulance against an ominous background of resurgent neo-Nazism.

Some months ago High Commissioner McCloy was sure that talk of a revival of sadistic nationalism was exaggerated. Now he is not so sure. Other observers who have recently visited Germany return with apprehension and despair. The face of the new Germany is neither humble nor compassionate. On many days of the week it bears frightening resemblance to a face we have seen before.

There is no simple formula for dealing with Germany in 1951. We can neither ignore her nor embrace her. We missed great chances immediately after the war when we persistently chose the wrong Germans as our partners. We jumped from the punitive violence of Potsdam to an equally indiscriminate leniency. We never tried hard enough to enlist the men who had courageously resisted Nazism; the Germans on whom we should have pinned our faith were those who emerged from concentration camps, but too often we turned our backs on them. Lately we have been too busy forgiving those who had gone along with the Nazi regime.

Admittedly, all that is history. Now we face an inescapable reality; the Russians, with a generosity toward former Nazis far more cynical and extravagant than any we have shown, are converting Eastern Germany into a fortress. The brown shirts have been dyed red. Passivity is no answer.

Neither, however, is the answer to an obscene wooing of Bonn. Apart from moral considerations, millions in Europe still hate and dread the image of a remobilized Reich. It seems equally plain that the old men of Bonn (and their critics to the Right and Left) neither respect nor understand concession; each soft word evokes bluster and bullying. It is time, we think, for the free world to stop talking about "full partnership" with Germany. What we need is a limited association in which Germans are given some weapons to defend themselves but denied the absurd conditions of military "equality" which they self-righteously demand. If they understand that the day of blackmail is over, they may finally begin to gain a real place in the community of free nations: if blackmail is their game, we are fools to believe we can count on them in the ordeals ahead.

There are valiant Germans—like Berlin's Ernst Reuter—who have a fierce love of freedom and have risked their lives for it. But their voices can hardly be heard amid the uglier sounds of the neo-Nazi chorus, the bellicose bargaining of Bonn and the strident cries of Schumacher nationalism piously disguised as social democracy. The harsh fact is that the democratic cause in Germany is weaker today than it was a year ago (when Secretary Acheson began trying to convince Britain and France to submit to the non-existent German yearning for rearmament). We do not believe this is because we have given Germany too little; it is because we yielded too much too soon.

(An Editorial in The New York Post, September 19, 1951)

"Peron, by his actions against the freedom of the press, has earned the contempt of people who have a decent respect for liberty and for free opinion. He may think that by silencing the opposition he can prolong his racket government. We hope that there is enough remaining independence and self-respect among the Argentines to disabuse him before too long."

(From an editorial in the Chicago Daily Tribune)

. . . "European unity cannot be sacrificed on the altar of German neurosis. Nor can it be held up as the mask for German nationalism. If the Schuman Plan and the European Army are permitted to be no more than the facade for the re-creation of German industrial and military power there will be disasters."

(Michael Straight in The New Republic)

"The most ominous words the writer has heard from a German about the new fascists were these: 'If we do not stop them now they will be in power in five years.' "

(Drew Middleton in the New York Times.)

Walter Winchell notes: "During the past 6 years the United States has given (wasted) over $3 billion to Western Germany. What was designed to inspire a love of democracy has only resulted in a resurgence of Nazism. Endeavoring to buy an ally never shows a profit in friendship.

"Public officials are currently telling us that a major cause of teen-age drug addiction is inadequate education. And the reasons for poor educational facilities is the storage of funds . . . Billions for Germans . . . pennies for American youth."

A Problem That Spells Danger

Last spring the elections in Lower Saxony gave unmistakable evidence of the serious inroads achieved by the neo-Nazi forces in Germany. This has been admitted by many highly placed officials in the Allied High Commission. One of the decisive factors contributing to this anti-democratic development is the role and activities of the German refugees expelled from Eastern Europe.

The refugee problem in Germany is a serious one, although it is not insoluble. In the summer issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III (1950) we predicted that the Germans would play up the plight of these refugees for the following reasons: (a) To assault every remaining safeguard against the resurgence of pan-Germanism and neo-Nazism. (b) To discredit and injure Allied prestige. (c) To shift the responsibility of the present unemployment situation in Germany onto the backs of the Allied occupation. (d) To bolster Germany's case for the rebuilding of her industrial potential far above peacetime requirements. In the above-mentioned article we cited from authoritative sources pertinent facts revealing that the Bonn Government regards "these refugees as pawns in its long range policies which have nothing in common with security or a peacetime German economy."

Last year the London Economist noted that even the exact figure of the number of refugees from the East was unknown. We have seen estimates ranging from 7 million to 10 million. Is it not strange that such elementary facts concerning this important problem are still a matter of speculation? There is no doubt, however, that the refugees make up a significant portion of the huge army of Germans unemployed today. According to the London Economist, the Bonn Government "does not object to having a pool of unemployment at present" because this pool keeps wages low and therefore enables German exporters to undercut competition on the world markets. As a result, hundreds of thousands of German refugees exist on marginal standards of living and are easy prey for the demagogues. Many of them were former Nazi functionaries in the East and are probably ready, given the opportunity, to take up where they left off. Indeed, they are already on the march.

In January of this year the refugees began to organize their forces for the purpose of gaining wider influence in German affairs. They have expert leadership in the persons of former officials in the Nazi regime. For example, the leader of the Refugee Party in Schleswig-Holstein is Waldemer Kraft, Deputy Minister President and Financial Minister of the State. Herr Kraft was at one time President of the agricultural chamber of commerce in the former East German province of Posen, and was a high ranking member in Hitler's Elite Guard. Other former Nazis of more than average standing during the Hitler regime, including Hans Adolph Asbach, a former Gauleiter from Stettin, have won places for themselves as leaders of the refugees.

With this kind of leadership the plight of the refugees is carefully channelized for ulterior motives which should sound the alarm to all security-minded Americans. For example, upon the occasion of a tentative agreement reached in Bonn between two of the major organizations allegedly representing the refugees, a Hamburg newspaper called The Voice of the Expelled declared that while the Germans in the Soviet Zone looked to the West for their need, disillusion is growing on the Western side of the Elbe. The editorial concludes with a familiar echo of Hitler: "Germany for the Germans from Memel to the Saar." In Berlin, former German residents of Danzig voted to set up what amounts to a "government in exile." (New York Times, June 3, 1951) This so-called government will dedicate its efforts toward the return of Danzig (presently the Polish port of Gdynia) to the Germans.

Do the politicians at Bonn give aid and comfort to this revanchinist spirit, or are they doing everything possible to alleviate the present distress of the refugees? Let the facts speak for themselves. In his New Year's broadcast, Theodore Heuss, President of the Federal Government, made it a point to fan the fires of revanchism, declaring that, "Germans whose homes were taken from them hoped to return. . . ." He wasn't as blunt as Herr Jacob Kaiser, the West German Minister for All German Affairs, who, in addressing a rally of refugees in Essen, shouted: "The Saar is German." Commenting on this outburst, the New York Times (May 28, 1951) noted: "They are the same words used as a slogan by Nazi Germany during the agitation before the Saar plebiscite of 1935. They are the words of one of the nationalist songs of pre-war Germany." The New York Times, reporting the views of some of the refugee politicians, quotes one as stating: "The refugees from the East must be given reason to believe that the reclamation of our homeland from Poland and Russian rule will be considered as a joint goal in the program of Western defense." This position need not be elaborated upon, as as it is quite obvious that it is a call for the West to pull Germany's chestnuts out of the fire, even if it takes a war to do so.

Yet this view is shared by the Chancellor of the Bonn Republic, Dr. Adenauer. When he learned that President Truman had asked Congress to end the state of war with Germany he let loose with a typical nationalist outburst. The New York Times (July 10, 1951) noted that: "The caution that has cloaked Dr. Adenauer's past references to rearmament were discarded in his speech which showed him in a militant and even aggressive mood, one well calculated to match the atmosphere of the nation. . . ." In this spirit Dr. Adenauer declared that the build-up of Western power is "most desirable" from the German standpoint, for "only in this way can we get the German East back." Thus the Nazi-like rantings of revenge which permeate the refugee organizations find their echo in the more suave, but nevertheless definite demands of the leading statesman at Bonn. While we do not mean to prejudge the final delimitation of Germany's boundaries, it is our considered judgment that a settlement of this question must be resolved at the conference table. The alternative is ultimately war—a war which would be primarily in Germany's interests and would have nothing to do with the needs of Western defense against the totalitarian East. Certainly the majority of Americans and the Western Allies are not willing to sacrifice one life for the glory of Danzig or the Saar. Yet it is patently clear that the Germans are basing many of their calculations with regard to rearmament on this very premise. As for the refugees, much could be done to help them and try to make them useful citizens, thereby checking the growing fever of nationalism and militarism which is now rampant in their organizations. This depends to a large extent, on the sincerity and willingness of German authorities to get on with the problem.

The fact that Mr. Guy J. Swope, Chief of the Displaced Populations Division of HICOG has expressed his misgivings as to the willingness of the Germans to alleviate the conditions of the refugees, shows that we can hardly depend upon the Bonn Government to take remedial action.

Hundreds of thousands of these refugees are efficient farmers who could be settled on the land, thereby creating stable conditions and by the same token increase the food supply. But German officials, encouraged by the "do-nothing policy" of Allied authorities, have deliberately sabotaged land reform. In the United States Zone alone 1 million 235 thousand acres are owned by 700 individuals and organizations. Four years ago a land reform law was passed which was designed to break up this monopoly and distribute the land among many of the refugees. Only a negligible part of this reform law has been carried out. Yet it has been estimated that sound agricultural reforms would have taken care of 2 million German refugees who could have been resettled on the land.

The fact of the matter is that the Germans will not budge. The Manchester Guardian, July 19, 1951, in discussing the economic implications of the refugee problem, observes that, "Of 350,000 hard, frugal East German farmers, only 21,000 have acquired a small stake in the land of Western Germany. Agricultural plans have foundered on the tardy and insufficient measures of land reform in the laender. The men who grew potatoes on a sandy soil with extreme efficiency and forced that same soil to produce a fair proportion of grain are mostly hired hands. The toughness of the East German farmer has been squandered in a West German economy which has always been lax and in which large areas of land have remained uncultivated."

Further confirmation is found in Commissioner McCloy's Seventh Quarterly Report, wherein it is stated that: "Roughly 40% of the arable land in the Western zones is in grass, and this land is undoubtedly the worst managed of the Federal Republic's agricultural land."

But the German bigwigs prefer to keep the pot boiling. Though they weep for the refugees in public they have other plans which are for private ears only. These politicians plead that the government does not have the necessary finances to help the refugees. They prefer to harp on the Hitlerite slogan, "The Saar is German." They shun solutions which would be effective, because, as The Manchester Guardian declares, if the refugee problem lost its urgency, then the German crusade for the reconquest of her lost territories would fall flat.

These are the pertinent facts concerning the refugee problem and the dangers which it presents to security-minded Americans. Why did Mr. McCloy fail to act when Chancellor Adenauer's government persistently sabotaged the land reform law promulgated by the occupation authorities in 1947? Why has the State Department failed to intervene and take corrective measures?

Meanwhile the Congress has been asked to vote billions for Germany over the years, ostensibly for rehabilitation purposes. Certainly, the American taxpayers and their representatives in Congress are now entitled to a full explanation.

"As long as Germany's security and economic revival depend on the West there is not likely to be a direct threat to democratic procedures. But if Germany becomes the front-line defender of the West, it will naturally seek to rewrite the terms of cooperation in its favor, and at this stage the parties now governing may lose the loyalty of the majority of the electorate. The suicidal blackmail of the right-totalitarians, some of whom advocate joining forces with Soviet imperialism, may not gain them power through the ballot but may be strong enough to destroy confidence between Germany and the West. None of the contributors makes more than a passing reference to the risk that a rearmed Germany may attempt to use power of the Western alliance to recover the Soviet zone and perhaps the lands beyond the Oder-Neisse. Fear of irredentism even more than the risk of revived militarism worries French and other West European leaders and stimulates the search for a formula which will harness the use of German armed strength to European purposes. . . ."

(From Philip E. Mosely's review of "Germany and the Future of Europe," in the New Republic)

"The men who run the smoky collieries and clanging steel mills in the Ruhr say openly they are distrustful of America's German policy.

"Workers in mine and factory seem to echo what their employers say.

"Here are their main themes, expounded repeatedly to American newsmen investigating this vital area:

"America has been too stingy with the Germans.

"America sided with Britain in a dark plot to sabotage Germany's economic future by dismantling.

"America is foolish to expect the Germans to go on paying occupation costs—part of the charges of keeping Allied defense armies in Germany.

"Business chieftains in the Ruhr contend that the four billion dollars in American aid granted to West Germany since the war is not enough. The Germans should get a billion dollars a year, they say.

" 'America is responsible for the Germans' welfare,' one top-flight industrialist commented. 'America will be forced to grant greater aid to Germany.' "

The Triple Threat

by
ISIDORE LIPSCHUTZ

Among the decisive forces in the history of modern Germany which have contributed to her development as a predatory power, there can be no doubt of the enormous influence exercised by the cartels, the banking monopolies, and the coal trusts of the Ruhr. These powerful agents of aggression survived Germany's defeat after World War I and there is ample evidence that they may have weathered the storms of the second world war. In spite of the stated Allied determination to eliminate these evil forces they are again making a strong bid to control the destiny of Germany. If they are successful, then all of the plans which the Allies have devised to integrate Germany into the family of free nations will go for nought. To be forewarned is to be forearmed, and it is with this in mind that we are outlining some of the basic trends in present-day Germany which, if unchecked, portend great danger for the future security and economic stability of the free world.

GERMAN COAL BLOCKADE—SHADES OF THE PAST

In the United States the enormous resources of coal have been utilized for the expansion of our economy. In Western Europe, on the other hand, coal has been used to a large extent as a major instrument for the retardation of economic development. This fact explains in a large measure the economic difficulties which have confronted Western European countries for decades.

When we speak of coal as an instrument for the hampering of economic growth we think of Germany, for one of the main sources of this vital fuel lies within West Germany, particularly in the Ruhr valley. For years the German coal trusts have manipulated the resources of Ruhr coal for purposes of increasing Germany's industrial war potential at the expense of her neighbors. Ruhr coal built up the Kaiser's war machine and enabled the imperial armies to launch their wars against the West. When Germany suffered defeat in 1918 many Allied statesmen believed that the supreme moment had come to deprive the Germans of the ability to use Ruhr coal as a weapon of power politics. They were not successful. Nevertheless, it is instructive to recall how the Germans outmaneuvered the Allies after 1918.

After the end of World War I Western Europe faced a severe economic crisis. France and Belgium were devastated and coal became a matter of life and death for the victims of German aggression. This was recognized at the Peace Conference, and by the Reparations Commission established by the Allied powers in January, 1920. Prior to the establishment of the Reparations Commission emergency programs were adopted under which Germany was to deliver a certain amount of coal to the West. On August 29, 1919 the Germans agreed to furnish the Allies a specific quantity of coal and coke monthly. The maximum quantity of these fuels under the agreement amounted to roughly 3 million 500 thousand tons per month. However, the German Government refused to carry out the agreement.

At the end of April, 1920 the Reparations Commission officially notified Germany that she was expected to deliver 1 million 925 thousand tons of coal in May, 2 million 62 thousand tons in June, and 2 million 175 thousand in July. According to an authoritative study of this problem made under the auspices of the Institute of Economics, Washington, D. C., "early execution of the coal clauses of the Treaty of Versailles was highly unsatisfactory to the Allies." The Germans failed to live up to the agreement made with the Reparations Commission.

As a matter of fact, Germany was delivering no more than one half of the coal necessary to replace the output of the French mines devastated by the German armies. This study further notes that Germany, "was declared in default on coal deliveries before the Treaty of Versailles had been in operation six months. France was in urgent need of additional coal for her general fuel needs and of coke for her iron and steel industry. With the aid of the coke included in the reparations deliveries the iron industry in Lorraine had been slowly recovering its productive capacity. In possession since the war of the blast furnaces of the whole Lorraine district, France was in a position to become one of the great iron producing countries of the world. The Lorraine iron masters were dependent almost exclusively upon Ruhr coke. . . ."

The Germans realized full well that their industrial supremacy in Western Europe was being challenged and therefore they resorted to every kind of ruse to sabotage the growth of the French iron and steel industries. By violating the aforementioned agreements with regard to the export of Ruhr coal, Germany struck a severe blow at France from which the latter never fully recovered, and indeed, served as one of the basic preconditions for Hitler's victories over the French in 1940.

France and her Allies on the continent fought bitterly to thwart the dilatory tactics of the Germans. On the other hand, the Germans felt that, "Every possible measure should be taken to prove that little or nothing could be paid or delivered." The Allies became so desperate that they finally decided in the famous Conference of Spa in July, 1920, to pay the Germans a stipulated price for Ruhr coal. The financial concessions made to the Germans were extremely favorable to them. The Spa Conference provided that the Germans would receive five gold marks in cash for every ton delivered to the Allies. The premium was paid outright and did not represent a loan. In addition, the Allies agreed to make loans equal in amount to the difference between the internal price of German coal and its export price.

In discussing this amazing concession, the abovementioned study observes: "For all practical purposes the money involved in this transaction was equivalent to the payment at rather high prices for the greater part of the coal delivered. . . ."

In the first six months covered by the agreement it has been estimated that Germany actually realized in foreign exchange an amount equal to 400 million gold marks or nearly 100 million dollars. But even this agreement which was so advantageous to the Germans was shortlived, and by January 21 German exports of coal fell precipitously. This, in spite of the fact that Germany, according to the study, had available for domestic consumption, even after coal deliveries on the reparations account, considerably more coke than before the war. When the Germans were asked to explain their sabotaging tactics to the experts of the Reparation Commission, the German representatives, as could be expected, squealed and whined about the alleged economic plight of the fatherland, in spite of the fact that Germany was consuming "much more coke in relation to her pig iron production than was consumed in the same territory before the war."

It is well to bear in mind that the huge financial sums that Germany received for Ruhr coal were supposed to be applied toward the acquisition of needed foodstuffs for the German miners. But the German Government had other ideas with regard to the use of these funds. Wages were deliberately kept low while the German Government began to subsidize German manufacturers to expand their heavy industrial potential while the Allies were caught in the net of the German coal blockade.

This in brief is the story of how the Germans used their monopoly of Ruhr coal to undermine the economies of the nations she had invaded during World War I. Toward the end of the second world war it seemed as though Allied statesmen had absorbed the lessons of German duplicity. Solemn pledges were made to the effect that Germany's victims would have priority in recovery and that the German monopolists would be deprived of their control of Ruhr coal. These pledges remained pledges and nothing more.

Very early in the Allied occupation of Germany it became evident that insidious forces were at work to undermine these pledges and to enable the Germans to regain economic mastery of Western Europe. PREVENT WORLD WAR III has carried numerous authoritative articles on this development. Yet the facts cited in these studies went unheeded and as a result our Western Allies began to lose out in the struggle for economic recovery vis-a-vis Germany.

Recent events shed new light on this fact. The Germans, convinced, thanks to Allied present policy, that they are the "indispensable bulwark" against the Communist hordes, are brazenly refusing to cooperate with our Western Allies in the vital matter of the distribution of Ruhr coal.

For the last year and a half, West Germany has consistently fought the requests of the Coal Commission of the Economic Commission for Europe to cooperate in the matter of exporting Ruhr coal and coke, which is necessary to meet the requirements of our Western Allies. Though the ECE has no powers to enforce its recommendations, they are usually followed by the coal-producing countries of Europe. In the case of Germany, it is the International Ruhr Authority which is ultimately responsible for the distribution of Ruhr coal and coke in accordance with the recommendations of the ECE. It is for this reason that the Germans have endeavored by every means possible to discredit and eliminate the International Ruhr Authority. An example of how the Germans have operated within the International Ruhr Authority may be seen from the fact that they have objected violently to the International Ruhr Authority's decision that West Germany should export 6.2 million tons of coal during the fourth quarter of 1951. The Germans demanded that this quota be cut by at least a million tons. When the Authority rejected the German demand, Vice-Chancellor Franz Bluecher, who was the German representative on the Authority, walked out of the Conference in a huff. As the Chairman of the Free Democratic Party, which is the second largest party in Chancellor Adenauer's coalition government, Bluecher's actions take on important political significance. Incidentally, Bluecher was a top official in the National Bank in Essen during the days when Hitler was running rampant throughout Europe. The National Bank was associated with the notorious Deutsche Bank. In the December 1949 issue of the Pan-German publication, Der Weg, which is published by the Nazis in Argentina, Bluecher was quoted as having said: "We will have to have a serious talk with the occupying powers about the amnesty of all those condemned for political reasons after 1945." Needless to say, this could even include Hitler if he were alive and in prison.

Bluecher's action was hailed by Herr August Martin Euler, the leader of the Free Democrats in the Bonn Parliament. Herr Euler, according to Business Week, September 8, 1951, "demanded, apparently with Chancellor Adenauer's approval, that the Allies drop the Ruhr Authority and all other controls or else the Free Democrats would vote against the Schuman Plan when it comes up for final approval in October."

To this the voice of Kurt Schumacher, the chauvinistic leader of the Social Democrats, was added. The coal barons of the Ruhr had given the signal and their puppets in the Parliament had gone to work. Not only are the Germans refusing to meet the quotas set up by the International Ruhr Authority, but they are trying to raise the export price of coal by as much as 3.50 a ton. The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, in an editorial, charged the Ruhr Authority with offering "'dead statistics' as an explanation of its 'reparations' policy—a bitter word indeed, in German ears." (July 13, 1951, the New York Times.)

Even the German Federation of Labor chimed in and stated that the International Ruhr Authority program must be drastically revised, "as a precondition for union support for the Schuman Plan." (New York Times, July 15.)

The Germans and their propagandists have spread all kinds of fables concerning the coal situation in Germany and in Western Europe. They are the same fables which the Germans spread after World War I, and if they go unanswered, will surely lead to the same results which made it possible for Germany to dominate her neighbors by the time Hitler seized power. Fortunately the facts are known and they are sufficient to refute the half truths pumped out by the obedient politicians and propagandists employed by the Bonn Government. These facts have been clearly set forth in Background Letter, published by the British High Commission for Germany. This publication notes that if the Allies had insisted on application of the principles of equality between Ruhr coal exports of 1951 and those of 1950, the International Ruhr Authority would have been justified in calling for the export of 6 million 550 thousand tons for the fourth quarter rather than the requested 6 million 250 thousand tons which represents, "a further sacrifice on the part of European countries."

Indeed, the Letter reveals that the International Ruhr Authority went so far as to offer the Germans an allocation of only 6 million tons, but the Germans, as usual, wanted still greater concessions. Moreover, it is brought out that the total allocations of solid fuels for export from the Bonn Government amounted to 21.9 million tons in 1950, while the total for the present year would be 21.3 million tons. In 1950 the Bonn Republic had at its disposal no less than 88.2 million tons of hard coal. In 1951, on the basis of the actual results of the first half of the present year, and on the forecasts of German authorities for the second half of the year, the Bonn Republic would have at its disposal no less than 96.5 million tons. Thus the Germans would have at their disposal in 1951, "for the satisfaction of their internal requirements, about 8 million tons of hard coal more than in 1950." This figure excludes the tonnage which the Bonn Republic may be expected to receive from the United States. In contrast, the countries importing German coal, as a whole, while requiring roughly 75% more than the Bonn Government, "will, since German exports are being maintained at appreciably the same level as in the preceding year, have their own availabilities increased by only 3.7 million tons of hard coal."

The Germans cannot refute these facts. Nor can they deny the charges of the Military Government that there is a thriving black market for coal in Germany itself. Business Week points out that the Germans want to maintain a "business as usual" policy as evidenced by the fact, for instance, that car production is running at full capacity for domestic and foreign markets. Apparently the Germans have the coal when they want it.

It goes without saying that German power politics with regard to Ruhr coal may have devastating effects in the member nations of the Atlantic Defense system. Due to the shortage of Ruhr coal and coke, speedy rearmament in Western Europe is problematical. French steel producers have been forced to limit production to 85% of capacity and may have to use precious dollars for the import of American coal, when only a few miles across the border there is a plentiful supply of Ruhr coal. As many press reports indicate, the Germans are employing their stalling techniques primarily to recapture the leadership of the heavy industries of Western Europe before the Schuman Plan comes into effect. In addition to working havoc on the vital rearmament program under the leadership of General Eisenhower, the new coal blockade is creating more misery for hundreds of thousands of workers in the Allied countries. One can hardly be optimistic in the face of these conditions, especially since they threaten the general unity of Western Europe in the face of Communist danger. The united front of German politicians egged on by the coal barons of the Ruhr, is not a happy spectacle to behold. Unfortunately, the Allied High Commission seems to be sitting this one out. Their treatment of the German coal cartels is but one aspect of the present decartelization situation. The failure to break up the German coal cartels is an important factor in the present German attitude.

"The western Allies are getting impatient at what they call the unwillingness of West Germans to make any real sacrifices for the common cause of western defense.

. . . "Every time the Allies come down to the point and press for a German guarantee for scrap deliveries to the United States and Britain, or for assistance in finding barracks for troops, the Germans make difficulties, Allied officials said.

. . . "Officials listed a few points on which the Germans had been hedging for weeks or months. They included:

"Finding a suitable sandbank as an alternative bombing target for Heligoland.

"Finding barracks for troops and open spaces for airfields.

"Paying the full bill of occupation costs, which includes large contributions toward the maintenance of the Allied reinforcement troops.

"Producing iron and steel scrap for export to the British and American armaments industries.

"Supplying the coal demanded by the International Ruhr Authority for continental European countries.

"Taking adequate economic measures to restrict home consumption of steel, coal, power, and motor vehicles so that more are available for the western defense effort."

The lesson to be learned from this story is simple enough. If the Germans act as they do now with regard to cooperation with the West, what can be expected of them when they obtain full sovereignty?

THE REVIVAL OF THE BANKING MONOPOLIES

In November, 1946, the Finance Division of the U. S. Military Government for Germany prepared a report based on exhaustive investigations of the role and activities of the Deutsche Bank during the Hitler regime. The report recommended that, (1) "the Deutsche Bank be liquidated," (2) "the responsible officials of the Deutsche Bank be indicted and tried as war criminals," (3) "the leading officials of the Deutsche Bank be barred from positions of importance or responsibility in German economic or political life."

The report contained a wealth of authentic documents to support the aforementioned recommendations. Fact after fact was cited proving that the Deutsche Bank was one of the most powerful organs of Nazi domination and aggression. Indeed, it led the whole pack of predatory institutions in looting German occupied Europe and providing the financial means by which Hitler and his cohorts were able to rearm and launch their assaults upon humanity. Together with the Dresdner Bank and the Commerz Bank, the Deutsche Bank monopolized German financial life and acted as the spearhead for the Nazi Government "in the economic penetration of the annexed, occupied, and satellite countries of Europe." Though the report was devoted in the main to the activities of the Deutsche Bank, it did describe the Dresdner Bank as an institution "whose aggressiveness . . . had become a byword in Germany in a race for commissions and profits out of Aryanization transactions."

That the Deutsche Bank was one of the main props of the Nazi regime was admitted by the German banker, Baron Kurt von Schroeder, the "midwife of Nazism." What was done to carry out the recommendations of this report? Was the Deutsche Bank liquidated? It was not! It is true that a law was passed by the military government designed to reorganize the German banking system along the lines of our own Federal Reserve System. This so-called reorganization took place shortly after currency reforms were instituted, and had as its main objective the breaking up of the powerful banking monopolies, particularly the Deutsche Bank, the Dresdner Bank, and the Commerz Bank. The plan called for the setting up of a central reserve bank for all of Germany which was called the Bank Deutscher Laender (BDL). Moreover, each of the eleven states in the German West Federation was given its own autonomous central bank which was directly linked to the BDL. The BDL was granted enormous powers of credit and ostensibly was to be the ultimate controller of currency issues throughout Western Germany. The three major private banks were supposed to have been split up so that according to the regulations, no private bank could maintain branches in more than one state.

This was the paper reform, but in reality, little of significance was changed. This is confirmed by Mr. J. Lanner writing in "Economica," the publication of the London School of Economics (May, 1951). Discussing the reform law, Mr. Lanner writes "the Decentralizing Law did not dissolve these joint stock banks so that legally they are still in existence. . . ." Mr. Lanner's observations are supported by another authority on the subject, Hans Adler, the former chief of the banking section for the United States Military Government in Germany. Writing in the Quarterly Journal of Economics (August, 1949), Mr. Adler notes that in spite of the reform law, "no changes were made in the ownership of the banks." Moreover, he admits that "the German banks were making strenuous efforts to reestablish their previous positions and reintroduce the centralist controls torn apart in the last months of the war."

Outlining some of the attempts made by the three banking monopolies to regain their former control, Mr. Adler informs us that while "these central offices (of the three banking monopolies) were not supposed to exercize any control over their branches outside the British Zone, they attempted constantly to reassert their position. When, for example, instructions from these offices were no longer permitted as orders, they were quite effective forwarded as 'information.'" Mr. Adler's descriptions of the ruses employed by the banking monopolies to evade Allied control and to encourage their branches throughout West Germany to do likewise, is fully confirmed in the report of the Military Government investigators. Thus, it can be seen that these banking monopolies were not abolished.

The second recommendation of the report called for the indictment and prosecution of the responsible officials of the Deutsche Bank as war criminals. Efforts were made to treat the key officials of the Dresdner Bank in a similar manner. The fact of the matter is, however, that not one of the leading officials of any of these three leading banking monopolies was indicted or tried as a war criminal by the Allies.

The third recommendation called for prohibiting the leading officers of the Deutsche Bank from regaining positions of importance or responsibility in German economic or political life. What are the facts? As early as December 12, 1949, the New York Times published a dispatch from Frankfurt, Germany, entitled, "Old Bankers Back in West Germany." The Times went on to state that these leading figures of the big German banks "during the Nazi period are making their way back into banking institutions in West Germany and initiating practices that appear to be developing into monopolies. . . ." The Times dispatch noted that the activities of these bankers "could result in the creation of banking monopolies which would grow almost unseen and suddenly emerge in full strength." Thus we find that the fundamental requirements for the elimination of the sinister influences of the German banking monopolies have been ignored completely.

Instead we find a new situation, if it can be called that, whereby even the original reforms are being emasculated beyond recognition. According to the New York Herald Tribune correspondent, John Elliott (July 29, 1951), a new agreement is in the making whereby the commercial banking system of West Germany will be put on a new basis. "The new accord," writes Mr. Elliott, "tolls the death knell of the postwar attempts of the Allies to decentralize that country's credit institutions." Mr. Elliott further observes that "under the present system each of these banks (the three banking monopolies) is subdivided into eleven institutions, one in each state. Thus three banks under the proposed reform will replace the existing thirty-three institutions." The central offices of the Deutsche Bank will be established at Munich, while those of the Commerz Bank and the Dresdner Bank will be set up at Stuttgart and Frankfurt respectively.

Mr. Elliott believes that this set-up "constitutes a great victory for the Germans" and destroys the original plan aimed at breaking up these monopolies. The Elliott article, however, does not mention the source of this new "Allied Plan." In reality, the plan is the product of the German banking monopolists themselves. It was originally proposed in detail in June, 1950, by Herman J. Abs, Carl Goetz, and Paul Marx. Herr Abs is the former top officer of the Deutsche Bank. Paul Marx was a leading figure in the Commerz Bank and Carl Goetz played a similar role in the Dresdner Bank. The three men were among those described by the War Department in March, 1945, as having "in an outstanding way thrived under National Socialism, who welcomed it in the beginning, aided the Nazis to obtain power, supported them in office, shared the spoils of expropriation and conquest, or otherwise markedly benefited in their careers or fortunes under the Nazis." By the original standards of the Allied occupation these men should have been tried as war criminals. Instead they have not only returned to power, but have been allowed to dictate Allied policy as to the future of the German banking system.

The record of Herr Abs is particularly notorious as revealed by Senator Guy Gillette last year when he discovered that Herr Abs had sneaked into this country to gather up the loose ends of the connecting links between the German banking monopolies and their helpers in the United States. When Senator Gillette publicly exposed Abs as one of Hitler's most important financial supporters and a leading spirit in the Deutsche Bank's looting of Europe, Abs beat a hasty retreat to the Fatherland. Nevertheless, he is one of the most powerful figures in Germany today. In a detailed study of the German banks (see March-April, No. 34 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, 1950) the U. S. News and World Report of July 29, 1949, is quoted as follows: "Men who were powers of German banking and investment operations before and during the war are back in positions of influence. Herman Abs, a Berlin banker who was highly regarded by Hjalmar Schacht during the Nazi rise often is called 'the most powerful man in Germany. . . .' Now he is head of a German corporation set up to finance the growth of industry. In his new job he dominates industrial investment in reviving Germany." In the above mentioned article we had expressed misgivings as to the effectiveness of the Allied banking reforms. On the basis of what is now known to be taking place in Germany, it seems as though our fears were justified. The plan of Herren Abs, Goetz and Marx is, for all intents and purposes, the very plan disclosed by Mr. Elliott, which in effect reestablishes the power of the German banking monopolies.

As mentioned above, even before the new plan was disclosed, the bigwigs of the German banking fraternity had spared no effort to preserve their stranglehold. They attempted to dupe Allied officials by trickery and falsehood. They issued propaganda to the effect that decentralization would bring complete collapse of the German economy and would weaken public confidence. According to Mr. Adler, however, the doom they prophesized did not materialize. "There was in fact no run on the banks, no increase in withdrawals, no attempts to transfer funds into other zones, and the stock quotations of the affected banks, after a temporary decline, reached new heights a few months afterwards." But the German bankers would not rest. So long as there were even paper reforms they felt their monopolies would be threatened. Therefore, they appointed three of their ringleaders to propose a scheme that would legalize the former banking monopolies. They concocted dubious arguments aimed at justifying the resurgence of the German big banks. Mr. Lanner, in his detailed analysis easily contradicts the main arguments put forth by these gentlemen. In spite of the fact that Mr. Lanner supports the reemergence of the banking monopolies, he admits, after demolishing the rationalizations of the German bankers "that the German banks could function reasonably well even on the basis of their present organization."

As matters now stand, it seems that the arguments of Abs and his colleagues have won the day. Once again these German banks will be in a position to dominate private industry and also to seize control of the credit and finances of the Bonn Government. This promises to duplicate the situation which existed in Germany prior to the war. The old Reichsbank which was the central bank for Germany had little effective control over the credit and financial policies of the three big banks. These monopolies were allowed to accumulate huge reserves and as a result they were in a position to create and carry out their own credit and financial policies regardless of the wishes of the Weimar Government. Subsequently, these reserves were used to finance Hitler into power. There is every reason to believe that under the Abs Plan, these monopolies will again be able to manipulate the credit and finances of West Germany through the accumulation of huge reserves uncontrolled by the government.

The scheme cooked up by Abs has had the blessings of the Chancellor of the Bonn Republic, Dr. Adenauer, who was at one time a member of the Board of Directors of the Deutsche Bank. It was backed by Ade-

"The Western Powers and the Bonn Government are concerned, and even alarmed, over the resurgence of Nazism in Germany. . . . This political phenomenon may have far-reaching significance for the future of all Europe. . . .

"For it is more than a revival of the Nazi philosophy in Germany, deplorable as that is. If this movement grows, it may bring about a coalition between Germany and Soviet Russia, with catastrophic repercussions upon the whole plan for defending the West. . . .

"We are confronted once more with the danger that a resurgent Germany will cast its lot with the great Slavic empire to the East. The Nazi philosophy, after all, is not too seriously in conflict with the Communist ideology. . . .

"What seems to be happening is that the moderate middle-of-the-roaders are losing ground, and the Nazis on the Right and the Socialists on the Left are gaining. Stalin must be smiling saturninely behind the walls of the Kremlin."

(From the Richmond Times-Dispatch)

nauer's chief financial advisor, a leading figure in Germany's steel industry, the Cologne banker, Pferdmenges, who works on very close terms with Abs. It seems that Pferdmenges' ambitions are limitless, for he is intent on exerting direct influence on the whole banking system under the Abs plan. Thus he has made a deal with Abs under which in return for establishing the head office of the Deutsche Bank in Munich, of all places, the Central Bank (BDL) will be removed from its Frankfurt headquarters to Cologne where Pferdmenges will be able to exercize direct influence on its policies.

Despite these developments our leading officials in Germany, including Mr. McCloy, remain serene and confident. In his Seventh Quarterly Report he assures us that "substantial progress has been made in the field of deconcentrating the three banks." He does not mention the Abs Plan, nor does he speak of the key role played by those members of the German banking fraternity who should have been tried as war criminals. Nor does he disclose that the German banks will once again be able to play a dominant role in German industry through the emasculation of Decartelization Law No. 27. Mr. McCloy's omissions become understandable if we bear in mind the fact that all of his efforts have been devoted to the revival of German "efficiency." Has Mr. McCloy forgotten that this so-called German efficiency has brought ruin and misery to the world twice within one generation?

UNDERMINING THE DECARTELIZATION AND DECONCENTRATION PROGRAM

In his Seventh Quarterly Report on Germany, U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy boasts that: "The Allied program should also be an assurance that excessive concentration of economic power will not again in Germany help to create an excessive concentration of political power." Undoubtedly the original aims of the Allies and in particular of the United States, were to achieve this very objective. But there is a yawning gap between the goal and what is actually taking place in Germany today.

It will be recalled that as early as 1948 the former Secretary of the Army, Kenneth C. Royall, publicly announced that the pernicious cartels had been abolished in Germany. Mr. Royall was overly optimistic, as discovered by the Ferguson Committee, appointed by the President to investigate the cartel situation in Germany. This committee found that not only were the cartels untouched for the most part, but that leading American officials had been sabotaging the decartelization and deconcentration programs all along. Many of these details have been published in a series of articles in PREVENT WORLD WAR III under the caption, "Was the Decartelization Program Sabotaged?" These studies cited incontrovertible evidence attesting to the fact that the decartelization program was undermined with the connivance of powerful cartellists both here and in Germany.

Then why does Mr. McCloy share the "optimism" of the former Secretary of the Army? Perhaps he was referring to Law No. 27 which was supposed to break up German combines and cartels. We have analyzed Law No. 27 in previous issues of PREVENT WORLD WAR III and have shown that many of its provisions are inadequate, to say the least. Nevertheless, given the will on the part of responsible Allied authorities in Germany, Law 27 could produce desirable results. But even Law 27 has been reinterpreted to meet the convenience and wishes of the Germans.

Law 27, for example, had as one of its aims the decartelization of the coal combines of the Ruhr. However, on July 17, 1951, the Allied High Commission announced that no less than 36 coal combines would be exempted from the decartelization law. The Associated Press, commenting on this action, declares that it resulted in a "victory for the Germans."

The failure to include these 36 coal trusts in the reorganization plan under Law 27 prompted J. B. Hynd, Member of the British Parliament, to ask his Government some pertinent questions on the subject. Mr. Ernest Davies, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, imparted the following information: On July 12 the question of reorganizing the Ruhr coal combines was discussed by the Allied High Commission. The British element was in favor of the inclusion of these companies, "on the grounds that their exclusion would seriously reduce the scope of reorganization, that the reorganization plan . . . had been drawn up by a body of German experts who had urged that it should be accepted in its entirety, and that the German trade unions, whose support for Allied deconcentration measures was important, had pressed strongly for the inclusion of these companies."

According to Mr. Davies, the American and French High Commissioners rejected these arguments, stressing that the "Federal Chancellor had expressed the view that compulsory inclusion would not be legitimate." Thus the Allies meekly submitted to Herr Adenauer's diktat, and the coal trusts were exempted from deconcentration measures. This is not a mere rewrite of Law 27, but in effect, Herr Adenauer succeeded in establishing his own "law" which the Allies have consented to obey. It is interesting to note that a coal company controlled by Herr Adenauer's son-in-law was among the 36 coal companies exempted from deconcentration.

Another coal combine which came under the protective wing of the Chancellor belongs to the I. G. Farben cartel. The good fortune of the Farben empire is recorded in the rise of its common shares. In 1950 these shares were quoted at 70. By October, 1951 they rose to 120. Apparently I. G. Farben has many lives. Time and again the press has reported the "break up" of the Farben empire. But from all the facts available, this break up is merely a paper affair. Indeed, the Allies have made certain that the so-called new companies to be formed out of Farben itself will distribute their shares among former Farben shareholders. This means that the ownership of I. G. Farben will not substantially change.

While the 36 coal combines have been spared from deconcentration measures, the monopolistic coal selling organizations of Germany which were to be abolished under the Schuman Plan, remain intact. The Manchester Guardian of September 13 makes this clear: "Coal has produced a second controversy. The American High Commission has sent a stiff note to Chancellor Adenauer asking why nothing has been done to break up the old 'monopolistic' German coal-selling body, the D. K. V. While the British were disposed to allow this body to continue to exist, both the Americans and French asked for its dissolution. The German Government did, in fact, agree to this and in return secured Allied concessions over the splitting-up of the steel companies and their detachment from coal interests. This has now been conveniently forgotten and German papers are writing that a situation has arisen which may prevent the ratification of the Schuman Plan. . . ."

A careful study of the modifications of Law No. 27 as announced on July 17 shows that Mr. McCloy's optimism is wholly unwarranted. The document is technical in parts and does not make for easy reading, but throughout its contents there runs a single theme which is played over and over again, namely that when the Germans demand certain changes, the Allies obligingly meet these requests.

With regard to the ownership of the "new" coal and iron and steel companies, it is clear that under the reorganization plan the ownership will revert back to the very same forces which provided the sinews of Hitler's war making power. Moreover, the Allies have assured Chancellor Adenauer that in accordance with his demands, Allied responsibility in carrying out this reorganization would, in effect, be purely of a nominal character, that in essence the Germans themselves will take charge. Finally, the Allied memorandum states that, in order "to conform to joint stock company practices in Germany" as demanded by the Chancellor, the Allies have consented to make "important modifications" which will contain "only the bare minimum of provisions essential to allow the new unit companies to develop as independent enterprises."

Even those of us who are not familiar with the intricacies of corporate procedures and control will understand that by these modifications shadow has been substituted for substance and that, in effect, Law No. 27 has been turned into its opposite, namely a plan for the preservation of the German combines and cartels.

In his Seventh Quarterly Report on Germany Mr. McCloy declares that, "It has been agreed that their charters (of the new unit companies) will prohibit interlocking directorates." In view of the changes in the statutes governing these unit companies referred to above, it seems to us that Mr. McCloy is too optimistic on this point.

These new unit companies in the steel and coal industries may be given new names, but a change in name does not mean that the structure of German heavy industry has been subject to significant changes. The vertical steel trusts are maintained and indeed, even strengthened. As a politician who has been long familiar with the Ruhr industry, Dr. Adenauer knew exactly what the Ruhr barons desired. He has faithfully protected the interests of the German steel cartel, particularly the Vereinigte Stahlwerke.

Since the end of the war the Vereinigte Stahlwerke has enjoyed a remarkable recovery. Before the war the capital stock of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke amounted officially to 462 million marks. By the end of 1949, in spite of war damage and dismantling, the value of the capital stock rose to 575 million DM. The insiders connected with this huge concentration of economic power were never really disturbed over the Allied decartelization and deconcentration program. In September, 1949 the stock of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke was quoted at 16¾. On November 23, the day after the agreement with the Allies was signed at Petersberg, the value of the stock reached 71. By the end of September, this year, the stock had jumped to 122.

Other steel trusts in the Ruhr experienced a similar rise in the value of their assets and stock. One of the largest of these firms in the Rhur, the Kloeckner Co., boasted that, "In spite of war and post-war damage, our assets and capital stock can be regarded as saved."

It is clear from these facts that the Allies have hardly scraped the surface in terms of decartelizing and deconcentrating German heavy industry. This brings us back to Mr. McCloy's assurances that the Allied deconcentration and decartelization program would prevent the rebirth of excessive concentration of political power. Here again Mr. McCloy exhudes an optimism which is not shared by those who know better. The German Trade Union Federation has threatened to withdraw from cooperation with the Bonn Government because it is dissatisfied with the present situation in the Ruhr.

In a memorandum to the Government, the Union Federation declared in no uncertain terms that the same economic setup which thrived under Hitler is now reviving in the Ruhr. Moreover, the Federation accused the Allied High Commissioners of virtually restoring the pre-war structure of ownership. It declared that the old iron and steel trusts are steadily building up their influence in the Federal Government.

An American trade unionist who has an outstanding reputation, was even more blunt on this score. Mr. Walter Reuther, after a visit to the Ruhr in December, 1949 stated that he was shocked to see how the British and American authorities had handed over control "to the same old gang who helped Hitler to power and helped him to wage war." Mr. Reuther added: "This is a real threat to democracy in Germany and the world."

From this brief round-up of current economic developments in Germany it is clear that the triple threat of the coal trusts, the banking monopolies, and the cartels has once again cast its shadow over Germany and Europe.

Our readers know that we in the Society have striven through the years to forewarn them of this menace. It is our firm conviction that if it is allowed to spread its power and influence it will surely endanger our own security and economic welfare.

An Expert's View On Germany Today

(Resume of Remarks by Dr. Hans Simons, President of the New School for Social Research, at Press Conference held upon his return from Western Germany, Wednesday, August 15, 1951.)

1. With the establishment of contractual relations between the three Occupying powers in Western Germany, the period of direct interference in internal affairs comes to an end. What has not been accomplished under the Occupation Statute cannot be accomplished now. American opportunities for influence will not be different from what they are in France, Italy, or other aid-receiving countries.

2. External impressions are misleading. Undoubtedly, the economic recovery of Western Germany is impressive. The machinery of government is working smoothly. Democratic institutions are well established. At the same time, the anti-democratic forces are growing rapidly. The balance and relationship are changing ominously to the disadvantage of the democratic elements.

3. The anti-democratic forces are not, as is usually assumed, the refugees and expellees. They are rather those former National Socialists who find it safe to make their reappearance, farmers who had a better time before the currency reform, and the small-town elites who exercise a strong influence on the rural vote. They get succour from former soldiers who quite understandably try to reestablish the reputation of their war achievements. Veteran organizations are springing up everywhere. They will be supported by the younger students who seem to fall back into the worst patterns of pre-first world war university life.

4. "Anti-democratic" is not yet a clearly defined attitude. However, it expresses violent and vicious criticism of political parties, parliaments, and professional politicians, and finds a common target of attack in the Occupation authorities. Particularly the former National Socialists, who are only now free to come back into their professions and to public life, and who therefore did not have any official contacts with the Occupation, are making virtue of necessity and advertising themselves as non-collaborationists.

At the same time, they are trying to make their own past more acceptable by romanticizing and sentimentalizing the National Socialist regime and the people who supported it.

In this process they stress German sufferings without ever linking them at all to the National Socialist regime which caused them.

5. There is a general attitude of callousness where everybody looks out for himself only. This is true of the parties as much as of individuals. The lack of social responsibility, of any willingness to sacrifice, and of any understanding of the claims of others, is one of the greatest handicaps in German life today. It is bound to affect Western Germany's role in international cooperation.

6. Everybody realizes that there is no alternative to Germany's making her contribution to Western defenses. Nevertheless, this proposition is still very unpopular, particularly with the people of draft age who, while admitting the necessity, are individually decided not to do any fighting.

The Federal Republic gives every evidence that it is willing to defend itself on the inner front. Recently the Penal Code was amended in order to safeguard the democratic institutions. However, the law is so formulated that it can easily be misused if applied by the wrong people.

As for external defense, those in charge are making an impressive effort to keep the military establishment under civilian control, and to avoid any damage which the reintroduction of a military establishment could produce. Nevertheless, those who are going to join the German element within the European army will have a very limited incentive, particularly if compared with the issues which made them fight well during the last war.

7. At best, Germany will be as reliable an ally as any other country which allies itself with the United States exclusively for reasons of its own. Some of our other allies do not have an alternative. This is true, for instance, for Spain and Yugoslavia. The trouble is that what with the international situation and the geographical position of Germany it has an alternative—and there are quite some people who are willing to consider it.

8. One cannot say that reorientation in Western Germany was successful. Rather, those with democratic intentions were helped and strengthened, particularly by the American reorientation program. Yet on the whole we are preaching to the converted. We have not reached a vast number of those who still are primarily Nationalists and who resent the very fact that we should try to influence them. Just the same, we too have no alternative because defending Western Europe without the Germans would ask for an American sacrifice of a magnitude which public opinion here obviously is not willing to accept.

"Dr. Schumacher's long-term gamble, which is simply that the Social Democratic party must be strongly nationalist, is paying off at present. The party's opposition to Washington decisions is based on the fact that they do not go far enough toward German sovereignty; its opposition to the German defense contribution is based on the contention that it is not enough and places West German defense under alien, i.e., French, control; and its opposition to the Schuman Plan is based on the argument that it 'benefits French industrialists at the expense of the German worker.'

". . . Behind this attitude lies a bubbling nationalism which always comes to the surface whenever Germany is about to receive another major concession from the Allied powers."

Inside Germany

EVADING THEIR RESPONSIBILITY

"The nine million embittered German 'expellees' from the East, constitute a serious menace to the Bonn republic's newly founded democracy.

. . . "Western democrats have looked askance at German fumbling of this crucial task. Aware of the implications, the Economic Cooperation Administration last year organized a joint American-German Technical Assistance Mission to examine the situation.

. . . "The mission was quick to go to the root of the unsolved problem—the anti-social policies pursued by the West German Economic Minister, Ludwig Erhard, and the chronic evasion of responsibility by the German state and local governments. Its report is sharply critical of German tax policies, which are overindulgent toward business and upper-income groups, and of the lax economic controls which allowed Germany to overdraw her European Payments Union funds to import luxuries, while large sections of her population did not have the minimum of subsistence."

THE "THIRD FORCE"

"The Chairman of the Fascistic First Legion, Schmalz; the second president of the so-called German Union, Greismeyer; the attorney for the defense at Nuremberg trials, Dr. Aschenbach; the former German Fascist Minister to Mussolini, Rahn; and Dr. Enrich of the German Party, held a meeting in Cologne in order to found a central organization of all the West German Fascist organizations, grouped together under the name of the 'Third Force' . . . These fascist organizations believe the time is ripe to unite all the splinter groups in one general orientation."

(As reported in Neues Deutschland)

"The lack of moral standards leads to another phenomenon: the collaboration between Nazis and Communists. Small neo-Nazi parties are reported to have accepted slush money from the Red Army headquarters. The most powerful group of ex-officers, the Bruderschaft, consists of two groups, one in Western and other in Eastern Germany, whose cooperation is evidenced by the meeting between a leader of the Bruderschaft, Franke-Grietsch, and a delegate of the National Front of the Eastern Zone, former General von Lenski, to discuss coordination and cooperation between the two organizations. . . .

"The lack of revulsion against Nazism is evidenced nowhere more clearly than in the composition of the administration of the Federal Republic. Most of the former high Nazi officials returned, after a mock denazification, to their former or similar positions. Nobody seems to care about it. . . .

"Are the Allies willing to pay the price in return for the cooperation of a questionable ally of such questionable moral standard?"

(From Nehemiah Robinson in the Congress Weekly)

THE GOOD OLD DAYS ARE BACK

"The State Department charged that the Free German Youth Organization, the host to the world youth festival in the Soviet zone of Berlin, bore close resemblance to the former Hitler youth movement.

"It was an organization that could develop only in a totalitarian state, the Department declared in a formal statement based on a study conducted by the Office of Public Affairs."

REMILITARIZATION PROGRESS IN EAST GERMANY

"The British High Commissioner's office charged today that units of the People's Police in East Germany were being trained as 'potential operational units' rather than as police. The British also charged that the force was heavily weighted with Russian officers and with Germans fresh from a year's military training in the Soviet Union.

"The accusations were contained in the longest and most detailed statement made by the Western Allies on the rearmament of East Germany.

(From a special dispatch to the New York Times)

"German recriminations against their Western conquerors are more open and intemperately hostile than at any time in the six years of occupation. Allied impatience and frustration are similarly waxing."

". . . The complaints are being coupled with threats; threats to refuse to arm Germans for the Atlantic Pact forces, threats to withdraw from Schuman Plan commitments even muttered hints to turn entirely from the West.

"And on the other side, Allied statemen here profess the greatest irritation at both the complaints and the threats. They note with asperity that the Western conquerors have steadily and rapidly conceded freedom and authority to the Germans but that with each concession the demands became louder and more acrimonious."

". . . In sum, the Germans are using the freedom of the press and political utterance which the Allies have granted them to turn more sharply on Allied personnages and policies than ever before. At the same time, they venture to accuse them of 'selfishness' and 'failure to sympathize with Germany's great needs and problems.' Over and over German political figures and editorialists are asking, as has the Frankfurter Allgemeine in a reproving comment, 'Are the occupation powers seriously trying to gain the trust and support of us Germans?"

THE GERMAN EXPORT BOOM

"The expansion of West German exports in the last twelve months has been more serious than is generally realized, and it is still going on. Exports of manufactured goods from Western Germany now exceed the pre-war level even without counting inter-zonal trade."

. . . "It will be seen that the impact of renewed German competition in the world's markets has been particularly sensational in metals and metal products, machinery, and chemicals. In the case of metal and chemical products shipped to other European markets the German sales had reached almost double the British figures, but even the overseas exports in these important groups are already about half the size of British exports." (From a report to the Manchester Guardian)

GERMAN IRANIAN FRIENDSHIP

"German recovery in the West is being paralleled by a German upsurge in the Middle East, particularly in Iran. For a still unrecognized government, Western Germany enjoys an extraordinary backstairs prestige.

. . . "The German revival is coming out of the same roots as in the old days. The Iranian view is best expressed in the words uttered in Isfahan to the American representative of one of the agencies that has been spending millions in Iran. 'Next to the Germans,' said an Iranian, 'we like you Americans best.'

. . . "One hundred Germans have registered themselves as oil technicians to take the places of the British in the oil establishments.

"A flood of German popular magazines and books is appearing on newsstands.

"A formal invitation to Hjalmar Schacht, the acquitted financial wizard of Hitler, to speak at Teheran University in the autumn."

SIGNIFICANT STATISTICS

"Critics of the GIs have also been too prone to overlook one important fact—that a major share of responsibility for the increased number of incidents lies with the Germans themselves. Even before the present wave of reinforcements began to arrive, the German civilian population was beginning to show increasing aggressiveness toward the GIs in their midst. . . . Today, a great many Germans—fretful under the presence of foreign troops, regardless of the fact that their own government has asked for more of them—themselves are looking for trouble.

"Entirely unprovoked attacks on members of the occupation forces have increased in considerably greater proportion than the GIs' crimes against the Germans. The Army's records show 100 crimes committed by Germans against U. S. military personnel and property, in July, 1951; the figure was only 51 in July, 1950."

SIX YEARS AFTER . . .

"It is known that former branches of the Wehrmacht are being reconstituted as veteran organizations grouped under the name of Bund Deutsche Soldaten which are led by Admiral Hansen, whose political reputation is deplorable. In allowing the reformation of these veteran groups as well as the 'Steel Helmets' which number already 100,000 members, aren't the Bonn Government and the Allies committing a terrible mistake? Admiral Hansen, President of the League of German Soldiers, has recently addressed a wire to the Czech Prime Minister in which he protested against the death verdict rendered by the Prague Tribunal against the German Generals Schmidt and Goltschalk, the perpetrators of the Lidice Massacre.

"The swastika has been causing the federal government additional anxiety. Having recently created seven new civilian decorations, the Bonn Government could do nothing else but permit former soldiers to wear also the military crosses won in various Nazi campaigns. In this connection, the Allies had forbidden the wearing of all military decorations. Bonn has just decided the opposite; no doubt with the permission of the High Commission.

"A few weeks ago, in Madrid, as General Franco was bidding Admiral Sherman farewell, General Munoz-Grandes, the leader of the Blue Division which fought against the Russians during the last war, and his soldiers stood at attention proudly displaying the German Iron Cross, 1st and 2nd class, as well as the swastika.

"The Frankfurter Zeitung, writing about this story on the 27th of August was astounded that this even caused so much repercussion in the Western World."

(From a dispatch by Georges Blun to the Journal de Geneve)

"An Israeli Foreign Office spokesman said that termination by Western powers of the state of war with Germany cannot be regarded as having brought an end to 'Germany's war against the Jewish people.'

". . . 'Six years after the end of hostilities, the German people have not made expiation or reparation for the crimes committed by the Nazis. To this day, every new election shows that the evil doctrines of Nazism are rampant in Germany.' . . ."

(From an Associated Press dispatch)

"Press analysis experts have noted recently a concerted effort on the part of German newspapers to criticize the Allied powers."

". . . The more numerous and speedy the concessions, the louder and more numerous have been the complaints of the German newspapers to and about the Allies.

"Even those newspapers which had previously sought standards of impartiality in their news coverage, whatever their editorial line, have joined in the hue and cry. Papers which used to be pro-Allied or at least temperate in attitudes are now digging all their invective out of the 'hell-basket' to sling back in type at the Western powers; it would appear that their editors have become convinced that this is the only way to maintain circulation."

THEY MEAN EVERY WORD

A French newspaper man relates a conversation he had with a German journalist, who told him the story that 600,000 Germans had signed a petition asking for clemency for the seven war criminals who were hanged recently. He also related that the Bonn Government did the impossible to save their lives and went so far as to pay $12,000 to hire an American lawyer to fight the execution up to the last minute.

Dr. Thomas Dehler, Minister of Justice in the Bonn Government provided the money for the American lawyer. The following letter was addressed to this French newspaper man by this prominent German journalist:

"Those of my generation who are still living in their fatherland know that it was purely a whim of fate which saved the lives of some and hanged the others. Those of Landsburg did not have the good fortune to wage their war in a quiet corner such as Copenhagen or to be taken prisoners in 1942. That is the sole reason why they had to pay with their lives. Today, we, the survivors, have to be resigned to our fate. Tomorrow, we shall perhaps become Anarchists who will rejoice in the misfortunes of the world that has vanquished us. If the German youth that is growing up today in Germany were given, one day, two atom bombs, they will throw the first one on Moscow, but the second will certainly be reserved for New York. You will be very much surprised to know the vow which thousands of young people from the ages of 15 to 20 have taken when they heard over the radio the announcement of the American High Commission that the sentences had been carried out."

(Georges Barbul in the Parisian publication, Rivatol)

WORTH PONDERING

"And then there is the ever present fear of Germany. In our determination to unite and rearm Europe against the threat of Communism, we tend to forget that Germany was our enemy, but no one over there does. Both in England and in France I found men darkly suspicious of the ease with which the Schuman Plan is progressing through the German Parliament. They think Germany has already been handsomely bribed by being relieved of restrictions on her production in return for her adherence to the plan, and they expect the worst with respect to German influence when the High Authority is established and begins to function. They say that Italy and Holland may be counted upon at critical times to support German proposals—Italy because both politically and commercially she has been close to Germany for so long, and Holland because she competes so vigorously with Antwerp for the inbound and outbound Ruhr traffic. Working control over the High Authority might therefore be precisely the device an unrepentant new Germany might seize upon to dominate Europe in another decade."

(From "European Steel: Monopoly in the Making," an article in the Atlantic Monthly by Clarence B. Randall, President of Inland Steel)

REUNION IN BONN

"Seventy-eight former German generals, admirals and staff officers met in Bonn to federate various veterans' associations in West Germany.

"The new federation is to be called the Association of German Soldiers. Its chairman will be former Col. Gen. Hans Friessner, who commanded the Fourth German Army and also, toward the end of the war, commanded the North and South Army group in Russia.

"The federation embraces nine veterans' organizations including the German Soldiers League, which has 85,000 members and other organizations representing the Afrika Corps, the parachute troops, the Waffen S. S., and the navy . . .

"The most distinguished units of Hitler's Wehrmacht and most of the distinguished leaders still alive, hale and at liberty were represented at the meeting in the Bergischer Hof . . ."

MILITARISTS AT WORK

"The League of German Soldiers which was established by the heads of various ex-service organizations is a merger formed in order to urge claims on the state, and lay down terms for co-operation in its defense . . .

"The sponsors of the new League affirm that it stands for 'our democratic State' and rejects, however, extremes of right or left . . .

"On the other hand, the League is also backed by Generals Guderian and Ramcke, who were as good Nazis as Remer and show no signs of having become supporters of democracy. Major-General Gille of the SS 'Viking' Division and SS Colonel-General Hauser, who was the original operational commander of the Waffen SS, have also taken part in the merger, and it is certain that the new League intends to demand the full rehabilitation of Himmler's army. The Norwegian, Flemish and other units in the 'Viking' Division are now said to deserve special honor as forerunners of the European army. Since the Allies made no distinction between the Waffen SS on the one hand and the security forces and Gestapo on the other, but condemned the entire SS as a criminal organization, they will find it hard to meet this demand . . ."

IN MEMORIAM — ARTHUR SZYK
(1894 - 1951)

It is with profound regret that we report the passing away of Arthur Szyk, the noted artist. His premature death has caused great sorrow among all those who knew of his works and of his tireless efforts on behalf of humanity against the forces of barbarism.

Though Mr. Szyk as a youth had studied for a business career at the Julian Academy in Paris, his creative ability in the arts inevitably turned him to his life's work.

He was particularly outstanding in the field of manuscript illumination. From 1921 to 1931 he lived in Paris where he studied deeply the art of the early masters. Many of the hundreds of miniatures in his richly colored semi-medieval style have been exhibited in the most famous galleries of the Western world. In 1931, he began the illumination, at Geneva, of the League of Nations Covenant. This unfinished work was later shown in the Museum of Art History at Geneva. Subsequently, Mr. Szyk did a series of 38 miniatures entitled, "Washington and His Times," a two year work, issued as a monumental portfolio for the Washington bi-centennial.

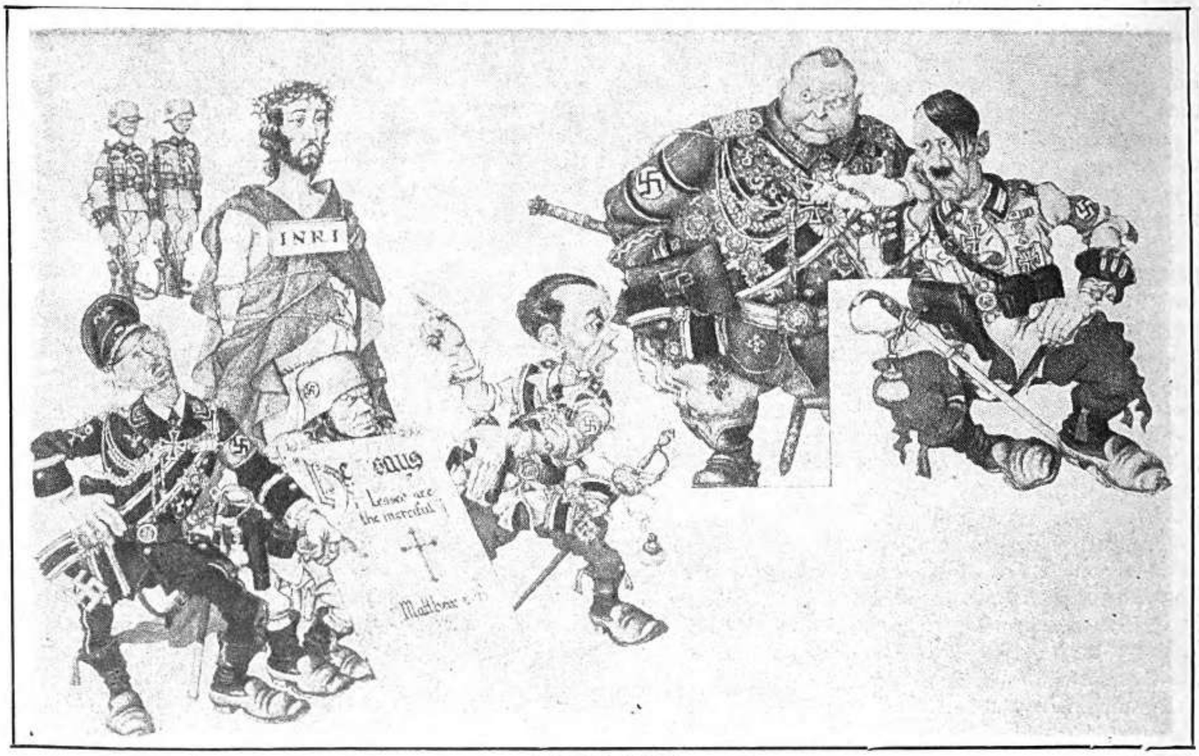
One of Mr. Szyk's greatest works was his illustrated version of the Hagadah, the sacred Jewish book dealing with the exodus of the Hebrews from Egypt. Arthur Szyk worked for four years illustrating the Hebrew text in full colors and illuminating in gold. The first copy of this masterpiece was presented to King George VI of Great Britain in 1941. Among other great works to which Mr. Szyk applied his unmatched skills were: The Canterbury Tales, The Temptation of St. Anthony, and The Song of Songs.

The close association of his works with great historical events equipped him in the time of the grave emergency of World War II to utilize his creative powers on behalf of the Allied cause. As a cartoonist for the N. Y. Post, Time, Life, PM, the American Mercury, The Chicago Sun, Fortune, and Colliers, Mr. Szyk's talents were popularized throughout the country. His devastating barbs against the Hitler regime as depicted in his cartoons were regarded as effective weapons in the struggle against Nazism. As the New York Times noted, his cartoons "were used to inspire our armed forces, having been shown by our authorities for that purpose to the men at West Point and Annapolis and by the United Service Organizations in many army recreation centers."

A collection of Mr. Szyk's more outstanding cartoons under the title, Ink and Blood, which describe the plans and activities of the dictators, was published in 1946.

Truly, Mr. Szyk was a brave soldier in freedom's fight against the Nazi hordes. Nevertheless, Mr. Szyk did not rest on his past laurels. Indeed, until his very last breath he applied all of his efforts and ability to strengthen American ideals and democracy through his unsurpassed talents. Shortly before he died he had illuminated a reproduction of the Declaration of Independence. By this work Mr. Szyk registered his affirmation of his boundless faith and confidence in the dynamics of our democratic heritage.

Arthur Szyk was a great artist who loved humanity and abhorred obscurantism and bigotry with all the fibre of his being. We, in the Society, were always proud of the fact that he was one of us serving as a member of the Advisory Council. The Society has lost a dear friend and a staunch fighter for peace and justice, the world has lost one of its finest artists, and the United States has lost a great and inspiring humanitarian.



CHRISTMAS

The Neo-Fascist International

"The graveyard is the condition of resurrection."
—Nietzche

From time to time over the past five years certain events have occurred from which it could be deduced, if not very easily demonstrated, that there exists a loose association of fascist and nazi sympathizers who are working together. The functioning of this informal fascist international has been suspected, for example, because of the smoothness with which a number of nazi criminals and fascist leaders have managed to reach South America via Italy, via France-Spain and via Denmark-Sweden. Another indication of some international cohesion has been the growing exchange of fascist propaganda and literature, bearing similar themes, across national frontiers.

Now fascist sympathizers in Europe feel that the time has come when they can organize more formally and more openly on an international basis. Fascist and neo-nazi representatives from Germany, France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Norway and Denmark came to the city of Malmo, Sweden, on May 14th, to attend a conference sponsored by the New Swedish Movement of the Swedish Opposition, a group led by Per Engdahl of Upsala, one of the braintrusters of totalitarian movements in Sweden for the past twenty years.

All but one of the thirty fascist chieftains who participated in the Malmo meeting are "outsiders" in the political life of their own country. With the exception of the German delegate, Dr. Franz Richter, none of them, so far as is known, commands sufficient support to capture a single seat in elections to his national parliament. Richter, however, represents a link with the leading neo-nazi party in Europe, the Socialist Reich Party of Germany, whose stronghold is in Lower Saxony, where it recently polled almost 400,000 votes. And at least one Italian representative is known to be connected with the Fasci for Revolutionary Action (FAR), a terrorist group associated with the neo-fascist party in Italy, the Italian Social Movement (MSI).

For various reasons, Sweden was an excellent location for holding a conference of fascist and nazi leaders. Since Sweden was not occupied by the Germans that country, unlike others, adopted no legislation penalizing Nazi collaborators after the war. There was no wave of intense revulsion against those who had espoused the Nazi cause, even though they did lose support and popularity. Thus Sweden became one of the few countries where, even in the immediate post-war period, a small number of totalitarian sympathizers, like Per Engdahl, could carry on their activities and maintain an organizational structure.

Included among the thirty fascist leaders at Malmo were:

From France—Maurice Bardeche, Henri Bernard and Jean Walther;

From Italy—Fabio Lonciari, Fausto Gianfranceschi, Stefani;

From Belgium—Johan van Dyck.

The Swiss representative at the conference remained anonymous, and the Norwegian and Danish representatives stayed in the background, completely overshadowed by Engdahl.

The French weekly La Victoire (a Petainist paper working for an "authoritarian" French republic) declared in its June 10th issue that France was represented by a delegation of eleven persons, including five delegates from an organization called the French National Committee, which is supposed to coordinate the action of fourteen fascist-like groups in France.

The international conference resulted in the appointment of a four-man council and of a European secretariat. In the future, European collaboration is to be organized by this four-man "study commission" which consists of a representative from Germany, France, Italy and the Nordic countries. Engdahl was appointed Nordic representative, with unlimited powers from the Danish and Norwegian delegates.

The city of Trieste was chosen as the site of the European secretariat. There use will be made of an organization already in existence known as the Italian Centro Studi. This organization already has a press service, which was adopted as the medium for collaboration with the "nationalist press." In addition, the four-man council was requested to organize a youth group with its seat in Rome. (It will be recalled that there was a youth congress in Rome last fall with representatives from nine countries, which was addressed by Anna Maria Mussolini, the Duce's oldest daughter.)

The program adopted by the international conference at Malmo was largely based on that featured by the New Swedish Movement of the Swedish Opposition in its organ, The Way Forward. The main theme of the paper is the need for "a united Europe." Its watchword is "unite with Germany," which "needs a new Europe." The Swedish movement also states in its program that it works for economic equality among European nations and a levelling of the intra-national labor market, a common European currency, and the abolition of customs. Referring to the Peace of Versailles, Engdahl asserts that "the people's right to choose has never been respected." His program declares, furthermore, that "the fact that nazism suffered defeat in the war proves nothing as to its actual purpose." "It was right in respect of the fight against communism," he emphasized.

The international congress averred in its own declaration of program: "support of a free and independent, but united Europe; of German re-armament only in connection with German equality; and, after the western powers become strong, of the replacement of the Atlantic Pact in its present unsatisfactory form by a European defense union as part of a system of alliances with non-European powers; of the inclusion of Spain in the common European defense organization; and of efforts to persuade back-sliding communists to align themselves with the national socialist movement."

The congress called for the "defense of Western culture against communism," and the carrying out of its economic aims—such as equal wages and food prices for all Europe—through the creation of a strongly central and cooperative European empire, with government leaders to be elected by plebiscite.

Concurrently with the meeting of the international congress there took place the national convention of the New Swedish Movement of the Swedish Opposition. There the internal problems of the New Swedish Movement were dealt with. . . .

Despite the fact that the Malmo meeting was accompanied by shouts of "Heil Hitler" and salutes with outstretched left hands, attempts were made at the national convention to throw a smoke screen around the aims and program of the Swedish movement by explanations that neither the New Swedish Movement nor the representatives at the international congress were nazi. The concept of a "united Europe" and the emphasis on the "national" element of Engdahl's program (that is why the word "Swedish" is mentioned twice in the party's title) are also part of the attempt to show that the aims and purposes of the organization are really "new. . . ."

Significance of the Neo-Nazi International

The importance of the international congress of neonazis and fascists at Malmo does not lie so much in the actual strength of the elements gathered there. Bardeche is not a prime mover of the collaborationist elements in France, nor Richter of the neo-nazi Socialist Reich Party in Germany. These men are, rather, apologists and fronts. Even a nazi leader like Engdahl in Sweden must depend for his success, or lack of it, on the strength of neo-nazi movements in other, more crucial areas.

The Malmo conference is significant, however, for a number of reasons.

First, it shows that the general European situation is such that neo-nazi and neo-fascist groups no longer have to fear any consequences when they peddle their wares openly and publicly, though they would not have dared to do so a few years ago. It is not only the successes of the SRP in Germany or the MSI in Italy which has made their reappearance possible. It reflects the whole European trend to the right and toward the release and pardoning of collaborationists, a trend which signifies to many rightist extremist groups that they, too, will be acceptable in the public arena as long as they stress their "anti-communism."

Second, the Malmo conference is significant as a portrayal of the neo-nazi strategy at present. Besides anti-communism, the emphasis is on a "united Europe." Closer examination of this thesis, however, so noble-sounding on the face of it, reveals that it is by no means the kind of united Europe sought by European democrats and Americans as a counter to Russian strength and infiltration, despite its loudly-avowed anti-communism. Rather it is a united "continental-type" Europe where Germany shall be the central directing force and have hegemony as a third force able to play off the "outsiders," United States and Russia both, for its own aims.

Other strategical concepts are to continue an emphasis on the "new" face of the various movements, on the "neo" rather than on the nazism. In official programs these days only the social and welfare "gains" possible through a strongly centralized and corporate state are mentioned; the more vicious parts of the nazi program are, for the present, soft-pedaled, and the pretense is maintained that political parties like those of Engdahl and the SRP have learned to extract only the "good" things in nazism.

The Malmo conference, therefore, was valuable as a propagator of the "line" to be followed by neo-nazi groups elsewhere. Finally, by coming out into the open, a neo-nazi international movement could attract those persons in various lands who have been passive sympathizers in the past, but who have not yet taken the trouble to seek out neo-nazi elements. A well-organized international movement should make it easy for them to come back to the fold.

Nowhere, probably, have present neo-nazi aims been more clearly expressed than in the report of the French Petainist newspaper La Victoire on the Malmo congress. Says this weekly:

"In the course of the sessions and of banquets, Messrs. Maurice Bardeche, Per Engdahl, Franz Richter and Stefani have defined the character of the Congress. We are not fascists or nazis, they proclaimed to the applause of the delegates, but we do not renounce the idea of drawing from past experience and from all that remains valuable in ideas, in sacrifice, and in men. It is inconceivable that those who have given their best to the service of certain ideologies, often going as far as to make the supreme sacrifice, have not left a message from which one can draw valuable lessons for present and future generations. This message, associated with the various national traditions of Europe, ought to facilitate the creation of a European ideology able, at one and the same time, to oppose Marxism and capitalist liberalism and thus to make possible true European independence, certain gage of world peace. Would it not be to the interest of the two antagonistic blocs now facing each other to have an arbiter between them?"

Concludes La Victoire; "There must be constituted an independent and strong Europe, capable of victoriously confronting with its own forces and its own ideology both Stalinist and Marxist imperialism and the colonization of American high finance."

(From the pamphlet, "The Recent Growth of Neo-Nazism in Europe" published by the A. J. C., September, 1951.)

OUR COMMENTS:

The above study of the emergence of a neo-fascist international bears close watching by freedom-loving peoples. Mr. C. L. Sulzberger, the New York Times' chief foreign correspondent, devoted a lengthy article on the movement some time ago. His observations are worth pondering. For example, he mentions that this movement "seems to be at least as hostile to the United States as to the Soviet Union." He reported that the Fascist Convention at Malmo assailed the North Atlantic Pact and that, as to be expected, the German Nazis led the rest in whipping up defiance against Western democracy.

Among the German Nazi representatives who spoke at Malmo was Otto Remer, a former general in the Nazi Army and a leader of the neo-Nazi Socialist Reichs Party. In this connection it is noteworthy that the Socialist Reichs Party together with several lesser neo-Nazi parties received nearly 900,000 votes in the Lower-Saxony elections held last Spring. Among Remer's choice statements as reported by Mr. Sulzberger was the following: "Instead of letting our women and children be overrun by the Russians and our men bleed to death in the Maginot Line we should stretch out our lines so that the Russians can march as speedily as possible through Germany." Commenting on this statement Mr. Sulzberger notes that the theory of General Remer and his colleagues is that an East-West war is inevitable "and that 'Germandom' can be preserved biologically only by facilitating a swift Soviet passage farther westward." Concluding his observations of the Malmo Conference Mr. Sulzberger repeats the warning that must not go unheeded in this country; that this international fascist movement while shrilly declaiming against Communism "is marked by an equally loud anti-U. S. counterpoint."

From other sources we have learned that the German, Karl Heinz Priester, one of the founders of the neo-fascist international movement has invited former members of the German Condor Legion to a pilgrimage to Spain where they will celebrate the "good old days" with Franco's henchmen. It is important to bear in mind, however, that this fascist movement is not merely confined to Europe. Indeed, its tentacles stretch right into the United States. This aspect of the movement which is closer to home was not dealt with in the above article, but nevertheless there are certain pertinent facts which cannot easily be ignored.

The New York Times on May 18, 1951, in reporting on the international fascist movement, disclosed that the Voters Alliance operating out of New York City was an active participant. As reported by the Times, spokesmen for the International Fascist Movement said that "the Voters Alliance which was described as consisting of 600,000 Americans of German origin, had established contact with the European Social Movement and was sending a representative to Germany." The Voters Alliance for Americans of German Ancestry has been the subject of many articles and editorial comment in the pages of PREVENT WORLD WAR III. In the No. 37 issue we published additional information on the activities of the Voters Alliance under the title: "Deutschland Ueber Alles." We pointed out that the President of this organization, E. A. Fleckenstein, had wired the representatives of the Bonn Government in Washington urging that the Bonn Government blackmail the defense of Western Europe until the Allies admit their "crimes" against the Germans and submit to every German demand. We also mentioned the fact that the New York Post in April, 1949 ran a series of articles on this organization which indicated that it was considered a successor to Fritz Kuhn's defunct German Bund.

We reported that on June 4, 1946, Supreme Court Justice Hammer denied the Voters Alliance permission to become a membership corporation on the grounds that "the name, in connection with the purposes set forth . . . appeared provocative of the notion that an attitude was indicated to organize for domestic political action persons who might be resentful over the victory of the United States of America over Germany."

One of the former leaders of the Voters Alliance, A. O. Tittmann, had already established a record as a villifier of American democracy and of the government. He made no bones about his defense of the German war criminals and violently denounced Presidents Roosevelt and Truman. In his pamphlet, "The Planned Famine," Tittmann attacked the internment of German enemy aliens during the war and stated, "The whole is an outrageous violation of international law and human decency and shows into what depths of iniquity and depravity the Roosevelt-Truman dictatorships have cast the country." (Page 11.)

This un-American spirit has pervaded the Voters Alliance since its founding and was re-emphasized in the above-mentioned wire from Fleckenstein to the representatives of the Bonn Government in Washington. We quoted at length from this wire which attacked the President of the United States and made the following brazen assertion to Chancellor Adenauer. "I want to warn his excellency (Adenauer) that any agreement which his Government enters into with the Truman administration is at its peril. The German Federal Government should therefore break off all further negotiations concerning the question of rearmament, unless the iron-clad guarantee for the defense of all Western Germany is given." Apparently the boldness of the Voters Alliance these days knows no limits or bounds. They are now spreading their poison on an international scale in cooperation with the international fascist movement.

To underestimate the danger of the activities of this organization and others of its type in the United States is to truly gamble with our democratic heritage, let alone our national security. That's why we believe that the appropriate agencies of the Government and Congress should investigate.

The Mirage of Peace With Germany

(From an editorial in the United Nations World)

If a third World War breaks out, it will be over Germany. All other issues are sideshows. It is Germany alone which, with its economic and military potential, is capable of decisively influencing the balance of power between East and West.

In view of this, the question arises whether the Japanese peace treaty should not be followed now by a similar settlement with Germany. Although the four-power occupation and division of Germany poses much more vexing problems than did Japan, the belief is widespread that a peace treaty, at least with the Federal Republic, would normalize relations between the Allies and the German people, improve the political atmosphere, strengthen the Bonn regime and serve the cause of democracy and peace. Since the Soviets are unwilling to cooperate, why not go ahead without them?

Such arguments are advanced not only by well-meaning laymen; the Bonn government too, looking upon the San Francisco conference as a kind of curtain-raiser for the subsequent Foreign Ministers Conference in Washington, placed high hopes in its deliberations. Such optimism was at least partly shared by the Allied camp. Political circles in Washington believed that most of the differences of opinion between the three powers had been ironed out, leaving the foreign ministers only the task of formalizing the agreement.

However, the Japanese analogy as applied to Germany is so misleading that it obscures the basic difficulties of a settlement.

For one, America shouldered almost the entire responsibility for the treaty with Japan, while in the case of Germany both England and France have very definite interests which don't coincide with those of the U. S.

Equally important: while in Japan the U. S. found a common platform with the government and the people, the German demands cannot be reconciled with the present course of allied foreign policy.

The Germans insist on complete equality of defense forces and their sovereign power in the organization of the European defense force. The French are justifiably concerned with the danger of resurgent German militarism. They wish to make a German army an integral part of a European army, and no more. They do not wish to repeat the cycle of building Germany to buttress the bastion of defense against Russia, as was done a hundred years ago, only to find their defense more dangerous than the threat.

These fears are augmented by German demands for territorial claims and end to the autonomy of the Saar and an assurance that Germany's lost lands beyond the Oder-Neisse line will eventually be returned. In addition the Bonn Government has hinted that the United States must pay for a German defense force, if it is to be undertaken at all. Another billion marks is demanded for Germans exiled east of the Oder-Neisse line and elsewhere—to be paid by the United States and other nations.

An even more foreboding development, generals of the former German army are sponsoring, in the name of that organization, a program which they say the Allies must adopt. In essence, it declares that the honor of the German soldier shall be acknowledged in word and deed. And the Waffen SS is included in the demand. The threat is implied that unless the Allies fall in with this program, they will have only themselves to blame should the German units of the European army go over to the Russians en masse in the event of war.

The possibility of a revival of Nazism, or at any rate some form of excessive and militant nationalism, cannot be ignored. It is a serious question indeed whether the Republic has reached a point of political maturity where it can be trusted with the responsibilities and freedoms which a treaty or "contractual agreement" would give it by definition. . . .

. . . No less important is the fact that a divided Germany is in itself a source of friction between East and West. The vital interests of both sides are too tightly bound up with German power—and it is, after all, the power relationship which is paramount—for the situation to be otherwise. In a world which hovers periodically on the verge of war, it does not seem sensible to perpetuate and congeal such a status quo. . . .

. . . Realizing that a divided Germany would remain a bone of contention between East and West and a permanent incentive to war, Kurt Schumacher, leader of the Social Democratic opposition, favored from the outset a settlement whereby all occupation forces would be withdrawn from the country. The Social Democrats felt strong enough to thwart any communist conspiracy, and were sure the democratic forces could win an overwhelming majority in the parliamentary elections and protect the republic from a communist coup d'etat.

In America, Walter Lippmann followed the same line of reasoning in advocating the neutralization of Germany. He wanted to take the Russians at their word and accept their proposal for the simultaneous withdrawal of the Allied and Soviet armies behind the German borders.

This proposal was rejected on the ground that the Russians, even if they took their armies out of Germany, would be able to control the Government through the German communists. Czechoslovakia was cited as a warning example.

But such a calamity need not occur if the Atlantic powers serve notice on Russia that any attempt on the part of any German minority to seize power by force or intrigue and pull a Gottwald would be regarded as a casus belli.

Whether Stalin could be deterred by such a declaration would not depend on the presence of 150,000 American, British and French soldiers in Germany. The overwhelming industrial potential of the democracies and the might of the American Air Force—including the atomic bomb—are the real deterrents.

But what if Russia should attack in a year or two, when she possesses an atomic bomb stockpile and has reached the peak of her industrial mobilization? To meet this threat is it not essential to integrate Germany into the defense system of the West? It is for this eventuality in particular that German remilitarization is being advocated by quite a few.

The whole German problem today can be reduced to a simple formula: either the West admits the inevitability of World War III and plans accordingly, or develops a policy for the prevention of that war. In the former case, the subservience of any and all political, social, economic and spiritual questions to purely military and strategic considerations is logical. This means dividing Germany and remilitarizing its western republic.

Acceptance of the possibility of preventing war, on the other hand, implies trust in political and spiritual factors, even to the extent of taking a calculated military as well as a strategic risk.

The possibility of a Russian attack can never be excluded, and no course must be followed which actually jeopardizes the security of the West. But even were the military point of view accepted and a German army started today, it would remain a paper army for at least two years—during the critical period when it was most needed. It would contribute little, if anything, to the strength of the West, but much to internal dissension and agitation in Germany.

The question is: does the military advantage of arming Western Germany as a bulwark against possible Soviet aggression outweigh the political disadvantages as demonstrated in the growing power of the Nazis, in the weakening of democratic forces, and in the undermining of the moral position of the Allies? It is impossible to combine both approaches. One cannot have one's cake and eat it too.

The remilitarization of Germany is only one of the problems that divide the three powers. The French, who have gradually veered toward the American point of view, gave the impression on the eve of the Washington conference that they differed only in technical matters: the size of the German units and organization, for instance. At the conference they brought up another point: who is to pay for the German army? Germany has reached, in taxes and occupation costs, the limit of her financial capacity. She cannot carry the additional burden of rearmament. Therefore, in order to build an army, Germany must ask a reduction in the occupation cost. The difference will then have to be made up by the American, British and French taxpayer. The French want this question cleared up before they continue discussion on a German army.

From this point the debate turned inevitably to the economic, industrial and financial problems which must be solved if a genuinely peaceful relationship between Germany and the western powers is to be established. The question of prewar debts is a relatively minor one, yet last April it held up revision of the occupation statute for more than four months. The question of German exports primarily of coal and scrap iron, and the limitation of her war-making powers—steel production—cannot be solved when the West wants Germany on the one hand to become an active partner in defense, and on the other is rightly afraid that in allocating this role to her they are actually repeating the blunder of the period following the first World War and unleashing dark forces that may again plunge Europe into chaos.

No German settlement, that is, no genuine peace, is possible unless and until the division of Germany is overcome. At present the Soviets seem to have forsaken their hopes of conquering the whole of Germany, and are now willing to accept the division as permanent. For the reasons described, the western allies must not follow the same line. Rather than aim at "consolidation" of the federal republic in its present form, they should prepare and organize a political offensive for the unification of Germany. Even if this offensive should necessitate renunciation of German rearmament by the West, the eventual psychological and political gains and the strengthening of the morale and spirit of the democratic forces in Europe would amply justify the gamble.

Such was the great chance of the Washington conference. It has not been taken. But sooner or later a settlement along these lines will have to be tried, if a way out of the impasse of the cold war is to be found.

The alternative is to turn Germany into the "sick man of the Rhine," whose infectious wounds will never heal and whose disease will poison friends and foes alike.

"Any notion that German divisions can be created as co-equals in Western Europe's defense armies while, at the same time, the creation of a new German general staff can be avoided is 'preposterously unrealistic.' So say the West's top military men in Germany. . . .

" 'You can call that staff anything you want,' one senior Western soldier commented to the writer, 'but it will be doing the work of a general staff and it will operate like a general staff.' . . .

"United States officers, especially, believe there is one major curb that the West could place on the formation of a tight-knit 'clique' of German general staff officers like that which has traditionally been so aloof from, and arrogant toward, the population as a whole. In authorizing the creation of German military units, the Allies could insist that the Germans agree to a regular rotation of their officers between staff and command posts. . . .

"However, this is definitely not the 'German way' of organizing an army. German professional soldiers remain convinced that their system of staff organization is far and away the best. . . .

"But any promise to control German military manpower by eliminating the central staff which directs its organization is completely illusory, the West's soldiers maintain. If we are to accept the idea of Germans bearing arms in our common cause, they say, we will also have to get used to the idea that once again we will have a 'Generalstab' corps with us. The politicians may be able to find another name for it; they won't be able to change its essential nature."

Anti-American Propaganda In the United States

Recently the Office of the United States High Commissioner for Germany released some interesting facts and figures on the progress of the Exchange Program for Germany initiated in 1948. Since then, roughly 5,400 Germans have or are visiting the United States on the basis of this Program financed by the United States Government. Out of this total, 1,247 have been German university students assigned to study at colleges and universities throughout the U. S. A. The Exchange Program, in the words of the Press Release, is: "designed to foster international good will and orient Germans in democratic procedures in almost every phase of public life. . . ."

We believe this is an admirable objective. Nevertheless, those who have conceived the program will have to cope with the fact that there is in this country a German language press which has a notorious record of pan-Germanism and pro-Nazism. It is only logical that most of these German visitors should want to read the German-American press, part of which is using the "Big Lie" technique to distort American motives and actions, thus inciting their less informed readers against our country.

If the German exchanges are influenced by this cunning manipulation of fact, then we are afraid that all of the praiseworthy efforts to inculcate the spirit of democracy among them will be in vain.

Through the years PREVENT WORLD WAR III has conducted surveys of some of the German language press and has exposed its anti-democratic tendencies and its apologetics for Nazism and pan-Germanism. Today some of these sheets have become even more bolder and more vicious in their diatribes against the Allies and in their defense of Germany's war crimes.

An example of this kind of "journalism" is the article which appeared this summer in the Deutsch-Amerikanische Burger-Zeitung, written by one who signs himself "Politicus." It would be more appropriate, in our opinion, if the author of this article had signed himself Furor Teutonicus, for the tenor of the entire piece is more in keeping with the traditions of the rantings of the rabid pan-Germans.

Here are some of the choice statements made by this character, Politicus:

> "Of course it is no secret, that this state of war with Germany still exists for although we have permitted (by we, are meant the victors) that Germany have a government, that government is so much under the fist of the conqueror, that it has very little power and even that little can be withdrawn any day and any time the victors see fit to do so. Among other things, that government has been given permission to give visas to persons who wish to visit Germany. But at the same time it has been given a list containing several thousand names to which that government must not give a visa. The writer knows two of them. One is Otto Strasser who is now living in Canada and who wants to join his family from whom he has been separated many years, and the other is Austin J. App, that fighter for decency in the treatment of Germany and the exposer of the terrible things done to the German people by the victors.
> "That state of war does exist in spite of the fact that we are wooing Germany, ask her to forget bygones and join the western victors against the eastern victor. It is something which baffles the intellect. How can Germany fight on the side of nations with which it is at war?
> ". . . Today the German people must feel that we are hypocrites if on the one hand we try to make friends with them and on the other permit irresponsible people to treat them as underlings, prevent, by theoretically being at war with them, that help may be given even to orphans. One cannot help but compare how the much-maligned Germans treated their enemies when they were on top.
>
> "The latest time that took place was when in 1940 to 1944 German troops of occupation were in France. Regardless of the lie, for that is what it is, that Germany three times since 1870 attacked France, it is a historical fact, that France was the aggressor all the times against Germany in times ago and in 1870 it also was France. That country also was the aggressor in 1914, there was nothing between the two countries in 1914 which forced France to go to war. And the same can be said about the last war. This writer never will forget the touching letter Hitler wrote to Daladier of France begging him to save his country the misfortune of a war, that there was nothing between the two countries which could not be settled at the conference table. France chose war.
> "Our papers have glibly forgotten that and keep on telling the lie about poor France which has been attacked three times in recent times by terrible Germany. Germany has all the excuses she wanted to treat France harsh after she was on top. But what took place? When it became clear in 1871 that Paris was going to surrender, the Germans assembled hundreds of freight trains with food for the starving French people around Paris so that, on the very day of the capitulation food could be rushed into Paris. How did the victors treat Germany instead, which victors included France? With their permission or at least without their protest, England in 1918 kept food out of Germany for almost a year with the result that almost one million of German men, women and children died of starvation.
> "What happened after the end of the second world war? Eisenhower, who has recently gone to Germany and asked the Germans to let bygones be bygones and fight on our side, prescribed a starvation diet for the German people. And that after it had become known that, according to American testimony, over 99% of the American soldiers in German hands during the war, had returned in good physical condition to their home country. He also handed many hundreds of thousands of German war prisoners over to France and England as wage slaves for years and what France did to them is best not mentioned. It is also a fact, that in 1871 Germany imposed on France the return of Alsace-Lorraine, old German province and a money fine of 5,000 francs, at that time the equivalent of 1,000 million dollars.

". . . Now let us look at what France and her allies did to Germany after the two world wars. The infamous "Treaty of Versailles" of 1919 robbed Germany of 10% of her land. . . .

". . . The end of the second world war did things of which one almost hates to talk, if one belongs to a victor country. Six years and more have elapsed since the shooting ended but peace is not even in sight, nor seems to be any intention to make peace. Germany was torn up in four parts which were turned over to the four big shots, America, England, and France, called the Western Powers and Russia the Eastern Power. Every power is reigning its zone as it sees fit.

". . . Furthermore, large occupation forces are stationed in Germany by all victor powers and Germany must pay for their upkeep. Complaints have been made by the German government against the unreasonable demands of these forces, who live way above the standards existing in their respective countries. Without result. And they are there to stay. . . ."

Obviously, the above-quoted statements would never reflect the American point of view nor that of our Western Allies. They are more in keeping with the mouthings of the Nazi propagandists and their predecessors in the Weimar Republic and during the reign of the late but unlamented Kaiser. They are nothing short of half-truths and apologetics designed to rewrite history and to place Germany once more in the role of the eternal innocent and martyred nation.

Space does not permit us, of course, to deal with all the slanders and distortions concocted by Politicus, but we cannot refrain from exposing some of his more blatant falsehoods. For example, Politicus brazenly accuses General Eisenhower of having "prescribed a starvation diet for the German people." This was the fairy tale dreamed up by the Germans immediately after the war for the purpose of discrediting the Allied occupation and creating disunity among the victors so that Germany could eventually evade the consequences of her crimes. The volume of propaganda that was employed, alleging that the Germans were starving, was simply fantastic after the war. It was so effective that it tended to drown out the pleas for help of Germany's victims who had suffered years of torture and starvation under the German occupation.

In spite of Germany's black record during her occupation of many countries of Europe, the Allied forces did not treat the Germans with the same medicine that the Herrenvolk had handed out to their victims.

In the No. 14 issue of PREVENT WORLD WAR III, April, 1946, we quoted from authoritative sources exposing the lie that the Germans were being starved. General Eisenhower himself, in a letter to Senator Alexander Wiley said: "I assure you that within the American zone the mass extinctions which you fear by reason of starvation will not occur." Subsequently General Clay, United States Military Governor for Germany, repeated General Eisenhower's assurance and stated categorically that: "There is no starvation in the U. S. zone of Germany, nor is it intended that there shall be." General Joseph T. McNarney, who preceded General Clay as United States Military Governor for Germany, asserted that the United States does not have a starvation policy for Germany and denied that "innocent people and the aged are dying from starvation in the streets." (New York Daily News.)

Senator Tom Connally, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said that stories of starvation among the German people were apparently based on "a deluge of misinformation and exaggeration." Two able American journalists confirmed these official views. Raymond Daniel in The New York Times reported: "No one is starving in the U. S. Zone of Germany." E. P. Morgan in the Chicago Daily News noted that: "If Germans are starving, they are hiding the fact behind some of the roundest, rosiest cheeks I have seen in Western Europe." In a letter to the Christian Century Magazine, John A. Troxler, Chaplain (Captain), U. S. A., Third Infantry Division, took issue with the Christian Century's editorial alleging mass starvation in Germany. He branded it as a "composite falsification of the actual situation." On the basis of his investigations, Chaplain Troxler said he was yet "to learn of a single individual who has died of lack of food. . . ."

As for the present, Politicus to the contrary notwithstanding, Western Germany is probably the best fed country in Western Europe.

Politicus is indignant over the fact that Otto Strasser and Austin J. App are among those to whom the United States Government does not give visas for visits to Germany. It is perfectly understandable why the Government should refuse visas to these two characters.

Otto Strasser was one of Hitler's buddies in the early days of Nazi free booting. Though he broke with Hitler, he never broke with the basic ideals of Nazism. Indeed, according to a lengthy article published in an American magazine, Strasser "thinks he is a better fascist than Hitler."

Though Herr Strasser lives in Canada at the present time, there is plenty of evidence which is well known to the Allied occupation authorities to prove that he has not lost his Nazi contacts in Germany. One of his organizations, "The League for German Recovery," was banned in 1949 by the British because it was deemed to be "undemocratic." More recently Dr. Strasser wrote a letter to the Saturday Evening Post in which he castigated the Allies, warning that the Germans "will fight for Danzig and Koenigsberg, for Stettin and Breslau, but will not fight for Brussels and Paris, nor for Churchill's London and for Morgenthau's Washington."

In the same letter he accused the leaders of the Bonn Government of being Quislings. It is not by accident, we are sure, that Mr. Strasser's letter to the Saturday Evening Post was republished in the Deutsch-Amerikanische Burger-Zeitung. Finally, it should be noted that Mr. Strasser in outlining his plan for a revived Germany stated that: "The possible emergence of a revived Nazi Party . . . would be an eventuality to be wished for rather than a danger. . . ."

Dr. Austin J. App is not far behind Strasser when it comes to whitewashing German crimes and villifying the Allies, including the United States Government. He was the author of the pro-Nazi pamphlet: "History's Most Terrifying Peace." This pamphlet was exposed in the No. 19 issue, February, 1947, of PREVENT WORLD WAR III. Mr. App, then Professor of English at Incarnate Word College, San Antonio, Texas, denounced the denazification policies and the prosecution of German war criminals.

He spread the tale that in Stuttgart, "troops under Eisenhower's command raped more women in one week in one city than troops under Hitler's command seemed to have raped in four years in all of France." After defending the Hitlerites and whitewashing German war crimes, App wrote: ". . . Instead of going on talking about 're-educating' the Germans, we must beg them and many other peoples, to forgive us the awful atrocities our policy caused to be inflicted upon them. . . . America must thoroughly repent of its arrogant policy of dictating a peace to the vanquished."

Is it any wonder that the United States Government refuses Messrs. Strasser and App visas to Germany?

Politicus seems to be shocked over the "harsh treatment" accorded the Germans by the Allies. In contrast he endeavors to make a case for the leniency shown by the Germans to their victims. He doesn't mention the crematoriums and the concentration camps. Undoubtedly he would say that this was a figment of the imagination of prejudiced peoples.

He tells us how generous the Germans were to the French after the Franco-German War of 1870. Yet he is forced to admit that the Germans grabbed up Alsace-Lorraine and exacted the enormous sum of 5 billion gold francs as an indemnity. By acting so considerately to the French the Germans succeeded in impoverishing France and making her economic subjection to the Germans inevitable. Bernhard Menne, the noted German historian, observes that the enormous growth of Germany's industrial war potential "was the direct result of French gold which streamed into the country as reparations payments after the War of 1870-71."

Like all German apologists Politicus weeps over the "harsh" terms of the Versailles Treaty. He resents the fact that the treaty restored stolen properties such as Alsace-Lorraine to rightful owners. Whatever the failings of the Versailles Treaty, it never imposed on Germany the severe terms which Germany placed on her victims. The German industrialists whose industries in Lorraine were taken over by the French received a preliminary compensation of 920 million marks and German ship owners received payments of 1 billion 300 million marks. Indeed, the reparation agreements based on the Versailles Treaty did little if anything in the way of reducing Germany's industrial power.

As regards reparations after World War I, C. R. S. Harris, in a report published by the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London, estimated that Germany borrowed from abroad three times as much as she paid in reparations. This is how Germany experienced "defeat" on the basis of the Versailles Treaty.

And what about World War II? The amount of reparations paid by the Germans since the end of the war amounts to no more than a couple of hundred millions of dollars. Yet from France alone Germany extracted during the four years of occupation a total of 6 billion dollars. These were Germany's occupation costs for a defeated nation and our authority for this figure is the Minister for Foreign Affairs of France, Robert Schuman (U. S. News and World Report, September 28, 1951).

The leniency accorded to the Germans after World War I is now being repeated so that today Germany's industrial might has forged ahead of French economic development. Does this sound like a harsh peace? Naturally, these facts are seldom published in the German language press because these mouthpieces for Germandom have a job to do which has nothing in common with American democracy or our national interests. This is but one sample of the German language press today. Here is a challenge to our officials who are trying to reorient German students toward the democratic way of life through the Exchange Program.

The Schuman Plan and German Revival

by

LIONEL GELBER

Would the unity of Europe add to the unity of the West or detract from it? To answer that question is not as easy as we might at first imagine. For there are all kinds of unity, some good, some bad. The free world has been unanimous in welcoming a political innovation such as the Council of Europe; the impetus given to European economic co-operation by the European Recovery Programme; the common action in defence which the Atlantic Alliance envisages. Yet British diffidence towards the Schuman Plan indicates that a semi-continental unity which is overdone may serve only to undo the wider unity of the Atlantic region.

Which would be better for the West—a European union of which a Franco-German industrial combine is the economic core, or a perpetuation of that Atlantic partnership which was twice an agent of victory and whose rôle is not yet finished? For we cannot have both; it must be the one or the other. The recalcitrance of the British, when the Schuman Plan was announced, drew more fire from the United States than from France herself. Yet without promptings from Washington the French might never have put the Entente under so unexpected a strain. Franco-British disaccord over the Schuman Plan was thus, at bottom, an Anglo-American quarrel. Yet the friendship of the English-speaking peoples with their many household rifts, is tested and tried. A Franco-German industrial pool, to absorb the impact of a German productivity which postwar Allied policy itself has fostered, would be a gamble of hope against experience.

How is it that the United States was eager, so soon after VE Day, to take that risk? Americans bicker over where they went amiss in East Asia. But towards Western Europe, as passage of the European Recovery Programme and the Atlantic Alliance generally attest, there has been a larger degree of bi-partisan agreement. Nor has the cultivation of West Germans or the establishment of the West German State been a subject of serious discord within the Congress. Yet, as the two world wars of the twentieth century ought to have demonstrated, no Administration policy needed a closer or more minute scrutiny. And this it did not get.

In the light of East-West antagonism an intelligent Opposition would, for example, have supported the European Recovery Programme, the North Atlantic Security Pact and mutual arms assistance. But without the most searching consideration of all possible consequences, the favourable together with the unfavourable, there would have been no blank cheque for a precipitate German rebirth, nor for schemes of European union through which a resurgent Germanism is to be curbed and held. Bismarck brought together the various sections of the modern warrior Reich. To maintain peace, its break-up and regrouping was, with the assent of Generalissimo Stalin and the more hesitant British, sponsored during the war by President Franklin D. Roosevelt himself. This cardinal fact was, however, not divulged at Potsdam but only in postwar memoirs when the German revivalists of Washington and Frankfurt were in full cry. Did the East-West schism compel so early a shift? The contrary may be the case. At Potsdam, moreover, the post-war cleavages which are now cited to excuse that drastic shift, had scarcely begun. Yet the Opposition uttered no word of dissent. It endorsed uncritically Administration policy instead.

And from that policy stems American support of the Schuman Plan. When the British balked at it a few irate Senators, cracking their golden whip, even threatened to withhold dollars from Britain herself. The root cause of this Atlantic dispute, Entente and Anglo-American, was the course the English-speaking Powers had pursued in Germany. Yet a proposal that Congress investigate what has been done there was quietly shelved.

For let us not delude ourselves. Incompatibility between controlled and uncontrolled economies was not the only reason for British rejection of the Schuman Plan; on it a non-Socialist Government would also have had to turn thumbs down. Not that the Paris-Bonn project—blessed, presumably, from Washington sight unseen—is in every respect one destined to liberalize international trade; from it all cartel features would first have to be eliminated. Nor did Labour Ministers always slow up the free exchange of money and goods; to the European Payments Union, which the United States herself inspired, they also acceded. Yet the Schuman Plan, as originally enunciated, went far beyond that sort of limited economic unity; only as the industrial heart of a wholly federalized Western Europe can the coal-steel pool accomplish its Franco-German purpose. And a Europe so organized, with its supranational authority over the entire national life of its constituents, the British could never enter. For what fundamentally Britain has had at stake is her historic position as a Great Power—not the structure of a society but the society in itself.

East-West differences are more than ideological. So too, this Atlantic dispute over the organization of Europe goes deeper than any ideological feud between the rival doctrines of socialism and capitalism. After World War I the French statesman, Aristide Briand, suggested a United States of Europe; after World War II, another French statesman, Robert Schuman, brings forward an economic plan which is the first concrete step towards the fulfilment of his predecessor's famous inspiration. But before the first step is taken we ought to foresee where the second and third will lead. There can be no West European federation whose independent components do not merge their national sovereignty into a larger, semi-continental sovereignty. Each subordinate member-State must therefore divest itself of any exterior connections it may have; the British, the French, the Belgian, the Dutch, the Portuguese colonial dependencies can belong only to a European federal union or to the United Nations as a whole. Nor, as part of a European sovereignty, would there be any way for a federated Britain to retain her unique association with other sovereign countries of the Commonwealth or they with her. A Schumanized or federalized Europe will thus split the Commonwealth asunder. At a time of peril and among the few durable factors of world stability, it would, in other words, dissolve a going concern for a venture that is highly speculative. The overseas affiliations of the United Kingdom were, moreover, an inestimable boon when, not long ago, all else seemed lost; when, as Britain resisted the German fury for an entire year alone, she did much to preserve our free world order. And they are still a mainstay of her stature as a Great Power.

Canada, too, is an important member of the Atlantic Alliance and other non-Asian partners of the Commonwealth will, in an emergency, range themselves alongside it. Yet, upon countries such as Canada, British integration into a Schumanized Europe might have a very adverse effect. For Britain would have to relinquish any preferential trade arrangements with other parts of the Commonwealth, Occidental and Oriental, if her national sovereignty were to be fused with an overriding European federal sovereignty. And that is not a result we should welcome. Depression in Commonwealth lands overseas contributed heavily to the world slump of the nineteen thirties; the same cycle—unless a federal Europe can provide some adequate trade substitute for intra-Commonwealth tariff preferences—may recur. And if the Canadian economy goes into a downward spiral, such a decline would be felt in the United States first of all. She has larger investments in Canada than in any other foreign country; by robbing a Commonwealth Peter to pay a European Paul she may only do harm to herself. There is, moreover, the service which Britain, as banker of the sterling bloc, renders world trade—one which the United States herself will not or cannot take over. For global is as global does and to unify Western Europe at the expense of other interrelated associations—Entente, Commonwealth, Anglo-American—may be to hinder and contract rather than facilitate and expand the unity of the West.

The bases of British power are Atlantic and world-wide. Continentalism may be no more a solution in Europe now than, for a century and a half, it was in North America. The gods on Olympus might laugh when American isolationists, past and present, chide as isolationist efforts by the British to reconcile with each other their European and overseas commitments. Never again will Britain be as strong as she was. But as a matter of enlightened self-interest we ourselves should want her to be as strong as she can be. When her power is misused we have a right and a duty to protest. Yet that right and that duty are in themselves a tribute to what can still be a great world rôle.

Why did the French, ever suspicious of Germany, adopt a contrary policy which assumes German good faith? The economic recovery and military security of France depend, as never before, on the firm support of the United States. Paris concluded no doubt that it had more to lose by holding out against Washington than, as the Americans desired, by embracing Bonn. And so we get the spectacle of the French, bled white in the first world war, and knocked out in the second, assuring us that by some mysterious federal alchemy they have discovered overnight how to transmute the base metal of an obdurate German nationalism into genuine pan-European gold. Nor is it only the dread Teutonic spectre across the Rhine which they have feared; the real danger is that when fully resurrected it might consort with a still more ominous one across the Elbe. West European union to prevent a Russo-German reunion—such was the motive which, under American pressure, goaded the French into their dramatic volte face. Theirs is a striking exemplification of the classic theory that if you can't lick 'em, join 'em.

Europe's need of military and economic unity is manifest. But politically its outright federalization would be a leap in the dark. Against Eastern tyranny, the strength of Britain has, in two German wars, been a cornerstone of Western freedom. Do we throw over a sure thing for so unsure an experiment? Europe in combination with Britain can achieve a measure of workable unity; without her the genuinely democratic elements in a federal union would be less safe than before. Between the rearmament boom and a federalizing project such as the Schuman Plan we are in for the maximum redevelopment of German steel—that bedrock of Teutonic military power and diplomatic intransigence. And of this process even the economic outcome might not be as beneficial as it would seem. Britain, for one, may be unable to compete. And if that happens we shall have done more than retard a recovery on which we ourselves have spent a lot. The security of our whole Atlantic world will be in a worse shape than it was.

In East Asia, too, the maximum development of German steel might have consequences we shall yet regret. For the German steelmasters, in accordance with the strategic traditions of the German Right, may, with their steel surplus, turn to those vast Sino-Soviet markets which Moscow alone can provide. Over the menace of a Communized Asia we are all apprehensive. Yet it is with the resources of the Ruhr-Rhineland complex that the Sino-Soviet power might, in its own image, best industrialize the Far East. Responsibility for the setback to American policy in Asia may be a topic of bitter debate. But if Sino-Soviet rule is fortified there with the aid of German heavy industry, the blame will be less difficult to apportion. A bi-partisan American policy which reunified and rehabilitated the West German Republic may prove more self-defeating in distant Asia than anything done or left undone by the United States on the spot.

But if all the foregoing objections could be waived, there is still no reason to believe that the defence of the West itself would be improved by the sort of federal unity which the Schuman Plan foreshadows. To assess the defensive value of a federalized, Schumanized or Third Force Europe, we shall have to spell out its strategic implications. Pacifism was discredited by Axis aggression. Our uneasy atomic truce has, however, reawakened it. Could Europe, by disentangling herself from both East and West, by setting herself apart from the Atlantic Alliance, now purchase physical immunity? A neutral Third Force, rather than face the horrors of an atomic onslaught, might even prefer to surrender its liberty to a Soviet invader. But no such choice would be open to it. On its own soil, Third Force Europe, so far from debarring hostilities by others, must, by undermining our common Atlantic front, bring them nearer. To air-atomic bombardment North America is also vulnerable. But we are not as directly exposed to it and with us the scars of world war were never so grievous. Yet from Hitler, as from Wilhelm II before him, we have learned that we cannot be both neutral and free; peace by power is a lesson as valid now as then. Third Force escapists may have hit upon some other formula. But unless they have, their ideas testify not so much to Europe's own defensive capacity as to that returning vitality which a close link with North America alone can generate. For it is the security of unneutrality which has allowed Western Europe to indulge in idle dreams of remaining neutral.

To a full-scale Soviet advance the strength that Western Europe alone can muster would be no barrier. Under General Eisenhower, however, a stouter local defence by the Atlantic Allies—European and North American—is now being prepared. But at bottom what counts is that aggression upon Western Europe will evoke the ultimately preponderant power of the entire West. And if a Third Force derogates from such power, if it diminishes thereby our joint ability to resist, aggression itself is more likely to occur.

Underpinned by a Franco-German industrial union, a European federation might thus plan for prosperity at the cost of security. Today the safety of Western Europe rests on transatlantic rather than continental power; and that transatlantic power Western Europe may supplement but could never do without. What this means our occupation armies in Germany have illustrated. Assigned to impose a victor's writ, they have been discharging another, even bigger task. Once the Russian juggernaut rolls on toward the Rhine, they could not halt it. But to sweep away the armies of the West would be instantaneously to summon up on land, at sea and in the air that world balance, headed by the United States, through which an irretrievable balance of European power is slowly being replaced. At Berlin and at softer spots in the ramparts of the West, sleepless probings by Russia will not stop. The inner lines of her Eurasian power allow her to alternate pressure upon the Occident and the Orient. And from Korea the United States has now perceived that her preoccupations do not cease when her occupations are abandoned.

Asia nevertheless is still too backward to be, in any global contest, the main zone of decision. Between the free world and the Russian sphere, the line is demarcated by the armies of the West stationed in Western Germany. Behind them in turn begins the screen of defence, meagre in actuality, massive in potentiality, which the atom bomb and American strategic air power represent; one which permits the Atlantic Allies in both Western Europe and North America itself to rearm unmolested. Peace by retaliation may not be the peace for which we long and pray. But if a federalized or Schumanized Third Force Europe stays aloof that would deprive us not only of human, material and strategic assets; it must rob Atlantic power of immediate, landbased, air access to some of the vitals of Russian power. To reduce a countervailing threat of air or air-atomic reprisal from the West is to make still more precarious our truce with the East. And if it does that—if the onset of war is hastened by it rather than averted—a Third Force will be the first victim of its own endeavour to be neutral.

In normal circumstances as West Germans, under either Atlantic or pan-European auspices, cast off other Allied servitudes, their rising nationalism would anyhow find occupation armies hardest of all to stomach. But for the moment cross-currents are stronger than the stream itself. German opinion is torn between the sentiment of neutrality and the demand, engendered by Sino-Soviet aggression in Korea, that to repel an invader the occupying forces of the West be increased. And to this latter demand heed is being paid. Yet, since the United Nations reverse in Korea, West Germans have doubted our ability to come to their rescue; afraid of being left in the lurch, they have been reluctant to commit themselves to the defence of the West. Nor were they likely to show more enthusiasm in this regard as Moscow refused to accept or tolerate their rearmament. But what did American legislators and policymakers really expect? Towards German revival and European organization they have proceeded on the singularly wishful hypothesis that their West German protégés will tend automatically to march with us. In the short run West Germans themselves may not want to be penalized by Russia on our behalf. In the long run their interests and ours have never been the same.

Western Germany has her eastward irredenta—only in collaboration with Moscow can she repossess land and brethren now in its grip. Some European capitals may suspect that the West Germans, rearmed and with us at their back, will strive through an anti-Soviet war to recoup their losses in the east. Yet once they have thrown off Allied fetters, it may be simpler for them to fulfil national ambitions by looking not to Washington but to Moscow for support. War might then come but after, and not before, West German power will have shifted to the other side. Within the Bonn Republic German militarism, since the fiasco of its recent Nazi phase, is under an eclipse. Yet what matters in the world equilibrium as a whole is not the few divisions which West Germans could now furnish, but the total economic strength of which we ourselves have rendered them more and more free to dispose.

Nor is the Soviet denunciation of West German rearmament surprising. The war industries of the Ruhr and the Rhineland could, at this point, lend strength to the West; and whenever there is any prospect of that Russia will not acquiesce supinely. But by one who warned against a Nazi-Soviet pact when it might still have been forestalled, Bonn-Moscow antipathy cannot be deemed fixed or immutable. Russian intimidation is, as Voltaire said when the English hanged Admiral Byng, pour encourager les autres. The Kremlin, by presenting its bill in advance, does not only inform the Atlantic allies and the Bonn Republic of the price they may have to pay for any close military linkage; it tells West Germans where a less costly bargain can be struck. Russians and Germans have, after all, always oscillated in their relationship between threats of blandishment, between coercion and conciliation. Failing in one tack they may try another and even as they appear to clash on the surface they might converge below.

It is because the East has ultimately more to offer Germany than the West that no Schumanizing project can endure. As we pull the Bonn Republic in one direction, we equip it to spring back in another. In the administrative procedures of a coal-steel pool or a federal Europe, there is nothing irrevocable. Beyond recall, however is the industrial productivity which these would release and abet. For the more we restore the permanent material foundations of German power — whether it be under a European Recovery Programme, an Atlantic rearmament scheme or a Schuman federal plan—the more we redress the inequality of Western Germany in the eyes of Moscow itself. And the more the Bonn Republic thus acquires a freedom of manoeuvre, the more it sheds its inferiority in power as well as status, the less improbable is it that any Schuman Plan can, at a fit hour, be revised or misused. Whatever raises the steel output of Western Germany must add to her bargaining strength. For in the zoology of politics there is nothing to prove that by unchaining a leopard you can change its spots.

Acclaiming the Schuman Plan as the harbinger of a Third Force, Chancellor Adenauer let the cat out of the bag almost at once. And while he must vanish from the scene, those twin immortals, his Nazi steel advisers and the Ruhr steel barons, go on forever. Not that German industrialists favoured the Schuman Plan; the unregulated development of German steel seemed too near for any such orderly progression toward their goal. The goal remains. And within it may be the makings of a tug-of-war for Western Europe between our Atlantic world and that Slavonic or Teuto-Slavonic world whose advent we ourselves will have quickened.

Americans are all for a Schumanized or federalized Europe and critical of Britain for dragging her feet. Eventually, however, the United States herself will not be content to rebuild economically and underwrite militarily a Third Force Europe, whose independent middle stance must augment the very hazards a more integrated Atlantic defence may yet dispel. To the sort of European unity which the British now decline, Americans later on might object. For the world contest is not one solely between Russia and the United States from which others can disengage themselves politically at will. Isolation everywhere is obsolete. And if neutrals must rearm, then so must a neutral Germany. To the problem of German rearmament a European Third Force has often been held up as a solution. It would in fact be no solution at all.

British rejection of the Schuman Plan is, at any rate, not a blow at the unity of the West but a cogent reminder of the solid political substratum on which it should rest. The Atlantic Alliance was, in the French view, aimed against the Germans as much as against the Russians. The Schuman Plan signalizes more than a decrease in Gallic targets; in making our top military dispositions, it would take for granted the identity of Germans with the West. Yet East-West peace is kept by a world and not a European balance; it is a German resurgence which, more than anything else, may tip the scales from West to East rather than from East to West. And to make the defence of the West hinge upon German rearmament is to misconceive the dimensions of the world contest. Our Atlantic community will be safer when Allied arms on the continent of Europe are stronger. But it is through the total power of the West, and not just through its European segment, that peace has been and may be maintained. And if German power, as a buttress of that segment, is unreliable, our security will be greater without it.

Between peace at any price and war at any price there is a middle ground. On it statesmanship will seek to preserve major interests, moral, political, strategic, through peace if possible, through war as a last resort. Appeasement is when you sacrifice those major interests gratuitously and to no avail. But what evidence is there, past or present, that the remilitarization of Western Germany itself, as distinguished from our common Atlantic defence of German territory, can be reckoned among them? So dubious is German loyalty to the West that we appease when we foster German power (whether the project be one of economic rebirth, a Schuman Plan or a rearmament programme) and not when we keep it within bounds. And that, too, is why we can, in this particular context, afford to be flexible rather than rigid.

But we live in a fool's paradise if we pretend that some federalizing or Schumanizing paper device, as fashioned in Paris and Bonn, can disguise indefinitely the iron realities. Through the uncontrollable power of a large German State, reindustrialized and politically equalized, we may yet undo with one hand what we do with the other.

How, then, should the West be consolidated? To plan in semi-continental rather than Atlantic or oceanic terms may be to narrow and not broaden its scope. Twice already in the twentieth century Western Europe has been united—most of it under William II and virtually all of it under Adolf Hitler. Federalized or Schumanized as a single politico-economic unit, its fate—and ours—will be determined by a central Germanic dynamism. Yet if it avoids intimate organic ties, it can function with less apparent logic but with more underlying regard for its own freedom and our common heritage. Atlantic unity, with bonds as loose as we have them, as tight as may be practicable, is a safer bet than European union. For only in that manner can each major portion of an interdependent West fully pull its weight.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Lionel Gelber was born in Canada and taught international affairs at the University of Toronto. He is the author of many outstanding works on international problems including Reprieve From War (Macmillan, 1950). One of the important topics in that book dealt with the post-war appeasement of Germany and the danger of a Russo-German Agreement. Reviewing this book in the "New York Times," Mr. Erwin Canham, Editor of "The Christian Science Monitor," described it as "brief and vigorous" and added that in 1942 Lionel Gelber had written Peace By Power "which today may be regarded as something of an authentic prophecy." In Reprieve From War, Mr. Canham observed, Lionel Gelber "takes the lessons of hard experience from history and projects them into the steps ahead we must take."

Lionel Gelber has warned against Russo-German agreement before—forecasting in March 1938 (the London "Fortnightly") that Nazi-Soviet Pact which during the next year precipitated world war. Reprieve From War is his third book. Peace By Power was preceded by The Rise of Anglo-American Friendship.

ALLIED CRITICISM VERBOTEN

From Ernest Leiser to the ONA:

"The conservative press in West Germany was up in arms at the valedictory statement of Jean Cattier, retiring chief of the ECA mission here and economics adviser to John J. McCloy, United States High Commissioner.

"Mr. Cattier, an international banker whose background would hardly make him a red-eyed radical, hit hard at the Bonn Government of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer for fostering a 'free enterprise' economy in which 'a small number of people live in luxury while the great masses of people have a meager existence.'

"For venturing this candid verdict, he has been attacked by conservative newspapers and, in private remarks, by members of Ludwig Erhard's Economic Ministry. The mildest of the epithets used to describe his comments have been 'tactless' and 'impertinent.' . . .

"The Conservatives have charged that the 'day is gone in which such American criticism of a German government policy is proper.' The influential Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung has commented editorially that 'no United States official would dare offer such presumptuous criticisms of any sovereign state in Europe.'"

A "NEW" BEST SELLER

From The Washington Evening Star:

"Shorthand notes of Hitler's dinner-table conversations during 1941 and 1942, published in book form, are becoming Germany's best seller of the year. Issued by the 'Institute for History of the National Socialist Epoch,' the book is likely to become a successor to 'Mein Kampf' as a textbook for would-be fuehrers and neo-Nazis. . . ."

THE SOVIETS GET A HELPING HAND

From a United Press Dispatch:

"Soviet Russia's deadly MIG jet fighters, opposing UN air forces in Korea, were designed by German engineers.

" 'Photographs I have seen of the latest-type Soviet jets made me absolutely sure they were built by German engineers,' said Prof. Ernst Heinkel, who started experimenting with jets in 1929.

" 'I distinctly recognized the style of Siegfried Guenther in the latest MIG planes,' he said, adding he had 'no doubt because Guenther was my collaborator for over 10 years.' . . ."

GERMANY IN DEFEAT

From the Wall Street Journal:

"In Western Germany, with its rapidly expanding automobile industry, great strides have been made in the motorization of traffic. According to the latest available figures, there are now about 2,500,000 passenger cars, trucks, and motorcycles registered in this country of about 48 million people. That's considerably higher than the European average."

FOR FUTURE REFERENCE

From Combat, Paris:

"Heinz Beck-Broichsitter, the leader of the Bruderschaft, wrote: 'The future and the heart of the German Reich is neither in Bonn or at Pankow, but in the ruins of the Reich Chancellery. Both the Eastern and the Western regimes were conceived in German defeat and they can only survive through the expediencies of the moment. The new regime doesn't like the Bruderschaft, but the latter will continue as a political system which will safeguard the traditions of all the struggles it has waged for the Reich and will pursue the struggle that will eventually rebuild the Reich.'"

NEO-NAZISM ON THE MARCH

From Le Populaire, Paris:

"Neo-Nazi movement is again on the march in Schleswig-Holstein. During a celebration that was given near Flansburg by a riding circle, about 250 members of the circle asked the orchestra to play the Badenweiler-Marsch which in the Third Reich was played only in the presence of Hitler.

"This march was vigorously applauded and the orchestra was then asked to play many other National Socialist songs during which the audience sang the refrain: 'We shall continue to march even when everything around us is destroyed, for today Germany is ours and tomorrow, the World.'

"In Lower-Saxony, the night before, various rightist extremists hauled down the Federal Flag from the city hall of Hildesheim near Hanover. This is the fifth time that such a thing happened in Lower-Saxony since the end of June."

From U. S. News and World Report:

"Britain's steel industry gets the small end of the stick in the compromise deal with West Germany over exports of scrap from Germany. After five months of heated controversy between London, Bonn and Washington. . . .

"West German steel industry can count on 325,000 tons of scrap in a month.

"Britain and U. S. together can be sure of no more than 30,000 to 40,000 tons a month of West German scrap. Compare that with British monthly imports of 100,000 tons of West German scrap last year, 130,000 tons the year before.

"Germans, allowed to use most of their scrap at home, seem to have won this round. British steel users will look to U. S. for steel more than ever.

"Russians figure to win in this deal, too. West Germans are now free to turn out more steel for machinery to go to East Germany, a Soviet zone. What makes this possible is the newly signed trade pact between West and East Germany.

"Soviet interference in Berlin trade, you'll remember, held up this pact for months. It was signed when Russians and West Germans knew there'd be enough scrap kept in West Germany to fill East Germany's orders for steel."

NEW" LEADERS IN EAST GERMANY

From Bulletin on German Questions:

"The number of former high officers who hold high positions in the Eastern Zone is increasing. Lieut. General Breithaupt is general of the People's Police in Saxony-Anhalt, Maj. General Lattmann in Brandenburg, Lieut. General Schubert in Thuringia, Lieut. General Weisenberg in Mecklenburg. It may be mentioned that Wilhelm Feldmann, Minister of Light Industries and member of the NDP (National Democratic Party), Brauns, treasurer of the NDP and owner of the Berolina-Verlag, Siegfried Dallmann, NDP, former Nazi students' leader of Thuringia, now Brandenburg's Minister of Finance, and Max Schneider, former HJ subleader, chairman of Berlin's NDP and deputy mayor of East Berlin, were officers too."

SONGS THEY NEVER FORGET

From Georges Blun in the Journal de Geneve:

"A few days ago, in a West German town, German sharpshooters met at a conclave known as Schutzenfest. These sharpshooters were dressed to celebrate the occasion and represented all classes of the population and all parties, ranging from Socialists to Nazis.

"Some of them had too much to drink. Music was blurting aloud. At the end of the celebration, the orchestra came out loud with the song, 'We Shall Destroy France Victoriously Again' (Sigreich wollen wir Frankreich Schlagen)."

AN APPEAL TO THE KREMLIN

From the J. T. A. News:

"The daughter of Baron Constantin von Neurath, former Nazi Foreign Minister and Hitler's 'Protector' for Bohemia and Moravia, has appealed to Premier Josef Stalin of Russia asking his consent to the release of her father from Spandau Prison in Berlin.

"Von Neurath is serving a 15-year term following his conviction by the Nuremberg Tribunal for war crimes. During the trial he admitted responsibility for a plan to destroy the Czechoslovak nation by the systematic elimination of its educated class. He also told the court that he believed the persecution of the Jews by the Nazi regime had been necessary. During his regime in Czechoslovakia, von Neurath once refused to sign anti-Jewish legislation for the Protectorate because he believed the draft submitted for his signature was too lenient."

MEMO TO TAXPAYERS

From The United Press:

"Representative Charles B. Brownson (R., Ind.), who is in the paint business himself, demanded to know yesterday why the Navy in 1944 and 1945 bought up enough tint to paint 10,666 battleships of the Missouri class, when mixed with white paint.

"What was worse, according to Brownson, was that the Navy turned around and disposed of tons of it as surplus to a German corporation, and now a German firm has offered to sell it back to the American paint company that made it. . . .

"The surplus paint was turned over to STEG, a German government corporation, he said.

"Another German firm, Wikolin-Werk of Bremen, has offered to sell 100 tons of it to the Perfection Paint and Color Co., Indianapolis, for $1.26 a gallon. . . ."

FROM ONE OF THEIR ADMIRERS

From The Chicago Daily Tribune:

"Germans, who form the third largest racial group in Canada, are being admitted to this country in large numbers again.

"In five months this year Canada took in 5,993 German immigrants compared with 1,600 to May 31 last year. . . .

"Rodney Adamson, member of parliament from Port Credit, Ont., visited Germany last winter and . . . urged the government to hasten the admission of more Germans.

"'The best immigrants are the West Germans, and there are hundreds of thousands who are anxious to come to Canada,' Adamson said. . . ."

THE PAN GERMAN DREAM GETS A BOOST

From The Chicago Daily Tribune:

"Newfoundland Premier Joseph R. Smallwood is importing all the German technical brains he can get to start new industries here with governmental financial backing. . . .

"Smallwood admires German technical efficiency.

"'Evacuate the 150,000,000 Americans from the United States and turn the country over to 50,000,000 Germans,' he said, 'and the Germans will advance the country more in the next 25 years than the Americans could.' . . ."

JUST A TOURIST

From The Washington Evening Star:

"Former Nazi storm trooper Otto Skorzeny, who once rescued Benito Mussolini and later spearheaded the 1944 Ardennes counteroffensive, no longer has a wanted sign on his head.

"He flew in two days ago and apparently is regarded as just a tourist in West Germany. . . .

". . . He was scheduled for denazification prosecution as a 'major Nazi offender.'

"The ex-SS colonel flew to his native land from Zurich on a Swiss Airliner. . . .

". . . United States authorities have no charges pending against him. . . .

"Skorzeny also sparked an advance force of troops in the Ardennes attack in the last winter of World War II. It was rumored then that he intended to try to reach Allied headquarters and kill Gen. Eisenhower."

Recommended Reading

In the publication of The Conduct of Life, Mr. Lewis Mumford has completed his monumental series of works dealing with the nature of man and society. From every point of view The Conduct of Life is a brilliant and thoughtful work revealing Mr. Mumford's profound grasp of human events and their inter-reaction on human beings.

Mr. Mumford is one of America's outstanding social philosophers and historians. He demonstrated his talents in his former works including "Techniques and Civilization," "The Culture of Cities," and the "Condition of Man." There is no doubt that The Conduct of Life is a logical and fitting sequel to these former works and we concur with Van Wyck Brooks' statement that The Conduct of Life is "one of the most important events in modern American thinking and writing."

The Conduct of Life is a penetrating study of man and his environment. Optimism seems to pervade every page, for Mr. Mumford is confident that man's inner reorientation will eventually make "possible the eventual emergence of united humanity, no longer separated by impassable cultural walls." For him there is no contradiction between universality and individualism. On the contrary the higher unity of life must come through the merging of these two basic tendencies of history. Mr. Mumford believes that man's potentials are great. While he does not deprecate the advances of science he believes that man's dreams and inspirations are real driving forces which will lead humanity to greater heights. Mr. Mumford is by no means a rugged individualist, neither does he accept Marxism because "it makes the processes of history external to human choice and plan and buries the person in society."

The Conduct of Life endeavors to point a practical way toward the development of a universal brotherhood through the establishment of vast cultural and economic projects on a world wide scale. Mr. Mumford bases these proposals on his firm conviction that mutual aid and exchange are the key methods by which man can survive and enjoy the fruits of his labors.

As with his previous works, Mr. Mumford's The Conduct of Life endeavors to see beyond the day to day struggle and to work out the great objective which will fulfill the dreams of all men. Yet in a wider sense The Conduct of Life can serve as a guide to practical action too, and we believe that its message deserves to be pondered by all of us.

It is our considered judgment that Mr. Mumford has made another great contribution to social philosophy. He has succeeded in holding high the banner of human culture. The Conduct of Life should serve as a shining shield in the defense of humanity against the forces of obscurantism and inhumanity.

It is all so like the aftermath of 1918. The Germans, having lost everything, are starting from scratch. Old Nazi Cartels Never Die

by JEAN PAJUS

Old Nazi cartels never die—they never even fade. Ponder the latest activities of the infamous I. G. Farben cartel and its spokesman in the United States, Ernest K. Halbach. In one of the most brazen attempts in the history of the United States, Halbach, with the help of Leo Crowley, former Alien Property Custodian appointed in 1941 to protect the interests of the U. S. against the machinations of the enemy, succeeded in tacking to the Joint Resolution 289—a bill to end the state of war in Germany—an amendment that would enable the I. G. Farben to regain its former power in the U. S. The amendment, which was introduced in the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee by Senator Alexander Wiley of Wisconsin, provided that any citizen whose property was seized during the last war without a court trial to determine its enemy status and who entered into an agreement accepting compensation and relinquishing any further claim to the property will be permitted to institute a suit in court to have the settlement set aside and to recover the property or to receive additional compensation for it from the U. S. Treasury. This infamous rider was suggested to Senator Wiley by Leo Crowley, who in turn acted on behalf of E. Halbach, former president of the vested General Dyestuff Corporation.

And who is this Halbach who enjoys such power that a treaty is written in his behalf? Halbach, to be sure, is an American citizen of German origin. Way back in 1917, he was in the employ of Kluttroff and Pickhardt, and the New York Badische Company the German subsidiaries which later became part of I. G. Farben Company. Already in 1917, Halbach's employers claimed that their companies were strictly American, very patriotic and in no way connected with the enemy, Germany.

In 1941, shortly after Germany declared war on the U. S., Halbach was indignant at a statement made in the New York Times that his company was German owned and controlled. He wrote a letter to the Times in which he forcefully denied this statement while claiming that he and his company were very patriotic and very American. The Treasury and the Justice Department had something to say about his claims, for the evidence available was so conclusive that both Halbach and his company were indicted for conspiracy, and Leo Crowley was forced to seize the General Dyestuff Corporation stock as a German and Farben-owned corporation.

Mr. Halbach had at all times claimed that his company was American, but the official records clearly reveal that as far back as 1926 Halbach turned over the control of General Dyestuff Corporation to I. G. Farben. This was what the official record said about the true nature of Halbach's company: "None of the General Dyestuff Corporation stockholders, Halbach included, ever owned their stock outright . . . Their stock was always subject to option agreements restricting free sale or transfer of the stock and which provided for purchase from the holders at fixed prices and under fixed conditions. These option agreements were the means by which the I. G. Farben continuously retrieved control of the stock, allowing the current holder merely an interest of, at most, $100 per share."

And as regards Mr. Halbach's patriotic activities on behalf of the U. S., again Senator Kilgore's hearings would show him in his true light: "After the outbreak of war in the fall of 1939, Halbach zealously guarded Farben's interest . . . In January 1940, Halbach went to Italy to confer with Farben's officials on ways and means for Farben to evade the British blockade. On this and other occasions, Halbach worked out a program for supplying the Farben agents in South America with dyestuffs which they were no longer able to import from Germany. When these firms were placed on the British statutory blacklist or American proclaimed list, Halbach shipped the dyestuffs to consignees who were dummies for the Farben sales outfits."

Surely Halbach's "patriotic" efforts on behalf of the U. S. were known to Leo Crowley, the Alien Property Administrator. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Halbach was indicted for conspiracy, Mr. Crowley saw fit to turn the management of General Dyestuff over to Halbach, although he removed him as president of the company. And why did he do that? Apparently there was a "dearth" of talent in the U. S.; consequently, he was forced to rely on Mr. Halbach to run the General Dyestuff Corporation. For his efforts, Mr. Halbach was paid $36,000 a year plus a bonus of $46,000. Mr. Halbach's indispensability to the company lasted until 1950. Between 1942 and 1950, Halbach received a total compensation of over $550,000. While in charge of seized enemy property, Mr. Crowley was badly in need of legal advice to formulate the basic policies of his office on the methods of controlling foreign property. He was unable to find suitable counsel, he said. In desperation, he turned to the well-known firm of Sullivan and Cromwell, the head of which was John Foster Dulles. By a strange coincidence the firm of John Foster Dulles also acted as legal counsel to Mr. Ernest K. Halbach.

As we can see from the above, Mr. Halbach had no cause to complain about the treatment he received from Leo Crowley. Nor was Mr. Halbach unduly perturbed when the Alien Property Custodian filed an affidavit in December of 1944 against Halbach's company, which stated that "General Dyestuff Corporation and the record owners of stock who were acting on behalf and for the benefit of I. G. Farben, a national of an enemy country, Germany."

A few months later, on February 2, 1945, Mr. Halbach felt that it would be to his advantage to make a settlement out of court by withdrawing his claim on the General Dyestuff stock. Mr. Halbach and his friends accepted the sum of $696,544 out of the U. S. Treasury. But that was in 1945 when Mr. Halbach was convinced that Germany was defeated and that the policy of the U. S. to eliminate the pernicious I. G. Farben cartel was to stay.

Many things happened since February 2, 1945. Germany was defeated indeed, but in the Spring of 1951, a new wind was blowing in Washington, and Germany is now supposed to be the defender of our Western Christian civilization! But Mr. Halbach felt that the time was opportune to reassert himself. Mr. Halbach decided to sue the U. S. Government for recovery of his stock, claiming that the U. S. Government had coerced him to make the agreement of 1945. His chief witness was Mr. Crowley who testified to the fact that duress was used against Mr. Halbach. A few months later when Mr. Crowley was shown the documents by the Justice Department, he suddenly discovered that he was wrong in his earlier testimony. Both Mr. Halbach and Mr. Crowley decided to bide their time.

The time came early in October 1951, when the House of Representatives voted Resolution 289 to end the state of war in Germany. Although Mr. Crowley is a prominent Democrat, he did not hesitate to go to his Senator from Wisconsin, Senator Wiley, to ask him to attach a rider to Resolution 289 which would reopen the old I. G. Farben case.

Senator Wiley is the ranking Republican member of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, whose present chairman is Senator Tom Connolly of Texas. Although Senator Connolly does not usually see eye to eye with Senator Wiley, he did not mind obliging Senator Wiley. Thus, not only did he not object to Senator Wiley's rider, but gave him all the support in the Committee. On October 8, 1951, Resolution 289, including the Wiley rider, was ordered placed on the calendar. Both Senator Wiley and Senator Connolly thought nobody was watching. Apparently, however, there still were public-minded citizens in the U. S. who knew the import of the rider. One of these is Frank Edwards, radio commentator for the AFL, who was the first to come out with a blast against Senator Wiley's amendment. This is what Mr. Edwards said over a national hook-up on October 5, 1951:

> "If Senator Wiley's proposal goes through, the real victims will be the American boys who were the prisoners of the Germans, and the thousands of men who suffered through the misery and filth of the Nazi prison camps. Senator Wiley is proposing that we let the Germans get their clutches on the $240,000,000 worth of property and money which we took from them during the war. That money next into the Alien Property Custodian's possession and it is used by the War Claims Commission to pay the claims of American prisoners and internees.
> "Now Senator Wiley is proposing that we make it possible for the German cartels to block those payments to our boys, by reopening court fights to get their property back."

Mr. Edwards' radio talk sounded the alarm and set in motion a chain of events which indicate that the I. G. Farben scheme to regain their former power in the U. S. may not succeed. On October 11, bill 289 and the Wiley rider were placed on the calendar in the Senate. Senator Chavez of New Mexico and Senator Lehman of New York stood up and objected. The resolution failed to make the calendar. On October 16, 1951, Senator Lehman submitted an amendment to strike from the Joint Resolution 289 the Wiley rider. On October 18, the U. S. Senate voted to end the state of war with Germany and defeated the infamous rider. Through the courageous efforts of Senators Dennis Chavez and Herbert Lehman this unholy conspiracy was smashed on the Senate floor.

Have the Halbach-Crowley machinations been stopped for good? Only time will tell. Halbach will most assuredly try to find a congressman to sponsor a private bill in his behalf. But in the meantime, we take our hats off to Senators Chavez and Lehman and indeed to all the other senators who are ready to fight the battle for the American people and for the GI's.

"But when Germany again achieves complete independence, as in time she will; when five more years of reconstruction have obliterated further the scars of wars; when Germany, with Allied encouragement, indeed at Allied insistence, has raised a military force—then German political leaders will have new opportunities to appeal to latent German nationalism. . . .

"Later, when Germany is again free, economically recovered and possessed of an armed force, the temptation of German political leaders to seek a following by taking a violent nationalist irridentist line will be much greater. . . .

"It should never be forgotten that even if a future German armed force is part of the European army, possibly without a German air force and with little German heavy artillery, the German element could always precipitate an incident that would bring reprisals from the East and confront us with the choice of abandoning all Germany or facing war with Russia. . . ."

(Clifton Utley in the Chicago Sun-Times)

"It is only recently that Herbert Morrison—who is trying gradually to reverse Bevin's policy of keeping Britain clear of European commitments—has accepted what are held to be American proposals for the enlistment of a quarter of a million German soldiers by the end of next year. . . .

"Those who disagree with him believe broadly speaking, that before the army can be raised the Germans will insist upon conditions which will make them free, in fact if not in theory, to use it as they see fit. The political price of such an army, in their opinion, would be more than the Allies ought to pay. Their main argument is that the Germans are notoriously irresponsible and aggressive, that they have a lasting grievance against the Russians (who have given part of their country to the Poles) and ten million refugees who have nothing to lose by going to war. They say that the addition of German troops to the North Atlantic armies would not only constitute 'provocation combined with weakness' but would introduce an essentially aggressive element into an otherwise defensive alliance. They foresee two possible consequences of giving the Germans arms —that they would involve the Allies in an attempt to re-conquer Western Poland for Germany, or that they would come to terms with the Russians (who can re-draw the Polish frontier any time they like.)"

(From Herbert Roberts to ONA)

Notes On Spain

". . . Most certainly we do not forget Spain's official position with and assistance to our Axis enemies at a time when the fortunes of war were less favorable to us, nor can we disregard the activities, aims, organizations, and public utterances of the Falange, both past and present. These memories cannot be wiped out by actions more favorable to us now that we are about to achieve our goal of complete victory over those enemies of ours with whom the present Spanish regime identified itself in the past spiritually and by its public expressions and acts."

(From a letter from President Roosevelt to the American Ambassador to Spain, Mr. Norman Armour, March 10, 1945)

"A close adviser of the Spanish pretender, Don Juan, declared Saturday the new Spanish cabinet is 'more Nazi and anti-democratic than ever.'

"Jose Maria Gil Robles, exiled Spanish monarchist leader, charged here that Generalissimo Franco in the cabinet announced Thursday has restored the one-party system under the Falange. . . .

"'Franco has once again defied the Western democracies, for his new cabinet is more Nazi and anti-democratic than ever,' Gil Robles declared. . . .

"He charged that the appointment of Lt. Gen. Augustin Munoz Grande as secretary of the army was 'another indication of the pro-German and totalitarian aims of the new cabinet. Nobody should forget that Gen. Grande served under Hitler as commander in chief of the Blue Division, which fought against the Russians.'"

(From a dispatch to the Chicago Sun-Times, August 22, 1951)

"There are plenty of disturbing signs in Western Europe that our decision to make a military ally out of Franco Spain may have been a major psychological blunder.

. . . "In Paris, Europe's apprehensions seem well-founded. The Administration's stubborn insistence on going it alone in Spain—even at the risk of antagonizing our old friends and allies—suggests that Washington is getting somewhat panicky.

. . . "Needless to say, Western Europeans are unimpressed by the military value of Franco's ill-equipped and underpaid army, and they are not convinced we need more bases in the Western Mediterranean.

"Ideology plays a large part in their thinking. Having suffered more from the Nazis than Americans did, they balk at having a former buddy of Hitler's in the lineup. Tito, though a dictator, is more acceptable to them as an ally—largely because he was on our side during the last war.

"It's easy to brush off ideological arguments. Yet in doing so, we risk brushing off the willing and enthusiastic support of millions of Europeans; and we risk undoing much of the patient, laborious effort that's gone into selling the Atlantic Pact to a war-weary continent.

. . . "It's not enough to reply that Spanish bases are essential to our security. There's an easy answer to that one—if Uncle Sam is so feeble that he needs Franco in his corner to win the next one, then he might as well throw in the towel right now."

(William Attwood in the New York Post, September 17, 1951)

"The United States proposal to slip Generalissimo Franco into the Atlantic Alliance by the backdoor has kicked off a debate in European capitals that will now last until fall. The question at the heart of the debate is simple: 'Just how much strength will the Spanish dictator add to the anti-communist front?'

"The consensus in West European capitals is that Franco represents a drain, rather than an addition of strength.

"Here are some of the salient points of discussion in Paris:

(1) "Official American statements that Spain's inclusion was demanded by military authorities does not include General Eisenhower. . . .

(2) "The military men who applaud the American deal with Franco base their case on geography. Franco has four major naval bases on the Atlantic and Mediterranean, and three airfields that can handle B29s. The U. S. Navy and Air Force want to use them.

(3) ". . . Naval officials and airmen who oppose the Franco deal point out that, geographically, these bases are not really indispensable to the operations of the U. S. Sixth Fleet, the dominant military force in the Mediterranean today.

(4) ". . . Ground generals are more nearly unanimous in their opinion of Franco's Army than Air and Naval Commanders.

"Franco's Army consists of twenty-odd divisions of 8 or 9,000 men apiece, of which two are supposedly 'mechanized.'

"These divisions are among the most antiquated in Europe today. Though their small arms and machine guns are of good local manufacture, their artillery is a hodge-podge of French, Italian, German, Czech and Spanish pieces (usually mixed in a single division) of from ten to thirty years old. The two mechanized divisions are equipped with tanks left over from the Civil War—that is to say, tanks that are fourteen or fifteen years old and not only obsolete but antique.

". . . Finally, Spain's industrial geography works against a useful role in military alliance. Spain is an industrial desert except for the Basque country and Barcelona, the only areas where modern support and facilities might possibly be forthcoming for Atlantic forces. But these areas are precisely those in which anti-Franco feeling is strongest, where industrial unrest and dissidence are closest to the surface.

". . . The chief source of strength of the North Atlantic Alliance, at present, is the spirit of freedom among its peoples, and the challenge freedom offers to the sodden terror of Communism. But Franco is an out-and-out avowed Fascist, a man who was brought to power by the aid of Hitler and Mussolini and who aided them against the Allies during the war. He is as ruthless a dictator as Stalin. As such he is execrated by the majority of people in our major Allies, Britain and France, middle-class and worker, Catholic and Protestant alike. To associate Franco, say European politicians, is to weaken the Atlantic Alliance at its roots in men's hearts and to give to the Communists a propaganda and political advantage of cardinal importance."

(Theodore White to ONA, August 14, 1951)

"Having fought the greatest war in history to defeat fascism are we now in such desperate straits that we must take a fascist regime as an ally?

". . . Perhaps fascism will take root elsewhere, for can one honestly say in this day and age, even in the United States that there is no danger of the contagion of fascism?

"There are those who will argue that our hatred of communism is no less than for fascism and yet we do not balk at cooperating with Tito. That statement is correct but in our judgment can be answered. When we aid Tito we give comfort to an important defection in the Communist Front and to that extent we help ourselves. Yugoslavia might well go one way or another. We want if we can to widen the split between it and the Kremlin.

"In the course of this editorial some leading and necessarily hostile questions have been asked. They should be answered by Secretary Marshall or Secretary Acheson or both.

". . . But until the gnawing questions are answered satisfactorily, many Americans are going to feel that we are making a mistake in linking our democracy with Franco Spain."

(From a New York Times editorial, "Do We Need Franco?", August 30, 1951)

"It inflicts a damaging blow to our prestige and dignity. It weakens the Atlantic treaty. It introduces a factor of jealousy and intrigue into Western Europe and opens a way for Europe's fascists in every country to compete with Europe's democrats for America's favor."

(From the London Observer)

What Price Spain

"To what extent can the United States afford to offend its principal allies?

". . . Just how can a dictatorship be made acceptable to the democratic world?

"A few new faces in high places will hardly change the nature of Falangist fascism.

". . . So far as purely military considerations go, it is most unlikely that Franco should drift into the Communist camp. After all, Spain is flanked by allied bases in France and North Africa.

"If we insist on a Spanish deal, the British and the French governments probably would be compelled to accept it. But they would do so against their will and judgment."

(From an editorial in St. Louis Post Dispatch, July 17, 1951)

"The spectacle of the German Communist puppet show in East Berlin with its tens of thousands of hungry youths filtering across sector lines for a square meal and perhaps permanent escape in the capitalist atmosphere of West Berlin has more than its amusing aspects.

" . . . Mussolini applied it to the youth of Italy between the two world wars and Hitler refined and intensified its application to the youth of Germany over the crowded decade of the thirties."

(From John C. Henry in The Washington Evening Star)

"What the United States is trying to do now is restore some kind of equilibrium throughout this entire area (Pacific). The instruments at hand are not always ideal, but the area has to be policed and policemen must have police stations.

"So United States troops are staying in Japan, and the Japanese are being revived, and by a series of quickly organized ad hoc treaties the Communists are being warned to take it easy.

". . . Nobody here has any illusions about the democratization of Japan. Nobody thinks Japan is going to be happy with a United States dole and a United States policeman in the corner. And there is general agreement that Japan is just as likely to follow the political lead of China proper as that China is likely to follow the political lead of Japan.

"So the advice of the delegates, even if they don't take it themselves, is not to be diverted from the big thing that is happening here. And that, they agree, is not that the Russians and Americans are slanging one another again, but that the quiet and polite Japanese are regaining their independence."

The Great Gamble

I

It was to be expected, we suppose, that the contractual agreement recently concluded between West Germany and the Big Three would be acclaimed by all officials who have been responsible for this pact. Perhaps the official characterization of these agreements can best be summed up in the words of Secretary of State Dean Acheson who told a nation-wide radio audience that the accord represents "the birth of a new Germany, a new Europe and a new period in history."

As much as we should like to share this official optimism, current developments in and out of Germany give no cause for exuberance. We cannot for one moment forget that the Germans have used every trick and blackmail tactic to extort unprecedented concessions. On the very eve of the signing of the contract, Chancellor Adenauer demanded immediate relief for German war criminals "to popularize" the agreements among the Germans. What a price for Germany's "cooperation"!

The Allied experts who believed the pact would finally put an end to German demands should take another look at what is now occurring in Germany. Dr. Hans Muehlenfeld, a leading member of the German Party, which is part of the Adenauer coalition Government, denounced the contractual agreement as a "second Versailles Treaty." The Nationalist leader of the Social Democratic Party, Kurt Schumacher, declared that anyone affixing his signature to this agreement ceases to be a German. These attacks have been re-echoed in the German press. They come from all sides, regardless of ideological persuasion and underline the fact that the Adenauer policy no longer reflects the basic moods and attitudes of the German people. One leading official of the Social Democratic Party told a group of United States Congressmen that even if the West German Parliament should support the contractual agreement, it would have no validity "since the present Government does not represent a majority of the people."

In France, the people are unimpressed by the official optimism. Everyone knew, of course, that the Communists, taking their cue from Moscow, would howl. But the voices of the many genuine democrats who have experienced the horrors of German invasions and occupations are crying out in protest. Their fears have been reflected in the warnings of many of their outstanding statesmen, including Edouard Herriot.

In England, too, there is a rising crescendo of protests—not merely from the left wing of the Laborites—but even among the more conservative elements including Lord Beaverbrook, one of Prime Minister Churchill's closest war-time collaborators. Lord Beaverbrook said that he opposed the contractual agreement because it would open the way to German rearmament and he opposes German rearmament because he feels that the Germans cannot be trusted. He cited the Soviet-German agreements of 1922 and 1939 as two examples which should serve as a warning to the West. His views are reflected in some of the leading newspapers in Britain, including the Daily Express, the largest morning newspaper in Britain, with a circulation of more than four million.

Some of the keenest observers of international affairs in the United States, among them Mr. Walter Lippmann, have also expressed grave doubts as to the good that will come out of these agreements. In short, we find that while these accords are celebrated officially as grandiose achievements in the direction of strengthening Western unity against Soviet totalitarianism, they are actually creating the opposite result. They are driving still deeper the fears and suspicions of the peoples of Western Europe who live closer to the Germans, who have suffered at the hands of the Hitlerites and who are well aware of the fact that the Germans will settle for nothing less than complete mastery of Europe.

It is a fact that important sections of public opinion in Western Europe are convinced that they have been pressured by the United States to accept the hand of the former enemy. Meanwhile, many Americans are under the impression that the French and the British are "dragging their feet." Thus, where unity was supposed to have been achieved in the West, the wounds of the past have been opened up and disunity is raising its head again.

This ominous situation recalls to our mind the diplomacy of Chancellor Adenauer's friend, Gustave Stresemann, Germany's Foreign Minister from 1923 to 1929. It was Mr. Stresemann's mission to undo Germany's defeat after World War I and to create the pre-conditions that would enable Germany to make a new bid for world domination.

One factor which had to be overcome was the apparent solidarity of the West in the early twenties. Herr Stresemann succeeded in smashing this unity through the Locarno Pact of 1925. Ostensibly this pact between Germany and the West was to herald a new deal for war-torn Europe. But Mr. Stresemann thought otherwise. "Our policy," he boasted, "of offering the Entente powers a security pact was undoubtedly correct. . . . It broke up the Entente." In other words, Mr. Stresemann realized that only by pretending that the Germans had cast their lot with the West could the vigilance and security of the Allied powers be effectively undermined. Once this was achieved, the Germans were able to destroy all the security provisions of the Versailles Treaty, and this finally paved the way for Hitler's Third Reich.

It is unquestionably true that the West must be made stronger against the threats from the East. However, such strength will not be created through paper accords with a people who have been notorious in flaunting signed agreements in the past. We have been told that Dr. Adenauer is a reliable friend of democracy, but right under his nose Nazism is rearing its head again, and when he departs from the scene who will dare to predict how this Germany, uncontrolled and rearmed, will act?

In August, 1943, at the very height of the war, Ulrich von Hassell, a German Conservative and former diplomatic representative of the German Reich, outlined in his diary the method by which Germany could once again become an independent power after Hitler's fall. "Germany would have to exploit all opportunities. There is only one expedient left—to make either Russia or the Anglo-Americans understand their interest in a sound Germany. . . . In this game, I prefer the Western orientation—but if need be—I would also consider an agreement with Russia."

This is the way a conservative German who allegedly was anti-Nazi viewed an independent Reich, and yet our experts tell us that the contractual agreement will bring a new era of peace and security to Europe and the United States. Perhaps it would be well for them to ponder the words of another authority, Professor Gordon A. Craig of Princeton University who, in an address to the semi-annual meeting of the Academy of Political Science some time ago, said:

"The present tug-of-war over Germany involves great dangers for the Western World. The chiefest of these we all realize—namely, that Russia may win the struggle and dominate all Germany. But even if that does not happen—even if the Western Powers succeed in establishing a viable Western German state—there is the danger that, in doing so, we may forget the original objectives of our German policy, restore to power individuals and groups whose values have nothing in common with our own, and create a state which is a source of embarrassment and danger to the Western bloc.

"It is important for Americans to assess the dangers inherent in their present policy in Germany; and one way for them to do so is to turn to history. For Germany once before was a defeated Power—once before she stood between the East and the West—and, on that previous occasion, she was able to exploit her situation in order to escape the controls which military defeat had brought upon her and to involve the world in another war. . . ."

"Strong Western Germany, . . . is on the horizon.

"German troops, not French troops, will thus seem to U. S. strategists as the ones to count on, the ones ultimately to relieve U. S. forces in Europe.

"In this case, Germany will again be the big power in Western Europe. And, instead of Western Europe bossing Germany, it may be the other way around.

"This isn't the way U. S. planned it, but it's the way things are going."

(The U. S. News and World Report)

"Germans make no concealment of their aims in Eastern Europe. They are out to regain wide territories now Polish, Czech and Russian. Could that come about without war? . . . German rearmament might prove to be an irrevocable stage along the road to hell on earth."

(Mr. Hugh Dalton, British Member of Parliament)

II

The recent Soviet Notes which made a grandstand play for the hand of the Germans caused much confusion and embarrassment in the camp of the local comrades. It has not been easy for them to "explain" the Soviet somersault which unmasks Moscow's pretentions for a de-militarized and de-Nazified Germany. The Soviets have now gone all out for the "rehabilitation" of the Nazis and for the resurrection of a new German Wehrmacht buttressed by a non-controlled industrial war potential. For months prior to the Soviet Notes, the Communist press had been harping on the theme that it was the West that was re-Nazifying Germany and rebuilding its war potential. Now these mouthpieces of the Kremlin must find the balm to take out some of the sting of the latest Soviet proposals.

The local comrades were not the only ones to be embarrassed. Many anti-Communists are equally perplexed and confused. They have been saying all along that anyone who opposed the remilitarization of Germany and the "rehabilitation" of the Nazis was really spouting the Communist line. Despite their protestations of anti-Communism, they now find themselves in the awkward position of advocating a policy which runs parallel to that of the Kremlin.

The confusion in the anti-Communist camp runs all the way up to the Chancelleries of the free world. The State Department has been taken aback by the Soviet bombshell and so has the British Foreign Office. Basically, the Foreign Offices of the Western powers were unprepared because they have been so immersed in their own schemes to reinvigorate the German power-house that they forgot that two can play at the same game.

Indeed, we have gone so far in cultivating the hand of the former enemy that even at this crucial juncture, we seem to be willing to depend upon the Germans for the answers.

Mr. William Henry Chamberlain, who has been a staunch advocate of German rearmament and has regarded the original American de-Nazification policy as playing into the hands of the Soviets, has tried to analyze the meaning of the Soviet notes in his regular column in the Wall Street Journal. On April 3, 1952, he discussed the Soviet notes, but he offered little in the way of a positive program to meet the challenge. He seemed to take comfort from the fact that the Germans would obtain a better deal from the West, and that they would be happier in a Western European army where they would be treated as equals and wear the same army uniforms as their Western neighbors.

However, Mr. Chamberlain is not at all sure that these attractive concessions will win over the Germans. Therefore, he finds himself admitting "in the last analysis it is the mood of the German people that is likely to decide which turn Germany will take at the historic crossroad where it stands now."

In the Wall Street Journal on April 18, Mr. Chamberlain returned to a discussion of the Soviet notes. But once again he had to admit that "Germany can be a valuable, perhaps an indispensable ally, but only if the majority of the Germans are genuinely convinced that this is in their own national interest."

The prominent British publicist, Norman Angell, writing in the New Leader of April 14, 1952, was also appalled over current developments as regards the German problem. He notes that the present situation "now makes Germany the arbiter of Europe's destiny; perhaps that of Western civilization as a whole . . . It is a strange outcome of two wars against Germany that they should have become part of the process by which our fate now depends upon the political wisdom of the German people."

Discussing Germany's military role in Western Europe, the N. Y. Times, April 22, 1952, observes: "So far as Germany is concerned, the success of the whole defense program depends largely on one man—Chancellor Adenauer."

We have come a long way from 1945 when we have to shape our own policies on the basis of Germany's moods, self-interests, and the popularity of one Bonn politician. The views quoted above do not reflect the strength of the United States, rather do they express a feeling of helplessness—a feeling that we are actually at the mercy of the former enemy we had supposedly crushed in 1945.

Even if we should be willing to admit that the fate of the free world rested on the moods and national interests of Germany, we could hardly afford to be optimistic. For example, the London Economist of March 22, 1952, admits that while the West has friends in Western Germany "they are still, it's true, in a minority." The Economist further observes that the Western policy "of integration and limited rearmament hangs in the balance because most Germans believe—rightly or wrongly—that partnership in Western Europe does not offer them the real substance of sovereignty."

Thus, we can see from these restrained admissions with regard to Germany's moods and what we know she considers to be her national interests, that we have little to look forward to in that direction.

It is no exaggeration to state that since 1945, we have been shaping our policy toward Germany precisely according to the moods and national interests of the Germans. These moods have nothing in common with the democratic aspirations of the free world. They are moods which breed aggressive nationalism and contempt for the allied program of punishing Germany's war criminals. As for Germany's national interests, they have always been best expressed in the slogan "Deutschland ueber alles." If we can find no better solution than to mercifully hope for a favorable change in Germany's moods then we have reached a point of bankruptcy in our handling of the German problem and in thwarting Moscow's ambitions.

. . . "Are we winning our gamble in Bonn? I put this frank question to American diplomats . . . and got frank answers. Most, some with their fingers crossed, think that we are. They realize that there are quite a few explosive mines floating about in these troubled waters. They had hoped to be able to mount their policy on a broad coalition between Adenauer and Schumacher, but found that impossible. They realize that the Soviets can float a serious unity proposal at any time. But they think it will be booby-trapped, and that they can convince the Germans it is booby-trapped. . . . This is American optimism at its best. . . . We say that we are out to build up the military strength of Western Germany in order, at some later date, to negotiate with the Soviets about Europe. There is a paradox hidden here somewhere. For if we are going to negotiate about Europe, a German settlement would have to be part of it. This might be easier to get, now in 1952, than after we have raised the Frankenstein monster of a new German army.

"For even if the Western powers and the Soviets no longer have any mutual aims in Germany, they certainly have mutual fears. Germany has been the sad occasion of two World Wars, and even the Germans have no belly for a third. Yet there are forces lurking around in the Teutonic political underworld yearning to use the East-West clash as a springboard for one more attempt to cut the throat of the world. Now—while most Germans are more interested in unity than conquest—might be the best time to get a German settlement that even the Germans would be glad to sign."

WALTER WINCHELL

"Commissioner McCloy casually dismissed West Germany's adoption of 'Deutschland Uber Alles' as its national anthem by arguing 'the important thing is not what people sing but how they act.' McCloy is wrong on two counts. The songs a nation sings are an indication of its national character—and the singing itself is a significant act. . . . The history of the past half-century certifies that 'Deutschland Uber Alles' has not only been the German national anthem, but a reflection of its national policies. Its lyrics represent the world-conquering ambitions of the Kaiser's legions as well as the super-race theories of the Nazi hordes. The grim echoes of the ominous anthem have been the thunder of two World Wars. . . . Nations live by symbols as well as laws. Frequently the symbols offer a clearer insight into a country's fundamental tenets than the speeches of its leaders. 'The Star-Spangled Banner' symbolizes the ideal of liberty and 'Deutschland Uber Alles' obviously signifies the ancient German dream of world domination.

"The march of free men has never included those who goosestep to the sound of 'Deutschland Uber Alles.' "

"Once they have gotten from the West all that the West has to give them in the way of sovereign rights and help in the restoration of their power, their great unsettled problem will be in the East. It is to the East that they must turn to end the partition, to readjust their eastern frontiers, and to open up the markets and resources of Eurasia to German industry. The Russians alone can satisfy these needs and ambitions without a ruinous war. On the other hand, the Germans, once they are again the first power on the continent, will have much to offer the Russians in return.

"It is only reasonable to suppose that both the Germans and the Russians will, when that time comes for a show-down, prefer a mutually profitable and cold-blooded deal to a suicidal war."

"That Western Europe cannot be made defensible with German help;

"That rearming West Germany is more likely to provoke than to deter attack; and

"That if our present plans do not invite a Russian 'spoiling attack' they will confide the future of Europe into the hands of a dominant Germany—a Germany which will either drag the West into war in order to regain its lost provinces, or regain those provinces by selling out the West in a new Rapallo.

". . . In other words, the present NATO plan is inadequate; the danger of rearming Germany is real. The answer is more British and American troops permanently stationed in Europe, not only to defend its frontiers against Russia but to keep Germany from achieving dominance in Europe and to prevent Germany from either dragging us all into war or sell us all down the river. . . .

"The answer is, as I have said, to try to negotiate the future of Germany with Russia, before a rearmed Germany takes its future—and ours—into its own hands."

DREW MIDDLETON
(Chief, Berlin Bureau, New York Times)

"To the German people Chancellor Adenauer's announcement will represent a moral victory for those pressure groups in this country who for the past four years have maintained a sustained campaign for reduction of sentences of war criminals, a campaign which has expanded into a criticism of the whole theory of punishment for war crimes and for crimes against humanity such as those committed in concentration camps far from the battle lines.

"This campaign was assisted by the failure of the war crimes trials to make any deep psychological impression on the German people. If such trials were intended to impress the Germans with the penalties for inhumanity, they failed signally. This does not mean that the German people universally pardon the war criminals or the Nazi regime. It does mean that the Germans as a whole did not accept in 1945, when they thought of it, the legal concept behind the trials and that in the intervening years they have come to doubt the efficacy of such trials, the justice of the legal process and the efficiency with which these trials were organized and carried out by the occupation powers in Germany.

"In the light of the present mood of the German people it would be a mistake to expect any gratitude for the decision reached in London by Foreign Ministers Acheson, Eden and Schuman which will allow the establishment of new clemency boards. The Germans feel that at last something has been done to restore a situation which they regard as unfair and dictatorial."

DR. MAX WINKLER

(Bernard, Winkler & Co., Members N. Y. Stock Exchange)

"American investors made their first official acquaintance with German securities around the turn of the century: In 1903, the City of Frankfort-on-Main obtained a loan in the New York market at 3½%, payable in marks or in dollars at the prevailing rate of exchange on Berlin. . . . The investment was practically wiped out. Thus ended Round One.

"Between November, 1918 and 1923, during the steady decline of the mark, Americans were heavy buyers of German currency and bonds of the German government, German states, cities and corporations, payable in marks. It has been estimated that $2½ billion were so invested (sic). These investments vanished with the virtual disappearance of the mark. Thus ended Round Two.

"While the mark was deteriorating the vanishing point, German bonds were declining in price correspondingly. Americans were disposing of their holdings to salvage whatever little was left, and Germans were re-purchasing them on a large scale. After they had re-acquired the bulk of American holdings for an insignificant fraction of what they had originally received, Germany passed the so-called Revaluation Law, which revalued mark holdings from 1½ to 6½ per cent of their 'gold' value. In this way, the American investor (sic) in German marks and mark obligations was caught 'coming and going,' and Round Three came to an inglorious end. . . .

"In the middle Twenties, loud cries went up for the urgent rehabilitation of Germany, the 'heart of the Continent' without which the Old World could not function. Americans were urged to invest in Germany, as a patriotic duty. . . .

"The 'assurance' that loans to Germany would serve three concrete purposes, viz., profit, humanitarianism and peace, appealed to the American investor and within five years, he contributed towards these ends, directly and indirectly, another $2½ billion. . . . It is generally admitted that without these billions, Germany's ability to wage war would have been greatly impaired.

"When Hitler came to power, virtually all dollar loans were repudiated. Payments were resumed in part, but ceased completely, when war broke out. Thus ended Round Four.

"Will American investors be prevailed upon to succumb for a fifth time? Pouring billions into Germany may lead to the same tragic results as before. A third World War will hurt Germany less than the so-called victors of World Wars I and II. American dollars supplied will never be returned. American lives lost could never be restored." . . .

THE LONDON ECONOMIST

"The policy of the western world towards Germany, as it stands today, amounts to a colossal gamble on Dr. Adenauer. It is doubtful whether the British public realizes the risks that are being run. The western powers have had more luck than they had any right to expect in finding, as the first Chancellor of the revived Germany, a statesman whose ideas run so largely parallel with their own and who has proved himself to be skillful in managing his own people. The present policy assumes that this good fortune will continue. . . . But opposition to him is strong and growing; and he is 76 years of age.

"The aspect that the Federal Republic of Western Germany now presents to the world might easily change within the next few years. Indeed, there are two separate threats. One is that Dr. Adenauer and what he stands for might be swept away, as Stresemann's republic was, by nationalist fervor and trade recession. It was less than seven years from Locarno to Hitler. The risk that Dr. Adenauer runs in this direction is that his policy of integration with the west cannot, from its nature, offer much to satisfy the nationalist longings of the German people. The other threat arises from the fact that the Russians and their East German puppets are now offering the German people their national unity—on terms the danger of which is not obvious on the surface."

(Member of Parliament addressing a memorial meeting in London on the 9th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising)

. . . "But there is no capacity to understand this mass social insanity that claimed and possessed large sections of the German people so that they became devoid of judgment, robbed of compassion, capable of bestialities not to be found even in the jungle.

"If this is for us impossible, there is other thinking both relevant and possible. . . . I find myself greatly distressed to observe that in many areas of life in the Western German Republic, Nazis are again being permitted to assume positions of responsibility. We know that you cannot put a race in prison. Yet I say, quite apart from party considerations, that the Government of Great Britain, and I submit deferentially, the Governments of France and the United States, must affirm that not only will they not deal with Nazis, but that their attitude towards the Government of Western Germany must be heavily conditioned by whether or not that Government or its officials maintain a firm and just opposition to the Nazis, their propaganda and all their works.

"If we are in earnest, we must continue to exert the greatest caution towards Germany and her rearmament. It is unfortunately true that neither the policies nor the activities of Soviet Russia will permit us to conclude otherwise than that there cannot be stable conditions achieved in Europe at the present time. We cannot therefore as a people and a country escape from the regrettable necessity to forge at this moment adequate defenses. But these defenses, in my opinion, will continue to rest primarily upon the coincidence of British and American foreign policies. Anyone who argues otherwise is not only an opponent of peace in Europe but is trifling with the peace of our own country. Equally, we cannot take any risks with Germany. Germany is at this moment being permitted to maneuver the democratic powers, so that she might find herself in a position to demand the terms upon which she will consent to rearm. No one doubts that there is not a political party in Germany just now which does not harbor in its heart the hope that in the forefront of these terms will be the demand to revise the German frontiers of 1945. That is not the road to peace nor to our safety.

"It would be disastrous to halt our defense preparations. In my view, it would be almost equally disastrous to hurry German rearmament. Germany, in my opinion, must be at the bottom of a European queue for rearmament. Those whom we know to be our friends, as much by their thinking as their past association, are the people whom we first must arm for collective defense before we give help to those who still have to demonstrate that they are worthy of the trust of the democratic powers." . . .

FROM AN EDITORIAL IN "UNITED NATIONS WORLD"

"There is a German proverb 'the worst a tailor can do is to try to fit a coat to the design of a button.' It seems as if the rearmament of Western Germany, contrary ~~to American be~~lief, is not an incentive for the federation of Europe but one of the strongest obstacles to it. In trying to make use of the 'button,' America may ruin the 'coat.' When in the autumn of 1950 Washington decided on the remilitarization of Western Germany, it took for granted that the Germans would be the first to hail it as an important concession. It was a miscalculation.

"When the other European nations, under the leadership of France, objected to the resurrection of Germany's military machine, Washington took for granted that the European army would allay their fears. Again a miscalculation.

"And today in trying to make the European army, with German participation, the cornerstone and test for European unity, the whole concept of a European federation is being jeopardized. By putting the major hope for the defense of the West on the German soldiers, Washington has subordinated political and social moves to considerations of military expediency—a strategy which, incidentally, in view of Germany's attitude, does not even promise the attainment of purely military objectives.

"A really efficient European army is dependent upon the unity of Europe, and not the other way around."

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

"Somewhere on this earth there is a congenial home for the follower of every political philosophy save the anti-Nazi. He alone has become a kind of international outlaw, a pariah as unwelcome now on the other side of the Elbe as he has long been on this. So much emerges unmistakably from the Soviet proposal that 'all former members of the German army, including officers and generals, and all former Nazis' should have the right to participate in the building of a united 'democratic peace-loving Germany.' The Russians propose further that Germany, having achieved democracy and a state of peace-lovingness with the aid of former S. S. Brigadenfuhrers and general staff officers, be permitted to have its own 'army, navy, and air forces.' The moral obtuseness of these proposals are unfortunately paralleled in the West's answer . . . We share with Russia a fervid desire to rearm the Germans, except naturally we want them to fight on our side. So we offer the Germans, instead of their old gray-green uniforms of unhappy memory, the more colorful garb of the European army—British cloth, perhaps, with a French cut to the jacket and more than a touch of American in the pockets. Both sides offer all-German elections, but only under conditions—again naturally—which would assure predetermined results. The exchange of notes are further moves in the courtship of a Fraulein whose 'yes,' The Nation is convinced, will make the successful suitor an even unhappier man than the rejected one."

THE TRICKERY OF THE 'TRUST BUSTERS'

In a dispatch from Bonn, Germany (May 13, 1952), the New York Times' correspondent, Jack Raymond, reported that the West German Government had prepared a draft for an anti-trust law. According to Mr. Raymond, this law against restraints of competition "could hardly have been foreseen in a country that created the greatest and most notorious cartels in the world." It would be a great day indeed if and when the Germans decided on their own to take the necessary steps to smash the trusts and cartels.

But a further reading of Mr. Raymond's dispatch, reveals that the proposed German law contains so many loop-holes that one can seriously question the sincerity of the "German Trust Busters."

Among the loop-holes mentioned are the following:

1. "In the event of a crisis in which a temporary decline of sales could be proved not related to fundamental change in demand, a producer could arrange for an exemption (from the law) for a limited period."

2. Permission is granted for the "rationalization of products and agreements to specialize. . . ."

3. Exceptions to be granted for "a possible cartel arrangement only upon application, if necessary, for the promotion of foreign trade."

At this writing, we do not know whether there are any other exceptions, but those cited above expose the trickery perpetrated by the German cartelists, with the apparent acquiescence of the Allied High Commission. The Bonn government is apparently advocating anti-trust legislation in principle, but in practice it is taking another line. This is further made clear by Mr. Raymond's concluding remarks that West Germany continues to object "to the demands made by the Allies for carrying out the program for breaking up the present steel, coal and iron trusts, as well as film and chemical trusts under Allied laws."

Mr. Raymond's observation is confirmed by several facts which have received little publicity. In the first place, the Allies have not succeeded as yet in breaking up the D. K. V., which are the initials for the monopolistic German Coal Selling Agency. This organization has been utilized by the German coal cartelists to strike at the economic welfare of those nations dependent on Ruhr coal. In this connection, the Allied High Commission, on July 17, 1951, announced that no less than 36 German coal combines would be exempted from the decartelization law. The Associated Press, commenting on this action, declared that it resulted in a "victory for the Germans."

The so-called deconcentration and decartelization of the German steel industry is also subject to serious question. (See November-December, 1951, issue of Prevent World War III, "The Triple Threat.")

The chemical industry dominated by I. G. Farben, is another field where the Allies have failed to carry out the effective decartelization and deconcentration measures.

Ever since the beginning of the occupation stories have come out of Germany telling about the wonderful successes achieved by the Allies breaking up the I. G. Farben octopus. However, on December 27, 1951, the New York Times carried the following report from one of its correspondents in Germany:

"A responsible source associated with the decartelization of I. G. Farben expressed today the view that the program was slipping through the Allies' fingers while former functionaries of the great cartel were regaining influence in the successor concerns.

"He cited the names of the members of the new Boards of Directors for the three I. G. Farben successor companies, adding that these three major companies easily could re-establish the old cartel relationship once the Allies had disappeared from the scene."

The Allied spokesman, quoted above, could just as well have applied his remarks to current developments in the German banking field. In previous issues of Prevent World War III, we discussed the tactics employed by the German bankers to regain their former positions

THE PLUG

(Cartoon by Hesse, Courtesy The St. Louis Globe-Democrat) of power despite Allied laws which were aimed at breaking up the German banking monopoly. Now a report from one of the German banks (Rhein-Main Bank, an offshoot of the Dresdener bank—March, 1952), boasts to its readers how successful the German bankers have been in thwarting these laws.

Significantly the report is entitled "Larger Banks Again." It tells how "handicapped" the German banking monopoly was in the early days of the occupation, but assures its readers that that "dismal" period has gone, never to return. The bank states that "the tremendous amount of suspicion and mistaken attitudes" on the part of the Allies "have been alleviated in the past seven years. . . ." The report goes on to say that "the interest and wishes of the banking industry will be the dominating factor in shaping future developments." In other words, the bankers are confident that they not only have won over the Allies to their way of thinking, but it will be the Germans and not the Allied laws who will determine the kind of banking structure that will exist in Germany in the future.

In the past the German economy was in the grips of three mammouth banks, i. e., the Deutsche Bank, the Dresdener Bank and the Commerz Bank. It was their financial power that provided the sinews for Hitler's war making machine. They were the arch profiteers in the looting of German occupied Europe. They were supposed to be broken up, but according to this report, the Allied laws, which were promulgated for this purpose, are withering on the vine. Instead, there will be a new "reorganization" based on the proposals submitted by German bankers led by the notorious Hermann Abs, one of Hitler's chief pay masters. The report further declares that "the reorganization of the bank structure will involve no modification in possible relationships with clients here or abroad. The fact that firm names will change again . . . is of no practical importance." Plus cela change plus c'est la meme chose.

Of course, much has been said of the Allied determination to deconcentrate and decartelize German industry. According to the new contractual agreement the necessity for this action, "in the case of Germany arises from the fact that the excessive concentration of economic power, which formerly existed, directly contributed to the growth and aggressive power of the Nazi regime." This is true, but we cannot understand why the above statement should talk about "former" concentrations of excessive power. They are still with us despite our avowed intentions to break them up.

TIME OFF FOR GOOD BEHAVIOR

"Someone handed Alfred Krupp von Bohlen a bouquet that day more than a year ago when he stepped out of the Landsberg Prison a free man. Krupp, the reigning monarch of Germany's great industrial house, had served five years and ten months of the twelve-year sentence he was given at Nuremberg for exploiting slave labor and plundering occupied countries. According to the sentence his property rights were also confiscated, but they were restored along with his freedom.

"Krupp, a pale man in his middle forties, had systematically looted the equipment of rival firms in occupied countries. His labor relations were nothing if not straightforward. On one occasion the Krupp firm brought three hundred young Jewesses to Germany from the gas chambers at Auschwitz, not to save their lives but to work them until they dropped dead of exhaustion and malnutrition.

"But in 1949, during the Berlin blockade, it was decided that Krupp's holdings would not be actually confiscated but only be "subject to" confiscation. Now we learn that soon Alfred Krupp will be given back all of his property—the machine shops, the real estate, the locomotive works, and all the rest of it. He won't get the steel mill which went to the Soviet Union, and he won't get the coal mines, but for them he will receive a generous settlement in cash—some tens of millions of dollars, we understand.

"Alfred Krupp, who managed to keep even Adolf Hitler aware of how much he owed to the Krupp empire, will once more find himself in the comfortable position of a multimillionaire in a country that is starved for capital."

(The Reporter)

"In the atmosphere of crisis we have yielded time and again to German nationalism. All our submission has not even produced a dependable military army.

"The Germans have steadily raised the price of co-operation; each time they hear that they are free Europe's indispensable men, their price rises higher. Decent democratic voices are lost amid the noise. As long as Germanys' leaders are convinced that nationalist bluster pays off, they will be unresponsive to any democratic idealism and scornful of true European federation."

(From an editorial in the New York Post)

. . ."Can the Allies really afford to give the Germans a free hand in connection with such serious issues as the reconstruction of the Ruhr cartels? Can they take a chance on the revival of German nationalism? Would German approval of the Schuman plan continue if Dr. Adenauer's right-wing opponents, rather than the Socialists, were to succeed him? And what might a West German regime, completely free of Allied restraints, do to bring about a reunion with East Germany?"

(From an editorial in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch)

DECEIVING ECONOMICS

The New York Times on January 3, 1952, carried a special supplement dealing with international business conditions and the economic prospects for world trade and finance in 1952. Germany was prominently featured not only in detailed articles by leading Times correspondents in that country, but also by extravagant advertisements which covered almost four full pages of the supplement. It may be true that German organizations and agents paid for these glamorous and expensive advertisements, but it is also true that the American taxpayers in particular have made it possible for the Germans to advertise their boasts and wares in one of the leading newspapers of the country.

The advertisements contain interesting information or, to be more accurate, misinformation, with respect to Germany's present economic status and her value to the West. To illustrate what we mean, we shall have to quote some of the choice statements contained in these ads and examine them in the light of the truth.

One of the full-page advertisements contains the following gem: "Western Germany has cast her lot with the Western world and is sincerely attempting through industrial and economic cooperation to express her appreciation to her friends in the West for the valuable assistance offered. . . ."

Has Western Germany cast her lot with the Western world and is she sincerely attempting to cooperate economically with the West? The Wall Street Journal of December 26, 1951, provides part of the answer: "While Britain and the United States grapple with shortages in defense industries, some West German firms are collaborating to build up the Soviet bloc's war potential with scarce materials. Western officials call this 'Operation Doublecross.' The materials are sold and delivered by West German business men to the Soviets by way of middlemen in neighboring countries. It is a way of making a 'fast mark.'"

More recently (April 23, 1952), the U. S. High Commission blacklisted 61 Western Germany firms charged with selling strategic materials to the Soviet Bloc. Nevertheless, this action did not deter the Lower House of the Bonn Parliament from passing unanimously a resolution on May 6, 1952, demanding that Western Allied restrictions on trade with the Communist East be abolished.

As is well known, Western Europe depends to a large extent for its economic development and defense on Ruhr coal. Are the Germans, as the advertisement intimates, helping in this direction? The London Economist of November 17, 1951, speaking about Germany's efforts to reduce the export of coal to her neighbors, makes the following disclosure: "Last week a leakage made it evident that the Germans' official statistics of coal production have been 'cooked' to support their claim for lower exports. Over 500,000 tons of coal per month have been sold internally at black market prices over and above official figures of availability. It is a long time since Germany's foreign trade statistics were censored in order to hide Hitler's rearmament drive, but little has changed except that corruption has spread. Germans still appear to think that they need take no trouble to cultivate friends."

Do the Germans appreciate Allied assistance which, according to one reliable source (U. S. News and World Report), runs as high as 9 billion dollars from the United States alone? The Associated Press several months ago quotes Kurt Schumacher, the leader of the German Socialist Party and candidate for the Chancellor's office, as stating that the Western Allies have been following "a ruthless policy of the victor." He painted the Allies as being "haughty, unrealistic, and stubborn." He further charged that Allied policy in Germany is the biggest obstacle to European reconstruction.

MR. KRUPP RIDES AGAIN

(De Groene Amsterdammer)

There are other leading politicians in Germany who share Herr Schumacher's viewpoint, including members of Chancellor Adenauer's cabinet. (See editorial, "They Dine and Whine," No. 38 issue of Prevent World War III.) In other words, key German politicians, let alone hundreds of other important figures who do not receive as much publicity but who are well known to the Allied authorities, have shown little appreciation for the unprecedented assistance which Germany has received since the end of the war. No wonder Mr. Benjamin Buttenwieser, former U. S. Assistant High Commissioner, complained that the Germans were playing "hard to get."

In the advertisement mentioned above there is an effort to paint a dark picture of Germany's present plight due to the influx of refugees. But the advertisement goes on to stress that Western Germany is striving to see to it that all refugees will "be housed and fed, and must be given the opportunity to make a decent living."

Authoritative sources show that the German Government has done little in this direction. As early as March, 1950, Guy J. Swope, Chief of the Displaced Population Division in the Office of the U. S. High Commissioner, wrote, "If the German leadership resolutely took the position that the refugees, who are, it must be remembered, of German blood, and therefore should be easily assimilable on that score, can be converted into a strong asset through establishing conditions under which they can add to the German production, it would be an indication of sound and sensible planning."

We proved at that time that the Bonn politicians have been reluctant to take positive steps because they regard these refugees as pawns in their long-range policies which have nothing in common with security or peace-time German economy.

Speaking about the unemployment situation in Germany which is supposed to be aggravated by the refugees, the London Economist declared that the Bonn Government "does not object to having a pool of unemployment at present. . . ." Why? Because this pool keeps wages low and therefore enables German exporters to undercut competition on the world market. German industrialists are not enthusiastic about creating new jobs because, according to the London Economist, home industries "reduce the volume of credit available for financing the present boom in imports and trade in consumer goods."

The economic motive is a partial explanation of the Bonn Government's real attitude toward the refugees. One must bear in mind, as the London Economist observes, that "the worst factors are rather that the refugees became penniless and that many of them are officials of the Nazi state or Party and dispossessed families for whom no jobs can be found. These are the men who represent a dangerous hotbed of nationalist ideas." In other words, these refugees can serve as an instrument for the furthering of policies which are diametrically opposed to the genuine democratization of Germany and the development of a peaceful Europe.

More recently the Manchester Guardian noted that hundreds of thousands of these refugees would make excellent farmers, but they are prevented from pursuing their trade because the bigwigs at Bonn have sabotaged the Allied land reform program. The German politicians prefer to keep the pot boiling. Though they weep for the refugees in public, they have other plans which are for private ears only. These plans are tied up with the super nationalistic campaign for the creation of a new Reich.

In another advertisement dealing with the "excellent" services of German banks, an appeal is made to American business men to deal with these banks. "No one knows Europe like these German banks"—this is the leading statement in the advertisement. We would agree that the German banks know Europe "like no one else." It is a truism because it was the German banks that preyed like vultures on the corpse of German-occupied Europe and milked it dry. There was no profitable enterprise of importance in any of the countries of Europe which the German banks did not infiltrate and/or appropriate. The records of the Deutschebank, the most powerful in Germany, is proof enough that the German banks "know Europe like no one else."

Drew Middleton, one of the Times correspondents, quotes a Ruhr company executive, as complaining that "we have no machines and no machine tools." (January 3, 1952.) This is an ironical note because one receives the very opposite impression from the advertisements which boast of the great machine tool capacity in Germany today. Here is but one example: "The wide variety of products of the German machine and machine tool industry, which are of especial interest to the United States, range from the smallest special machines to the mightiest power machines. There are almost 4,000 machinery manufacturing plants in Western Germany. . . . Today Germany is as well qualified as any country to fill shortages caused by the change-over of United States industry to defense production."

Does this sound as though Western Germany is suffering from machine tool starvation? The United States statistical report for December, 1951, reveals that Germany "is regaining her pre-war position as a world supplier of machine tools." Indeed, according to this same report, West Germany ranks next to the United States in this industry.

Reporting on the Paris Exhibition of European Industries, the Wall Street Journal of December 31, 1951, reports an American industrialist as declaring that the outstanding thing about the show was the "tremendous recovery made by the Germans in the development and production" of machine tools.

In view of the contraditions noted above, would it not be appropriate that the Bonn Government seek the services of an efficient public relations outfit in this country which could "coordinate" the lies with the truth?

Admittedly, the recovery of Western Germany is of tremendous significance, but there is nothing miraculous about it. In the first place, the Allies, and especially the United States, poured billions into Germany. In the second place, Western Germany's industrial might remained largely intact in spite of Allied bombardments. Even the puny reparations program hardly affected Germany's economic position. Yet while the advertisements on the one hand boast about achievements to date, there is still the overall theme that Germany is desperate and must continue to receive additional billions from the taxpayers of this country. This theme of helplessness is to a large extent deflated by an analysis of the German economy today. According to Jack Raymond of the New York Times, "by the end of year (1951) the question arose in many minds whether Germany, in 1952, would again rise to dominate the economy of Europe. . . .

"Germany has what the other nations of Europe do not have. She has a combination of great coal resources, a great steel plant (despite dismantling), and a disciplined labor force that puts in long hours at comparatively low pay. . . . Some experienced Allied officials even charged that the German cartels that dominated Europe will rise again because the Allied anti-trust program was bungled and many industrialists who proved themselves unreliable democrats in the past are returning to positions of influence."

Mr. Raymond's observations were recently confirmed by William H. Draper, Jr., the U. S. representative to the North Atlantic Council.

During a hearing in the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, Senator Hickenlooper declared:

"I was told . . . that Europeans were not so fearful of German military resurgence but that basically there was running through the minds of each of those countries, the French, the British, the Italians and so on, the thought that if they took Germany into a comparatively integrated Europe, in 10 years' time, Germany would own all of Europe; that is, the German industry, the German organizing ability . . . would completely dominate the economy of Europe, and the rest of them would be more or less economic satellites of Germany within about 10 years' time. . . . Within 10 years, they will have obtained by peace what they could not obtain by two wars . . ." Mr. Draper replied: "There may be something in that. I think you exaggerate it, but it is there." (March 21, 1952.)

This is not a picture of an economy which is desperate or weak. On the contrary, Germany's economic potential is growing in strength and the Allies are providing uninterrupted help on the spurious grounds that Germany's economic strength is the sine qua non for the recovery of Western Europe.

We feel, however, that the support which a "rehabilitated" Western Germany will ultimately render the West is the same kind of support that the noose renders its victim.

OUR NEW ALLY

"How do the people of Britain like their new ally?

"We have taken a step which, unless retraced, must lead to the Federal Republic building up the most powerful land forces in Western Europe.

"The Bonn Government, conscious of its key position in the plans for European rearmament, will have nothing less than full sovereignty. The Wehrmacht and the Luftwaffe will be rebuilt.

"Who are the men leading our new ally? In the main they are the same people who served the Nazi regime.

"A few weeks ago Congressman Arthur Klein gave to the U. S. House of Representatives a long list of former colleagues of Ribbentrop who hold high office in the Foreign Affairs Ministry.

"Ribbentrop was hanged following the Nuremberg trial, but the vile creed which he expounded is by no means dead.

"The German Social Democratic Party is organizing a mass protest against the statement made in the United States by Walter Hallstein, West German Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that the aim of his Government was the 'unity of Europe up to the Urals.' "

The German Deal: Should We Outbid the Russians?

In Washington (on March 25, 1952) Gen. Alfred Gruenther, chief of staff to Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, declared that the Russians are unlikely to strike in Europe now and "never will" if they are convinced of the unity and resolution of the free nations.

This is an important statement.

It also contains, we believe, the key to the international argument over Germany.

For the great and memorable fact inadvertently underlined by Gruenther is that—without any military support from Germany—the United Nations have been able to avert Soviet aggression in Europe.

They have been able to do so by convincing the Russians that any overt military blow, whether aimed at Yugoslavia or any other European nation, would mean World War III.

It seems increasingly clear that the grand design of Soviet policy in Europe is to achieve piecemeal conquests through infiltration, internal upheaval and every other device that can be camouflaged as an action short of war. The Soviet despots know that once the atom bombs start flying nobody can be sure of survival.

All this, we repeat, has been accomplished before the creation of any real German military establishment in the West.

Why, then, is Germany being treated as if it were the indispensable partner in the defense of freedom?

Why have Western statesmen been thrown into panic by Russia's new and flagrant appeal to German nationalism?

Why does our only answer seemingly consist of an effort to outbid the Russians in the quest for Germany's capricious affections?

The truth is that Russia's new move could be seized upon as a great weapon in undermining the Communist drive in Western and Eastern Europe alike. It has already shaken the Communist parties. Its long-range impact can be spectacular if we have the wisdom to grasp the chance.

In a shift of policy as cynical and far-reaching as the Nazi-Soviet pact and the Rapallo agreement of an earlier era, the Russians have officially abandoned their avowed opposition to remilitarization—and renazification—of Germany. The mask is off; the red shirts have embraced the brown.

After a long and frenzied campaign against the allegedly sinister Western program of German rearmament, the Russians have now offered their own deal to the German nationalists. It is the biggest bid so far made in the German auction. It would give a "unified" Germany full right to establish a "defensive" military machine; the word "defensive" is hardly likely to trouble the consciences of the old Wehrmacht warriors. The Russian program would also forgive and forget the crimes of all Nazi generals and politicians except those who are now serving jail sentences.

Thus, less than seven years after the defeat of Nazism, Miss Germany finds herself the most popular girl in town. The Potsdam agreement is dead in both zones: everybody wants to make Germany happy—except millions of human beings throughout the world who dread the spectre of German militarism.

All the West's wooing, all the concessions and all the handshakes have seemingly done little to alter the spirit of modern Germany.

Last October Chancellor Adenauer admitted that 134 members of his Foreign Ministry were former members of the Nazi Party and that 130 of the officials in the ministry had served in it under the Hitler regime.

He lamely explained that it was impossible to create a government ministry without "drawing on the experience" of former Nazis and he offered the solemn assurance that none of those employed could be described as "dangerous."

Now the Bavarian radio has charged that actually 85 per cent of the leading officials in the Foreign Ministry are ex-Nazi—a higher percentage of Nazi affiliation than existed in Von Ribbentrop's Foreign Office under Adolf Hitler.

U. S. High Commissioner McCloy has warned in increasingly doleful terms of the rise of German neo-Nazism. Kurt Schumacher, Germany's Socialist leader, shouts nationalist slogans as stridently as the fanatics of the right. Surveys of German opinion show dismal recurrences of the disease of anti-Semitism and little sense of national guilt over the mass murders staged by Hitler's mob.

And yet the competition for Germany's love continues. In the replies to the Soviet note the West's major concern continues to be the feelings of German nationalists, those sensitive fellows who will not play with East or West unless assured once again that they are the master race. The reply reflects the split personality of the UN on this issue; we reject the notion of German "defensive" forces but we reaffirm our recruiting campaign for German soldiers.

This newspaper does not minimize the Soviet threat to the free world. But the evidence, we repeat, is that the threat in Europe no longer takes the form of sudden blitzkrieg. It is the threat of internal war, backed, sponsored and financed by Moscow, against the free nations —and especially against France and Italy. It is the strategy of division and demoralization. And nothing has divided and demoralized the West—and particularly France—as much as the prospect of a rearmed Germany.

Is there no other answer except to give arms to the Germans now? Must we run the risk that they will ultimately dominate the European army in which we enlist them—or that, alternatively, the arms we place in their hands will one day be used against us in some future German-Russian alliance?

We think there is a better answer.

The alternative, we believe, is to propose a unified, demilitarized and denazified Germany, its leadership chosen in free elections and its survival backed by guarantees against aggression from the East. Germans who care about freedom would recognize these as honorable terms. Such a unified, disarmed Germany could not menace the world; in such a climate it is even conceivable that the roots of democracy might finally be planted in German soil. At the same time we would have made it plain to the Russians that any attempted military coup—whether by external aggression or through an internal putsch such as the one that took place in Czechoslovakia—would be regarded as an act of war.

Such a proposal, we believe, would capture world support. Would it offend the German nationalists? That is a calculated risk we can afford to take. It is only when the world ceases to bow the knee to German nationalism that there is any real hope of a better day for Germany and its neighbors.

It may be said that it is late in the day for a revision in our German policy. But it is never too late to revise a policy that is leading us nowhere.

"BITTER FRUIT"—A COMMENT BY LOW ON THE GERMAN PROBLEM

World copyright by the London Daily Herald and David Low

Again "Operation Swindle"

Supposing someone owed you an amount of money but this person averred in all solemnity that while he was most anxious to repay the debt, he could not do so as long as he was obliged to pay to the United States Government his tax arrears. Nevertheless, in order to preserve your friendship in the hope that you would lend him more money in the future, he suggested that you ask the proper United States authorities to cancel the greater portion of his tax liabilities. Let us assume that the government authorities consented to this proposition.

Perhaps we ought to stop right here for we have the feeling that you regard these suppositions as ludicrous and too fantastic to contemplate. We would agree with you that such a situation is highly unlikely to occur, yet—strange as it may seem—it is happening, but the "fixers" are not United States citizens, but Germans, and the amounts involved are not the costs of mink coats or deep freeze units; they run into billions of dollars.

To understand what is currently taking place in connection with this monumental "fix" against the American taxpayers, it would be helpful to retrace the past activities of the "fixers."

The Treaty of Versailles which finalized the hostilities of World War I, made clear provision for the granting of reparations by Germany to the victims of her aggressions. At the London Conference of May, 1921, Germany's reparations obligations were fixed at 132 billion gold marks or approximately 32 billion dollars. Actually when German reparations were cancelled in the summer of 1932, the total amount she had paid, according to the Reparations Commission, was 6 billion dollars, of which $1,200,000,000 represented cash.

In contrast, the cost of the war to the Allies who were invaded by the Germans—and not the other way—amounted to 117 billion dollars, while inter-Allied debts owed to the United States approximated 12 billion dollars. Insofar as Germany's internal indebtedness was concerned, the inflation engineered by unscrupulous politicians and Ruhr industrialists had practically wiped this debt out, as was admitted by Hjalmar Schacht in his book THE END OF REPARATIONS. German propaganda to the contrary notwithstanding, the resources of the former enemy, and the general economic condition of the country, were not as adversely affected by the war as were the economics of her victors. By 1928, Germany's national income per capita was already greater than that of France. On a per capita basis, the charge for national debts of the major European nations in the West, was as follows: Great Britain, $620; France, $434; Germany, $179 (figures pertaining to the year 1931).

It was the continuously growing strength of the German economy which prompted Mr. S. Parker Gilbert, Agent General of Reparation Payments to report on May 21, 1930, that the Germans had the necessary means to meet not only her internal obligations, but also possessed adequate resources for the discharge of her external obligations, including reparation payments.

On the other hand, German propaganda, right after the cessation of hostilities, began to grind out so-called fact sheets which were intended to prove that the German economy was bankrupt and that the financial situation was beyond control. This propaganda served as the groundwork for Germany's subsequent fight to destroy the reparations agreement. In this connection, Lord D'Abernon, the British ambassador to Berlin, after the war, who was noted for his extreme friendliness toward Germany, admitted in his memoirs that "in the numerous conferences which took place in 1920, 1921, and 1922, the German negotiators did not give the impression of any exaggerated anxiety to put their own finances in order, nor did they appear to make a serious effort to meet the reparation claims of the Allies as established by the Treaty of Versailles. They left on observers the suspicion that no genuine endeavor would be made by Germany to restore stability to the currency or equilibrium to the budget until the final settlement of the reparation problem had been reached on terms satisfactory to the German financiers."

And so it came to pass that the Allies, desperately in need of reparations for rehabilitation purposes, submitted to the initial German demands. Under the Dawes Plan, Germany's reparation obligations were considerably reduced, smaller annual payments were stipulated, and it was further decided to assist the Germans in the payment of these reparations by the granting of a loan of 800 million gold marks. This loan was handled by private Allied banks in Europe and in the United States. It should be pointed out that even before the Dawes Plan came into being, the Germans had already succeeded in sabotaging the delivery of Ruhr coal as reparations to her Western neighbors. Moreover, German heavy industry, thanks to the solicitous policies of the Reich Government and the timidity of the Allies, was re-organizing, modernizing and strengthening its grip on the German economy and by the same token, hampering the rehabilitation of the nations she had occupied.

The Dawes Plan had another important implication for it "re-established the confidence of American and British payments in the economic future of Germany and opened the way for the flotation of foreign loans on an extensive scale." (AMERICAN LOANS TO GERMANY. by Robert Kuczynski.)

The manipulators of the German economy during the 1920's, whether it be Hilferding, the Social Democrat, Helfferich, the German Nationalist, Luther, of the German Peoples Party, or Schacht, the so-called Democrat, regarded the Dawes Plan as the opening wedge through which the Germans could turn military defeat into a tremendous victory.

The initial policy of watering down and sabotaging reparations payments. succeeded in creating moods of frustration among the Allies. Because of the urgency of these reparations in terms of rehabilitation, the Western Allies agreed to the Dawes Plan. The loan mentioned above, 50% of which was floated in the United States by American bankers, assumed a special status in relation to reparations. Mr. Parker, the Agent General, stated that the Reparations Commission "created a priority for repayment on this loan over the payments of reparations." He mentioned, however, that this was an exception and "in a class by itself;" that no other loans to Germany would receive this special consideration unless specifically indicated by the Reparations Commission.

The Germans saw in this exception the opportunity to create a clash of interests between the Allied governments and the private commercial investors. They proceeded to advertise for more loans, but in such a way as to deliberately mislead prospective investors to believe that if they too loaned money to the Germans, these loans would also take priority over reparations payments. It appears that the American bankers associated with these subsequent loans did not fuss about the way the Germans advertised them to the public. This prompted Mr. Parker on November 3, 1926, to write to an American bank: "I am constantly amazed at the recklessness of American bankers in offering to the public the securities of German states on the basis of the purely German view of Article 248 of the Treaty of Versailles."

The Germans, Mr. Parker wrote, were unilaterally interpreting the reparations agreement by attempting to put across the idea that reparations would be subordinate to German payments on private loans. "It does seem to me difficult," Mr. Parker observed, "to justify the action of the American bankers in offering the securities to the public . . . without giving the slightest hint that the German point of view is not accepted by the Allied governments and that, in fact, the Allied point of view is diametrically opposed."

Nevertheless, private loans to Germany continued at a tremendous rate, running into billions of dollars. A good portion of these loans helped to build up Germany's war potential. In his latest book book, SEVEN DECISIONS THAT SHAPED HISTORY, Mr. Sumner Welles the American statesman and diplomat, said: "Over the same French opposition that we see today, Great Britain then not only permitted, but actually connived at German rearmament. We Americans poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Germany in the form of loans. It was these policies which were directly responsible for the Second World War."

The United States Foreign Economic Administration, in its definitive study of the German economy, after mentioning the fact that in 1926 the Vereinigte Stahlwerke (the German steel trust) received a loan of more than 100 million dollars from American investors, states: "It is doubtful that the trust could have carried out its program of expansion and modernization without the support of the American investors."

The Germans accepted these loans for obvious reasons and because they, in the words of the German Chancellor Herr Stresemann, "would give us an army of 300,000 people in America who would make propaganda for Germany because they would be interested in her welfare."

Everything worked out according to plan, for as these loans snowballed, additional pressures were placed on the United States Government to water down still further the reparations payments on the grounds that the Germans did not have enough to pay for reparations and, at the same time, meet the obligations of the newly acquired private loans.

Meanwhile, German heavy industry was growing by leaps and bounds, German trade soared, while at the same time the economies of Germany's Western neighbors faltered. Before long the reparations agreement was derisively termed by the Germans a "political weapon," hampering normal commercial relations between Germany and the outside world. Naturally, these so-called normal commercial relations were to be enhanced by the loans of private foreign investors.

In 1932, reparations were cancelled, but the inter-Allied debt, that is, the debts of our Allies to the United States, were not cancelled. When some of our Allies notified our government that they were not in a position to resume payments (having depended upon German reparations to some extent for such payments), the United States Congress passed the Johnson Act which forbade all future credits to the Allies if war debts had not in the meantime been paid. This was a notable political victory for the Germans because it created bad feelings between the United States and her most reliable friends in Western Europe.

In a report published by the Royal Institute of International Affairs, C. R. S. Harris sums up Germany's achievements during this period by disclosing the fact that she had borrowed from abroad three times as much as she paid in reparations. Fifty percent of the private loans and credits came from the United States. The major beneficiaries were the great armament works which provided the sinews of German's great war making power during World War II.

With the advent of Hitler, these private debts were further scaled down by the manipulation of Herr Schacht, and when World War II broke out, interest payment ceased. Thus, Germany evaded her reparations obligations with the help of private investors who believed that their cooperation with Germany would induce her to repay her private debts. But they too were left holding the bag, so to speak.

After World War II, the Allies set up a new program for German reparations. The need for these reparations was great, as Western Europe was in the throes of starvation and economic collapse. France, for example, had suffered greatly under the occupation. According to Foreign Minister Schuman, Germany extracted from France alone during the four years of occupation, a total of 6 billion dollars (U. S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT, September 28, 1951). Nevertheless, the total reparations paid by Germany to date amounts to a pittance. Unquestionably, pressure of special interests who believe that the "sun rises and sets" with the German economy, had much to do with the collapse of reparations. They circulated the old chestnut that Germany was flat on her back and that she could not pay reparations. But none of these propagandists ever mentioned the need to cancel Germany's private debts!

More recently, when talks began with regard to the so-called contractual obligations of Germany, the question of her debts arose. The Germans owed the Allied governments approximately $3,200,000,000 for post-war help. (This is a small sum for Germany to repay inasmuch as the United States alone has poured into Germany, according to the U. S. NEWS AND WORLD REPORT, 9 billion dollars since V-E Day.) The Germans suggested that they would be willing to meet their pre-war obligations to private investors if the governments of these investors would be obliging enough to scale down the post-war debts which the Germans owed to the people of the United States, Britain and France.

The leader of the German delegation in these negotiations is Mr. Herman Abs. Mr. Abs is a well-known figure in German finance and can be depended upon to uphold German interests come what may. His notoriety as a Hitler supporter and one who participated in the looting of German-occupied Europe, prompted Senator Gillette to write a letter to the State Department last year questioning the reasons for Abs' presence in the United States. Herr Abs played an important role in Germany's conference on the Standstill Agreement concerning the debts which Germany owed after World War I. According to U. S. Government investigators, Abs was sent to London to negotiate with foreign creditors in 1937 and in 1938. Abs argued that the Germans held only 77 million Reich Marks in gold and therefore could not meet the obligations assumed. He admitted to the U. S. investigators that even at that time he doubted the veracity of this figure. And he was right, because it is now known that Germany's actual gold holdings amounted to 500 million Reich Marks in 1937. Abs had done his duty. He had lied on behalf of the Fatherland and the gold which he did not mention was used to prime up the German war machine. The creditors accepted Mr. Abs' word, went back to their respective countries, and shortly thereafter the Germans launched their attack.

It is Mr. Abs who again pleads poverty for the Germans, and like his predecessors, has managed to pit private interests against the national interests of the Allies. He was not unsuccessful for as the NEW YORK TIMES recently noted, the Allies have agreed "to write off two-thirds of the post-war debt in the hope that this will enable the Bonn Government to pay the even larger debt it inherited from the Reich for pre-war debts." The TIMES did not go into detail about this pre-war item which was strictly a private affair based on the risks that investors are expected to take. These investments had nothing to do with the general welfare of the people except that millions of dollars of these loans were turned into weapons of war. Consequently, one would expect that these private investors would work out their problems with the German authorities and not at the expense of the National Interest. But as matters stand, we have the incredible spectacle of American negotiators applying the seal of consent of the United States Government to preserve the equity of a private deal consummated between private parties to the detriment of the American people. What this means is that the American taxpayers and Allied taxpayers will not only lose billions that they have lent to the former enemy after World War II, but will also be obliged, in effect, to underwrite the repayment of German loans to private investors.

It may be said that the German economy at present is unable to pay all of its debts, pre-war and post-war. On the basis of our own studies, we are inclined to believe that she can. But even if she is not able to carry out the whole obligation, by what legal or moral right have Allied negotiators consented to scale down the debts owed to the Allied governments, and by that same token, have given advantage and priority to Germany's pre-war debts owed to private persons and institutions? We do not pretend to be legal experts or moralists, but like most Americans, we share the belief that our dealings with Germany should be based on justice and morality and always, in the first place, on behalf of the national interests, which means John Q. Public.

"German political demands have raised more difficulties for the western European defense plans . . .

"These demands should not be a surprise. The United States has been saying that an armed Western Germany is an indispensable ingredient to western Europe's defense. Dr. Adenauer would be a poor guardian of his nation's interests if he did not fully exploit his position, and do it before delivering a German defense contribution rather than afterward when his bargaining power would be diminished.

"Whatever Americans and others may think, the only German criticism of Dr. Adenauer is that his demands are not stiff enough.". . .

(From an editorial in the Wall Street Journal)

. . ."The new Russian line has obviously embarrassed Dr. Adenauer, who was forced to describe it as a 'promising offer.' But the embarrassment of the Communist Party—particularly in France—is no less obvious; overnight they have been forced to give up the root and branch resistance to any form of German army, which was their most popular progaganda line. It must also have come as a grave shock to every Slav Government in Eastern Europe. The Poles, for instance, though they may get a little satisfaction from Stalin's insistence that the Oder-Neisse line shall be the frontier of the new State, will hardly be able to suppress the fear that once again the Russians are contemplating a deal with Germany at their expense."

(The New Statesman and Nation)

"Thomas Dehler, West German Justice Minister, said . . . that it was a 'historic lie' that German industrialists were responsible for World War II. He told a meeting of his right-wing Free Democratic Party that 'Hitler alone' was to blame."

(From an Associated Press dispatch)

"If there is no will to defend freedom in Germany, no body of German troops will constitute trustworthy support in time of crisis. We are trying to buy German cooperation at a steadily rising price. Will they stay bought on any terms?"

Germany and European Integration

by
ISIDORE LIPSCHUTZ

As we see it, U. S. policy in Europe is to prevent that continent from being conquered or dominated by any single power or combination of powers. It is a policy which is the inevitable outgrowth of the bitter experiences of our involvement in two world wars. Yet there is a positive side to this policy which is of equal importance. It is to help establish an economic, political and moral climate in Europe that will foster firm friendships between the U. S. and the European countries in all fields of endeavor. In this way we hope to prevent a new outbreak of war in Europe which would involve the U. S. and spread to all corners of the world.

Bearing this in mind, how does Germany fit into this overall concept? We are not speaking of a hypothetical Germany—the kind of Germany many dream of. Rather we are concerned with the real Germany, its past, present and future.

History Is Our Witness

The real Germany of the past had a notorious warlike record. Every major war since 1870 has revolved more or less around the predatory policies pursued by that country. Its militarism, racism and grasping for power and world domination have saturated the pages of history with the blood of millions. This is not to say that there have not been important groups among the German people who have valiantly struggled against these evil forces. Yet history tells us that when these groups had to meet the test of the militarists and imperialists, they collapsed and disintegrated. Indeed, many of them took the line of least resistance by joining the pack of demogogues thirsting for power at the expense of others. Ideological lines were crossed and criss-crossed and finally obliterated. The Right joined the Left and the Left merged with the Right. Promises and treaties were made only to cover up the diabolical schemes for aggression based on the Bismarckian idea that might is right. What we call the double-cross became standing operating procedure in the lexicon of German diplomacy.

The military might of Germany was buttressed by a powerful economic war potential and by the fact that Germany held a unique geographical position in the heart of Europe. These factors were manipulated by German politicians, generals, industrialists and diplomats to further the interests of the Reich. It follows from this that Germany's external relations were not based on any special love for the western way of life as opposed to the despotisms of the east. The guiding star of Germany's foreign relations was the subjugation of her neighbors and eventually the world. This was the real Germany of the past and in that context Nazism was not an aberration but the most modern and logical expression of the German world outlook expressed very neatly by Kaiser Wilhelm II in 1905: "We are the salt of the earth. . . . God has created us so that we should civilize the world."

The real Germany of today has its roots in that past, though it appears to us in a new form and under new conditions. Present-day Germany is split down the middle not only geographically but politically and ideologically. Part of it is under the heavy grip of the Soviets, the other part occupied by the Western Allies. On Germany's eastern borders there has arisen the communist colossus of Soviet Russia whose strength and power rises as a dark cloud over all of Europe. On her Western borders Germany is faced by a group of nations impoverished, ruined and on the brink of bankruptcy, primarily due to German invasions and ruthless occupation.

The western part of Germany has made enormous economic progress over the past few years, though she was allegedly on her back in 1945. Indeed, this progress surpasses the economic development of our chief allies in western Europe: France and Great Britain. The Associated Press, reporting from Bonn on January 7, disclosed that Germany would be able to "jump steel production by 30% to 19 or 20 million tons twelve months after the Schuman plan starts. . . ." This enormous steel capacity has enabled Germany to rise to heights surpassing her western neighbors in the production of machine tools and other vital industrial products. Indeed, Germany's industrial production is far outstripping the level of 1936 when the war economy was in full motion.

The eastern part of Germany is also growing in strength industrially and economically. It is in the process of being turned into a new redoubt for communism. While western Germany is still enthralled by the ideas of Haushofer and Hitler, eastern Germany looks to Lenin and Stalin. Yet in both zones the aspirations of the past are the single and most powerful bond of unity, notwithstanding all of the plans of the victors. This is the real Germany of today.

The Paramount Question

Do the interests of the real Germany coincide with our over-all objectives in Europe? It is one of the great tragedies of the present-day that Western statesmen have either ignored this paramount question or have come up with superficial and short-sighted answers. Indeed, one cannot help but feel that some of these policy-makers have deliberately brushed aside this question because they fear to face the facts.

The key to the interests of the real Germany lies in her determination to regain her former glories as an overpowering sovereign and united state. In geographical terms the real Germany aims to recapture the territories east of the Oder-Neisse and the Saar. This is the minimum objective.

In this connection it would be unwise to ignore Germany's wider ambitions. In the past, for example, the Germans have sought to seize Alsace-Lorraine, Austria, parts of Holland and Denmark and regions in Eastern Europe including the Ukraine. Have they now renounced these goals?

In the economic sphere the real Germany aspires to economic hegemony over Western Europe and to become the decisive economic factor in the vast markets of the East, including communist China.

In her external political relations, the real Germany aims to treat all powers alike, east or west, that is by subordinating all such relationships to the supreme interests of Germany everywhere. The realization of this program makes it imperative that the real Germany possesses a first-class military establishment and prepared to strike wherever the situation calls for such action. This program must be woven into the very fabric of German life by the careful inculcation of a world outlook which essentially derives from the militaristic and chauvinistic traditions that made Germany the terror of Europe and the world for over half a century.

Dangerous Illusions

It is believed by some self-styled experts that by the simple method of incorporating part of the real Germany into a wider community of interests, these dangerous aspirations will wither on the vine and that such a community of interests will direct Germany's energies toward peaceful goals. Essentially this is the meaning of integration which is now espoused by leading western statesmen. By integration they hope to join part of the real Germany economically, politically and militarily with the West. This assumes, of course, that while part of the real Germany is enthralled by the Soviets the other part of the real Germany would be content to work as an equal partner with her former western enemies in a constructive role for Europe as a whole. It further assumes that the western part of the real Germany would be wholeheartedly content to follow a common strategy in the military and political spheres and that she would agree to pursue an economic course that would be held accountable at all times and approved of by her western neighbors.

Facts to Consider

In recent times we have read statements by some of our policy makers which amount to nothing less than a plea to the real Germany of the west to accept integration. It may be properly asked why such pleas are necessary if the assumption is that this part of Germany does see eye to eye with the west. We cannot help but conclude that beneath all of the optimism on the efficacy of integrating the real Germany of the West there is uneasiness and a vague feeling that we are playing with fire.

Mr. Benjamin Buttenwieser, who was the former Assistant U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, has very adequately expressed these alternate moods of uneasiness and optimism. In an address before the Chamber of Commerce of New York, Mr. Buttenwieser expressed satisfaction with the general progress made in Germany. "The Germany of today," he said, "which I fervently hope and believe is well on her way to becoming a reformed Germany, is opting to cast her lot with her former enemies, in this new spirit of trying, on the one hand, to expiate and, on the other, to overcome the past and look to the future." But in the same talk Mr. Buttenwieser warned the West Germans that they must resist the "blandishments from the East which seek to lead the Federal Republic away from integration with the West. . . ." We have no way of telling whether Mr. Buttenwieser believes that this attraction can be simply summed up in the word "blandishments." History tells us that it is more than blandishments that must necessarily attract the real Germany of the West to the East. This attraction is based on powerful forces which have determined the course of German history for decades. Present conditions, including the domination of the eastern part of the real Germany by Russia and the enormous strides in Germany's economic power which finds limited markets in the West, are powerful forces which all Germans cannot help but take into account in dealings with their neighbors.

There is a long and intimate history of pro-Soviet relations which either Mr. Buttenwieser ignores or is unaware of. It has been brilliantly revealed by Professor Edward Hallett Carr in his book on German-Soviet relations 1919-1939 (please see extended review of this book on page 35). The "blandishments" to which Mr. Buttenwieser refers are in reality the very factors governing Germany's long-standing relations with the East which during the 1920's created a powerful bond of friendship between Soviet Russia and the German state. This bond of friendship helped to rebuild Germany's power and eventually to challenge the democracies of the West.

Mr. Buttenwieser's trepidations, however, are not only confined to German-Soviet relations. He admits that, while there have been great economic strides in western Germany, many things remained to be done. The tax system is out of date and favors the few. The Civil Service system which survived the Weimar Republic and the Hitler régime is basically intact with all its undemocratic and reactionary features. The educational system is still grounded on archaic principles and does not provide equal opportunity for all German youth. Finally Mr. Buttenwieser notes that the Germans are playing "hard to get" and that the spirit of Hitlerism and racism is rearing its head again and indeed has strong voices within the very cabinet over which Chancellor Adenauer, the "good democrat" presides. In other words, by Mr. Buttenwieser's own admissions, the real Germany of the West has yet to prove its devotion to democracy. Nazism has not died in Western Germany, nor has the predatory power of the Ruhr industrialists. Militarism has reappeared and a plethora of so-called German veteran organizations are raising the black banners of "Deutschland Ueber Alles" again. It is this part of the real Germany which western statesmen hope will cooperate in an integration program with the West.

Yet this policy persists. Those who tried to develop it still further believe that in the long run it would control Germany's dangerous predilections and utilize her potential on behalf of the Western Allies. They say that once this part of the real Germany is integrated with the West, the total power created would serve as an overpowering magnet that would attract the eastern part of Germany. The so-called vacuum in Central Europe would then disappear and Germany working within the western community, would become the great bulwark of freedom.

The Two Germanys

Let us examine for a moment this notion. It wrongly assumes that present relations between East and West Germany are essentially those of separate states, separate cultures, separate and opposing economic interests and a separate historical background. But this is a childish view as any German will admit in private. Essentially the organic unity of the real Germany has never been destroyed. It is functioning in a new form for the moment and under different conditions, but nonetheless functioning—one part facing the East, the other part facing the West and all for the greater glory of the Fourth Reich.

This is what Chancellor Adenauer meant when he said that a united Germany would have to reconsider whatever formal ties were established between Western Germany and Western Europe. The New York Times, on May 14, 1952, reported that this view was reaffirmed by the Germans, who, according to the Times, insisted that "the freedom of a future Government of a united Germany to negotiate must not be too closely restricted by linking such a Government with the present Treaty System integrating Western Germany in West Europe, as the allies wish to do." Therefore the scheme of integration would not ipso facto bring in to the western camp the eastern part of Germany. More likely to be expected is that the other states of the western community would become satellites of a reunited Germany. Thus, it is inconceivable that Western Germany would accept the scheme of integration unless it provided the opportunity for the total real Germany to emerge as the dominant power on the continent. Moreover, and this is the central point, the real Germany, if it is to emerge, must continue to cultivate both sides and this operates through a split among the victorious allied powers. To be sure, the real Germany in the West will grab all it can while it gives lip service to integration and promises to forego the age-old dreams of power. Consequently it is not surprising that there are politicians in Western Germany who toy with the idea of integration. But how can they justify such integration in the face of the basic aspirations of all Germans? They can only justify their present diplomacy in the West by convincing all Germans that in the long run integration with the West would realize these very aspirations.

What of the Future?

As mentioned above, these aspirations include the return of Germany's Eastern territories and her resurgence as the economic master of Western Europe. It would necessarily include a powerful military force operating on an independent policy toward all nations.

As Mr. James P. Warburg, the noted writer on world affairs, has pointed out: "The conditions on which Western Germany would be willing to rearm and, if necessary, fight were precisely those conditions which would destroy French, Dutch and Belgian morale." Applying Mr. Warburg's thesis to integration, we would say the conditions which Western Germany would insist upon as the price for "cooperation" are the very conditions which would destroy the effectiveness of a western community of nations.

There is no doubt that this view is held by many of the leading statesmen of Western Europe and shared by the common people. It is for this reason that the United States has found it so difficult to convince our Western Allies of the correctness of the integration policy, and it goes without saying that we have found it difficult to convince West German politicians who want to make doubly sure that sufficient ground will be left open for maneuvering between the colossus of the East and the Western democracies. Integration as it applies to our Western Allies is feasible, necessary and constructive. It helps to further our overruling objectives in Europe and the reason for this is simply that their interests and the conditions which give rise to these interests coincide with those of the United States.

On the other hand, the interests of the real Germany and the conditions which give rise to them are diametrically opposed to our overall objective in Europe. Therefore, to bind part of the real Germany in a plan of Western European integration would mean that that very concept of European unity would collapse and in its wake would arise a Germany uncontrolled and unpredictable.

In the end the United States would be confronted with the very situation it hopes to avert, namely, a Europe dominated by Germany or subjugated by the combined forces of that country and Russia.

Militarism At Work

by

ERNEST LEISER

Western Allied authorities in Germany are both dismayed and embarrassed at the failure thus far to turn up "good" generals to command the proposed German contingents in Western Europe's defense forces.

Not long ago a senior United States official noted that there were some 3,000 German generals who had been "at liberty" since the Nazi capitulation in 1945, and who were extremely interested in working at their trade once more. "Of course," he noted, "we can certainly find 30 or 40 who are all right politically and who aren't Prussian-type militarists." Today that same official is no longer by any means sure he was right.

The emergence of former professional soldiers on or at the edges of the political scene has been the most spectacular development in German politics during the past two months. Generals and colonels who, during the period when the Allies were "demilitarizing" Germany, remained discreetly in the background are now speaking their pieces again—loudly and in the familiar voices of command.

And what almost all of them have been saying has caused great disquiet even to those American officials who are convinced West Germany must be armed to make viable the common defense of the Western world.

Until recently, for example, Hans Friessner, a former colonel-general who served the Nazi Wehrmacht on the eastern front, was regarded as one of the "good" generals. However, that illusion was rudely shattered when, before a meeting of foreign correspondents in Bonn, Friessner offered the following explanation of Hitler's invasion of Poland in 1939:

"The red flood had to be stopped and the German border population protected from the squabbling and the chicanery of the Poles."

To those who remembered that the "red flood" had been "stopped" by a cynical agreement which permitted both the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany to engulf Poland, this twisted justification would alone be enough to sour Western public opinion on Friessner. Yet the former colonel-general (described in a leading West German newspaper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung as a "man of the highest character") went even further. In no uncertain terms, he denounced Allies' "vile" treatment of the German soldiers and demanded flatly that all war criminals be immediately released.

Allied officials, shocked by this blatant show of unrepentant militarism from one of the most important former German officers—Herr Friessner now heads the League of German Soldiers, a veterans' federation presently shooting for an enrollment of 4,000,000 members—have been taking a closer look at the pronouncements of other leading German professional soldiers. And they haven't liked what they have seen.

A whole battalion of colonels and generals—Bernard Ramcke, Hasso von Manteuffel, the well-known Heinz Guderian, as well as former Admiral Gottfried Hansen, just to name a few of the most prominent—have joined in stating the "conditions" for German rearmament in a way which makes clear the only thing they regret about the Nazi past is that they lost. All have whitewashed war criminals, denounced the "inhuman" treatment of Germany by the Allies and done everything but ask the Allies to apologize for fighting Hitler.

Even an officer to whom the Allies had pointed as a shining example of "democratically minded" former generals—Ludwig Cruewell, next to Rommel the best-known of the German armored force commanders—in speaking to an Afrika Korps rally recently joined in the cry for the liberation of war criminals.

To date there have not been more than a handful of prominent generals who have indicated a spirit of atonement for Germany's military past and a real desire to cooperate in a Western European "defense of equals" in the future. Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's military adviser, former General Hans Speidel, is generally considered one of these and "acceptable" to the West. Speidel has, in fact, been representing Germany at the current discussions in Paris on a European Army.

However, some U. S. officials (and a good many French and British) even take a dim view of Speidel. He has kept a circumspect and admirable silence recently, they concede, not joining the general hue and cry of his brother officers. But they recall that before his appointment he wrote, for publication in a leading German magazine, an article describing his contacts with Hitler, portraying the Nazi dictator in a sympathetic light. They recall, too, that his own brother was one of those imprisoned as a war criminal in Landsberg (released this spring, incidentally) and that it is not too difficult therefore to guess his own attitude on war crimes.

All in all, Western political authorities (as distinguished from the military) are anything but happy at the choice of future German commanders they face. They are now not speaking in terms of "good" generals so much as of "less bad" ones.

Among the 150 former officers of Hitler's Wehrmacht now serving in the Egyptian Army as key advisers are two of the most notorious mass murderers in the Nazi SS.

This information was painstakingly collected from archives in Nuremberg, site of the war crimes trials against top Nazis, by a courageous young German reporter, Michael Mansfeld. His findings have just been published by his newspaper, the Frankfurter Rundschau," one of the biggest in Western Germany.

This is Mansfeld's second similar "scoop." A searching series of articles he wrote earlier on the infiltration of former Nazis back into leading positions in the West German Foreign Office caused sufficient stir to launch a Parliamentary investigation of the ministry's personnel policies. That investigation is still underway.

(Mansfeld's charge, recently renewed by the Bavarian Radio, was that 85 per cent of the staff of the Foreign Office are former Nazis. This is a higher proportion than ever staffed the Wilhelmstrasse under Hitler's Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop.)

The two SS. men whose posts in the Egyptian forces were revealed by Mansfeld are Adolf Eichmann and Oskar Dirlewanger. Eichmann was an SS. Obergruppenfuehrer, a rank approximating major general, and Dirlewanger was an Obersturmbannfuehrer, or captain.

Mansfeld reports that Eichmann was the commander of the Nazi "extermination squads" and also of Auschwitz, the worst of the concentration camps. The "technical appliances" for execution at that camp had been approved by him, and he "introduced" mobile gas chambers. Early in 1945, Mansfeld writes, Eichmann was heard to say, "If the war is lost, I shall commit suicide—but I'll die laughing, because I have put to death 5,000,000 Jews." Documentary evidence at Nuremberg shows Eichmann deposited the gold from his victims' teeth at the Reichsbank, Mansfeld reports.

Dirlewanger, from Mansfeld's investigation, turns out to be an even more unsavory character—difficult as that may seem. Convicted of molesting minors in the 1930s, he was released from jail in order to be sent to serve with the Nazi Condor Legion in Spain. Thus "rehabilitated," he was placed in charge of a special Wehrmacht unit composed of similarly released convicts during the war. His reputation as a terrorist was so bad that even one of his SS. commanders telephoned Berlin from Poland and demanded Dirlewanger be recalled. According to the report of Konrad Morgen, himself an SS. judge:

"Dirlewanger was a nuisance and a terror to the entire population. He repeatedly pillaged the ghetto in Lublin, extorting ransoms. . . . He had young Jewesses arrested, invited his friends to watch and had the women undressed and whipped. Finally, they received an injection of strychnine and their death struggle was watched."

In 1943, Mansfeld reports, Dirlewanger received the Golden German Cross for "courage and excellent troop leadership."

In concluding his report, Mansfeld editorializes, "Before the Bundestag (the chief house of the West German Parliament) deals with a general amnesty of war criminals, they should seek the extradition of Eichmann and Dirlewanger so that they may face trial by a German court." Such an effort should be made before West Germany names its diplomatic representative to Egypt, too, he adds. This demand is echoed by the editors of the Frankfurter Rundschau in a preface to Mansfeld's dispatch.

United States officials, whose task it is to survey the West German press, commented to the writer that, except for the Frankfurter Rundschau, the newspapers have paid relatively little attention to the disclosure that some 150 former Wehrmacht officers, many of them of high rank, were serving the Egyptian Army as advisers. However, noted these officials, the press has consistently inveighed against France for its recruitment of German officers and soldiers for service in the French Foreign Legion.

Michael Mansfeld is regarded by United States press analysts of the High Commission as a phenomenon as encouraging as the scandals he turns up are discouraging. Only 28, he was himself an officer in the Wehrmacht and is the holder of a number of decorations for outstanding bravery. These Americans note that it takes an even greater bravery to dig up and report revelations of the kind Mansfeld has done. He is perhaps the most unpopular German newspaperman as far as the Bonn Government is concerned, embarrassed as Chancellor Konrad Adenauer has been by his charges of Nazis in the Foreign Office. He has received a number of threats, some from official sources and some anonymous, since that Foreign Office story broke.

. . ."The United States faces large new defense costs—probably several billion dollars—to create German divisions to serve under Gen. Eisenhower.

"Official estimates of the cost of mobilizing, training and equipping 12 German divisions runs as high as $14 billion for the first year. This is the force counted on from West Germany under the European army plan . . .

"Many officials say bluntly that if the United States wants a new German army it must expect to pay most of what it will cost.

"Otherwise, they say, Gen. Eisenhower will have to get along without German soldiers."

(From an Associated Press dispatch)

Eyebrow-Lifting Department

THE PEACE MASK IS OFF

From Russell Hill to the New York Herald Tribune:

"The Soviet Union warned through the mouths of East German Communist leaders that its reply to West German rearmament will be the creation of an East German army.

"Wilhelm Pieck, East German President, said in a speech as he reviewed a May Day parade in Marx-Engels Square in the Soviet sector of Berlin: 'The situation created by the general war agreement (the Communist name for the peace contract under negotiation between West Germany and the Western Allies) and by the imperialist warmongering categorically requires us to organize preparedness and ability to fight for defense of our homeland.'"

WOULD GOEBBELS TALK DIFFERENTLY?

From Larry Rue in the Chicago Daily Tribune:

"The attitude that only the Germans are guilty and the western nations are innocent, which from the beginning has characterized all negotiations between their governments, is among the reasons for German distrust of the West's intentions toward West Germany. However, it is obvious that the occupation nations themselves are guilty of war crimes...

"In Germany today there are hundreds of thousands of young men who still remember when they were sold, or rather lend-leased, into slavery by the American government. This was at a time when General Eisenhower still was supreme commander of the forces in Europe...

"The Nuernberg and other war crimes trials still strike a sour note with Germans."

WE MUST . . . WE WANT . . . .

Colonel-General Hans Friessner, president of the Soldatenbund, speaking at a Press Conference:

"I still believe that the campaign against Poland was necessary because we had to protect German minorities, and there was no peaceful way to do it.

"We must now, once again, awaken the military spirit among former German soldiers...

"We want a German state, including the German territories now separated from the Federal Republic.

"The world has treated the German veterans like dogs. All of those still in prison must be released.

"The men of the Waffen SS proved their worth at the front. They carried out their tasks with idealism, in a spirit of total abnegation; they conducted themselves worthily, and have the right to be honorable members of our association.

"The war criminals were treated unjustly. The Nuremburg Court acted under the influence of hatred..."

OUR NEW ALLIES

From the Washington Post:

"United States High Commissioner John J. McCloy said that Germans can insure their liberty, security and prosperity only by lining up with the West against the threat of Communist aggression.

"McCloy's warning came on the heels of a report that 1000 German war veterans, meeting in a Munich beer cellar, had applauded the statement that Germans consider the Russians 'higher in fighting spirit and courage' than the United States, Britain or France."

HOW THE GERMANS REPORT HISTORY

From the Chicago Daily Tribune:

"Dr. Robert La Follette, senior American cultural affairs official in Germany, said German books tend to give the United States the 'silent treatment' on culture.

"Quoting as examples of 'distortion and misrepresentation,' he said he had read in one German textbook that President Roosevelt launched the second front in Europe because he feared Stalin otherwise would unite with Germany.

"Another distortion in German textbooks, he said, was the suggestion that the United States was the only nation to profit from World War II.

"La Follette said German historians complained American books often failed to recognize that some Germans opposed Hitler...

"Some German historians said they rarely found American books fair and objective in dealings with World War II, tending to put the blame on Germany."

WHO WON THE WAR?

From Dr. Frank Kingdon in the New York Post:

"Seven years after the close of the war Germany and Japan are riding high industrially and invading the markets of the world with cheap goods. Stocks of German companies have jumped in price as much as ten times in the past twelve months.

"England is in the process of adopting a budget which will further cut its standard of living. France is in such bad shape that the franc has sunk in the last few weeks from 350 to the dollar to 480. Italy is struggling with an increasingly insoluble piling up of economic troubles. The U. S. is talking about bolstering Europe's shaky foundations with an appropriation of $7,900,000,000. What our current budget means in terms of our individual lives we all know unmistakably from our income tax payments and the prices we are paying in the grocery stores.

"The winners struggle. The losers go ahead. What is behind it?"

BANKING IN A BIG WAY

From the New York Times:

"A proposal for creation of an Egyptian-German bank has been forwarded to Dr. Albert Buehler, director the Bank Deutscher Laender.

"Dr. Buehler arrived in Cairo in January to study the possibility of developing greater trade and financial relations between Egypt and Germany . . .

"The spokesman said 'the urgent necessity for creation of an Egyptian-German bank has never been felt so much as at this time, when trade between the two countries has developed and promises to develop further . . .

"The current armament programs in America and Western Europe, he added, have made supplies from those countries difficult to obtain.

"However, Egypt 'has found in Germany a source from which equipment and material for Egypt's industrial development can be purchased under favorable conditions regarding price, quality and period of delivery,' he went on."

SCHACHT'S "POINT FOUR"

From Joseph P. Lash in the New York Post:

"A three-month survey of Indonesia's economy by former Nazi finance minister Dr. Hjalmar Schacht is so full of Nazi over-tones that Indonesian officials are shunning it like a cobra.

"Hired to make technical recommendations on ways to rehabilitate the new republic's economy, Schacht added some comments 'as a German.' . . .

"In his recommendations to the Indonesian government Schacht proposed Nazi labor laws as a model for Indonesian labor legislation.

" 'In order to ensure labor productivity,' he wrote, 'the labor bureaus will have to stress two things: Discipline and authority. Fathers, teachers and priests who do not instill discipline and zeal for work in their children, wards and congregations are worthless.' . . .

" 'You cannot always do that through friendly words,' the former Nazi official observed. 'Punishment is also necessary.'

" 'I urgently recommend,' he concluded, 'the study of the German labor laws of the mid-30s which worked very well in pacification of the class struggle and which stressed the moral value of disciplined work.' . . .

"Another Schacht recommendation borrowed from his experience as a Nazi minister was the forced transfer of populations."

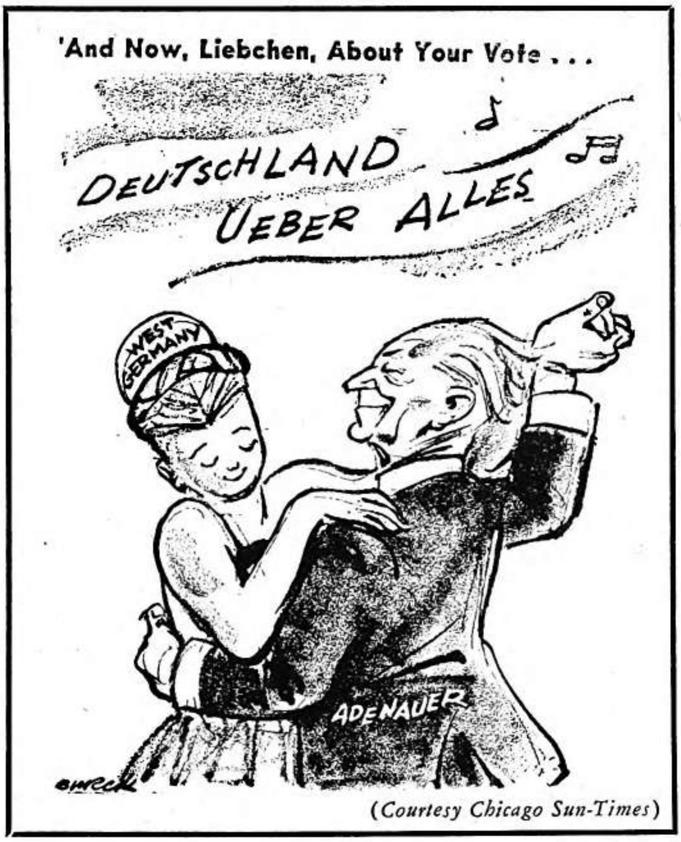
GERMAN-ARAB TIES

From a report by Wilton Wynn in the ONA:

"The quiet resurgence of German influence in the Arab world is providing a new headache for the British in this region . . .

"German military influence ultimately may reach significant proportions. Although Germany is not yet selling munitions to Arab states in big quantities, German military experts are rapidly replacing the British and French in Arab armies . . .

'And Now, Liebchen, About Your Vote . . .



(Courtesy Chicago Sun-Times)

"As antagonism between Arabs and the Anglo-American-French bloc has grown, these countries have welcomed German help in training their armies. An indication of this is seen in Egypt, where more than 400 German military advisers are serving with the Egyptian army. The number of German advisers in Syria's army is growing, and recently jumped from 50 to more than 70 . . .

"Arab states have been clearing the decks for increased trade with the Germans. Lebanon's parliament recently ratified a new trade agreement with the Bonn Government. A German-Egyptian trade agreement came into force last June . . .

"A group of German firms is planning a permanent exhibition of German products in Cairo.

"German technical advice also is being sought after by Arab states. Lebanon has a German firm exploring for oil in the southern Bekaa valley. Several Arab states are bidding for the services of such men as Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, the old Nazi financial wizard who recently completed an economic mission to Indonesia . . .

"Germany offers an excellent compromise. Traditionally hostile to Britain, France, and the United States but sporting no dangerous ideology, Western Germany has the resources and technical know-how to become the friend of the Arab's need. And there are enough disinherited militarists and economists in Germany to seize the chance for a new Arab-German rapprochement."

A GENERAL SPEAKS

From the New York Times:

"One-time Brig. Gen. Bernhard Ramcke, Adolf Hitler's best-known paratroop leader, demanded here that the Western Allies make a 'clean sweep' of the past by freeing German war criminals under a general amnesty before there is 'any talk' of a West German contribution.

"West Germans should demand full amnesty for war criminals, including Rudolf Hess, Walther Funk, Albert Speer and other top Nazi officials, who now are 'buried alive' in West Berlin's Spandau Prison, General Ramcke said at a press conference held in the basement of the West-Berlin City Hall...

"General Ramcke was held for five years in connection with war crimes committed in Brest."

THE NEW AXIS

From Henry Wales in the Chicago Daily Tribune:

"Former Nazi diplomats, directed by Hitler's shrewd ambassador to Turkey, Franz von Papen, are forging a Madrid-Cairo axis to destroy the French and British influence in the near east and to make Germany dominant in the Arab world . . .

"'Six hundred officers already hold top ranking position in the Arab armies,' the paper charged.

"The leaders of Nazi diplomacy who escaped the hangman's noose or who have been freed from prison launched their plan two years ago. Their activities embrace the entire Mediterranean basin, centering on Spain, Turkey, and the Arab league states...

"Their aim is to raise up the Moslem nationalists in order to undermine English and French power in the region and to place Germans or German indoctrinated Arabs in key positions."

HITLER'S FRIEND

From the London Chronicle:

A photograph showing Leni Riefenstahl, one-time friend of Hitler, watching the massacre of Jews by German soldiers in the Polish village of Konsky in September 1939, was published this week in the German "Illustrated Weekly," several days after a German court acquitted her of charges of being a Nazi. The photography was taken 12 years ago by a German Army corporal who says that Fraulein Riefenstahl had watched the Germans mow down 30 Jewish men, women and children with machine guns after the victims had spent four hours scratching out graves with their bare hands.

MORE OF THE SAME

From an Associated Press dispatch:

"The release of seventeen German war criminals from Allied prisons was announced today. Included were Kurt Gallenkamp, a former German general once sentenced to be hanged for complicity in the killing of a group of captive British troops, and Helene Kopper and M. Mewes, both concentration camp wardresses."

"WE ARE INNOCENT"

Konrad Adenauer at a recent press conference:

"We Germans are exceptionally deeply interested in the treatment of war criminals, both for psychological reasons and sympathy with those who, though sentenced, have in our opinion not committed any war crimes at all." Dr. Adenauer further stated that with regard to war criminals, Germany had not recognized the judgments on them and need not recognize them. She had not been required to recognize them. The prisoners would come into German custody but he could not at the moment say whether the authority would remain in being until the last war criminal had served the last day of his sentence.

BUSINESS AS USUAL

From the East Zone "German Report."

"The 22 West German businessmen who attended the conference in Moscow were deeply impressed by Soviet offers of a trade exchange with West Germany valued at two thousand million rubles.

"As a direct result of this offer the Foreign Policy Committee of the Bonn Federal Parliament demanded on April 17th that West Germany should be granted freedom of trade with Eastern Europe and Asia, and many West German newspapers representing commercial interests called for a strengthening of trade with the East.

"The 'Industrie Kurier' stated: 'The nations of the Western bloc are now getting a foothold in Eastern markets which both traditionally and geographically are a natural German market.' "

NOT GUILTY

From The Washington Evening Star:

"Dr. Alfred Leu, who helped select victims for euthanasia extermination by the Nazis, was cleared of guilt by a German court some time ago.

"In Hitler's euthanasia program, thousands of sick, crippled and insane persons were killed to eliminate persons 'useless to the state.'

"Dr. Leu admitted he selected 80 insane children from the Sachsenberg asylum for execution. But he said he chose only incurable cases in order to protect others with a chance of recovery."

WHAT WILL THE STATUE OF LIBERTY SAY?

From a J. T. A. news report:

"Dr. Kurt Blome, a Gestapo official who was deputy chief of the Reich Chamber of Medicine, and who was tried at Nuremberg in 1946 for crimes against humanity, has applied for a visa to visit the United States.

"The doctor served Hitler as Deputy Reich Health Leader and was connected with the S.S. group which carried out sterilization of Jews and others, surgical experiments on involuntary victims, and other atrocities. State Department officials here refused to say whether his visa was approved or not."

A "GOOD" GESTAPO MAN

From a Reuters dispatch:

"Constantine Canaris, wartime head of the Nazi Gestapo in Belgium and Northern France, has been released from a twenty-year hard labor prison sentence he received last year ... His term was reduced by a special Belgian law providing for 'good behavior' release."

DOUBLE BOOKKEEPING

From The Nation:

"Two official decisions handed down recently in Germany have an ominous ring. In one case three Jewish merchants of Polish nationality had been brought before a Berlin city court. The details of the case are of no interest, but the following statement in the sentence is worth recording. 'The three defendants are Jewish merchants of Polish nationality ... One of the aggravating circumstances against the defendants is the fact that they are foreigners. As such they enjoy the hospitality of Berlin and they have badly abused it ... Also to be considered aggravating is the fact that the defendants are Jews.'

"In the second case the widow of Colonel Count Marogna-Redwitz was informed by the Bureau of Finance in Munich that her pension was to be stopped because her husband had been sentenced to death for high treason—the Colonel had been involved in the unsuccessful attempt to overthrow Hitler in July, 1944. This is apparently still considered a major crime by German justice in the year 1952."

ALL IS FORGIVEN

From The Daily Compass:

"Friedrich Christiansen, German war-time commander in Holland, jailed three years ago for deporting the male population of Putten and destroying the village, has been released and has returned to Germany.

"The former Air Force general's sentence still had another nine years to run. Practically all the men deported by Christiansen died before the end of the war."

A CLUMSY DIPLOMAT

As reported from the Bayrische Rundschau:

"Federal Transport Minister Christoph Seebohm is said to have stated 'that the German boundaries of 1937, being a consequence of the Versailles Treaty, could not be recognized, since the German people had previously refused such recognition. He is also said to have alleged that the Allies had created a 'social atom bomb,' called the Potsdam Agreement, and to have spoken critically about denazification.'

" 'Finally he said he would bow in reverence before any symbol under which Germans lost their lives.' "

DRIVING TO THE EAST

From an Associated Press dispatch:

"The West German Bundestag (lower house of Parliament) voted in favor of wiping out Western Allied restrictions trade with the Communist East.

"All parties joined in adopting the Socialist-sponsored resolution.

"The restrictions require special licenses for sale of strategic or essential materials to any nation behind the Iron Curtain.

"German Socialists argued it was senseless to try by such means to prevent a power with Soviet Russia's resources from obtaining vital materials. All the embargo accomplishes, they claimed, was to cripple Western nations—especially Germany—in their efforts to balance their foreign trade."

THE LATEST SWITCH IN THE COMMUNIST PARTYLINE — AS A FRENCH CARTOONIST SEES IT

(Franc Tireur, Paris)

HERE WE GO AGAIN

From a Reuters dispatch:

"West German industrialists have set up an 'Office for West-East Trade' to promote commercial relations with Russia, China and other Communist countries. Willi Rehm, official manager, announced that soon a group of German businessmen would go to Peiping to continue talks begun at the Moscow economic conference."

VISITORS OF DISTINCTION

From Milton Friedman in the Nation:

"Dr. Walter P. Schreiber, former commanding officer of the Department of Medical Science of Hitler's Supreme Command, to whom some unflattering references were made at the Nuernberg war-crimes trials, recently arrived to join the faculty of the United States Army Air Force School of Aviation Medicine at Randolph Field, Texas. Dr. Otto Reuleaux and about fifty other Germans were granted visas to attend an international meeting of industrialists held in New York in connection with a convention of the National Association of Manufacturers. Dr. Reuleaux held the Nazi title of Defense Economy Director and is on the original 1945 War Department list of those who participated in and benefited from the Hitler regime. Some of his colleagues who accompanied him to New York were also Nazi Party members and beneficiaries of the regime...

"Although the Displaced Persons Act expired last December 31, the official machinery has been kept functioning to admit 54,774 additional Volksdeutsche from Eastern Europe. Many of these people, according to Rabbi Irving Miller, ex-president of the American Jewish Congress, 'volunteered for service with the execution squads which gassed and otherwise exterminated six million Jews and millions of other faiths.'"

THE LATEST LITERATURE

From Ernest Leiser to the ONA:

"The Western Allies are being accused today, before some eight million readers of West German magazines, of countenancing murder, using third degree tactics, seeking to starve the German populace and a similarly horrendous series of other crimes ranging from the theft of German patents to the fabrication of evidence in order to convict Germans as war criminals.

"These angry charges are being made, and repeated, by most of the West German Republic's leading mass-circulation weekly magazines...

"A number of them are also featuring articles describing in glowingly nostalgic terms personalities and events of the Nazi Reich.

"The German daily press, as a whole, observes fairly high standards of temperance and impartiality; however, almost since their beginning, the weekly illustrated magazines have been malicious and sensational in 'exposing' alleged activities of the Allies here.

"'And now,' according to a senior United States Information official, 'they are going from bad to worse. What they 'report' is shocking enough in itself, consisting as it does of half-truths and outright slanders. But what is even worse is the fact that the magazine editors are obviously convinced that this is what their readers want and what will build up circulation.'

"Here are a few samples:

"DER STERN, with a circulation of 467,850, carries a report of the 'murder' of several German civilians by French and American occupation soldiers in 1945 and describes the attempts by the widow of one of the alleged victims to sue the United States in a High Commission court—without succcess. The magazine moralizes that 'since none of the victims of those turbulent days can be revived, all Germans imprisoned for similar and lesser charges would be also released and forgiven.'...

"REVUE, circulation 439,000, publishes an article on Magda Goebbels, widow of Hitler's Propaganda Minister, which praises the latter's intelligence, efficiency and courage and speaks of his 'tireless' and 'self-sacrificing' efforts for the Nazi cause in the late twenties.

"DER SPIEGEL (circulation 113,000), a news magazine aping the format of TIME and NEWSWEEK, cites the 'harsh' trade restrictions imposed by the Allies on the West German Republic in trading with the Soviet bloc and says that the Germans should seek to sell as much to the East as possible.

"QUICK, a magazine with a circulation of 620,000, continues its serial review of 'German postwar history.' That review has contained such accusations as one that the Allies purposely starved the Germans immediately after the war (this, at a time when the U. S. was shipping 1,200,000 tons of wheat to West Germany annually), that they stole German patents, deliberately tried to eliminate German export possibilities (when the Allies were trying desperately to build those exports up to get the Germans off the back of the American taxpayer) and tried to frame as a black marketeer a German official who protested these Allied 'abuses.'"

> "By the end of the next year the NATO forces in Western Europe will be strong enough to resist any Russian adventures and, if the Red Army were mad enough to move, those forces—so long as there were no German element in them—could make a fighting withdrawal across the German glacis to prepared positions on the Rhine. But, once German divisions are integrated into the European Army, this defensive strategy is denied us. For the Germans will quite legitimately demand, as the price of their participation, the defense of the Oder line and a counter-attack to the Vistula. Hence the integration of German divisions in a European Army, so far from reducing the commitments of the other Atlantic powers, enormously increases them."

Neo-Nazis Plot Nationwide Drive

by

JAMES H. SHELDON

German-American fellow-travellers of Nazidom are out in the open again—for the first time since Pearl Harbor Day.

Five hundred people assembled in New York's Yorkville Casino on May 4th to hear the chairman of a "German-American Friendship Rally" declare that unless the "right people" run it, "a Republic degenerates into a mob-ocracy." By the "right people" he meant, of course, those of German origin.

The speaker was Edward A. Fleckenstein, already notorious as head of the so-called German-American Voters Alliance—an organization which has, to a considerable degree, taken over the leadership of the same element that once constituted the German-American Bund of Hitler's time.

General Eisenhower—the author of the Allied victory in Germany—was castigated by every speaker, until mention of his name drew hisses, boos and cat-calls. "The modern John The Baptist of the Anti-Christ," was one of the more noissome epithets applied to "Ike" by Fleckenstein—and his fellow-orators followed the same line.

When an eleven-piece band played The Star Spangled Banner the crowd rose slowly to its feet, but (except for two reporters) no on seemed able to sing. A little later, when Deutschland Uber Alles was played, the audience suddenly found its voice, and all stood erect and sang lustily.

Speakers repeatedly stressed the fact that this rally was but the first of a nation-wide series soon to take place. (One has already been held in Chicago.)

Best known man on the program was Dr. Austin J. App (a professor at LaSalle College, Phildaelphia)—who once called for the hanging of General Eisenhower as a war criminal.

The Nuremberg Trials were "a revengeful travesty," said App. "Germany must be united. . . . The homeland must be returned to East Germany, and the Sudetenland too. . . . Tell France she must return the Saar," he continued.

App is the author if a 10-page tract called "Ravishing the Women of Conquered Europe," which argues that "the German armies were the most decent in the war." This leaflet originated the malicious and blood-curdling lie, since popularized in neo-Nazi circles, that Allied soldiers in Stuttgart once "herded German women into the subways and raped 2,000 of them." App contrives to leave the impression that this was done, if not with the approval, at least with the connivance, of American Army officers. At first, a few misguided individuals even took App's charges seriously—until they discovered that there are no subways in Stuttgart!

"Anybody not in harmony with our views is not a true American but is a Communist or a half-brother of a Communist . . .of the breed that furnished the atom spies," App told the Yorkville "Friendship Rally." "Had such meetings as this been more frequent from 1918 to 1939, we might have had no World War II," he added.

Another speaker was Henry C. Furstenwalde, a former employee of the Alien Property Custodian's office. Denouncing the United Nations as a tool of the Allies, he drew laughs by announcing that "The letters UN stand only for Useless Notions."

Rev. Emanuel J. Reichenberger, proudly introduced from the platform as "the father of the expellees," is the 1952 ideological image of Charles Coughlin. A naturalized American citizen, he made two post-war trips to Germany, during which he addressed groups of Sudeten expellees in such violently anti-American language that the State Department had finally to cancel his visa. Perhaps as a result of this, Reichenberger was particularly vituperative in those parts of his speech referring to the "crimes" of the American State Department, which he evidently visualizes as engaged in a constant conspiracy to hand over the Germans to Stalin.

Some of App's pamphlets have been translated into German by Reichenberger, for circulation in West Germany. A Portuguese translation has also been issued, for use amongst the German settlers of Brazil.

Another speaker who dwelt tearfully upon the "light" of the Sudeten expellees—carefully avoiding any mention of the strong pro-Hitler sentiment which had pervaded this group—was Joseph Totzauer—head of an organization called "American Aid for Expellees."

A Menace to Democracy

The audience was obviously much bigger than the leaders of the responsible group—the German-American Voters Alliance—had expected. Most of those who attended seemed to be, from outward appearance, fairly respectable-looking German-Americans. Therein lay the greatest menace posed by the whole affair—for this rally was the first outward sign that the propaganda of the extremist groups might be securing a hold in the minds of the average member of the German-American community, and represented a dangerous consolidation of strength for a group which has hitherto been so openly identified with the legacy of the infamous German-American Bund that up until this time it had not managed to get itself seriously accepted.

News of plans for the meeting "leaked" to the press, with the result that leaders cautioned the speakers to be very careful, and to tone down their remarks. As a result, most of the speakers carefully followed notes, and omitted the more vituperative anti-Semitic material which has often characterized their remarks in "closed meetings."

Among those who attended the rally (held at the Yorkville Casino, with a bar conveniently situated off the assembly hall) were several German sailors, just off their ship, who found difficulty exchanging marks for American beer.

Two speakers referred proudly to a number of recently arrived Sudeten-German expellees who were present as "free guests" at the rally.

Dr. Ludwig Fritsch, generally one of the more violent anti-Semitic agitators, observed the admonition to caution, and devoted his talk (delivered in German) mainly to praising historic figures like Carl Schurz and General Von Steuben. He quoted with approval a United States Senator who is supposed to have advised that "if the Germans would only stick together as do the Jews and the Poles, you could run this country."

Fritsch delivered a lengthy eulogy of Fleckenstein and induced the audience to put considerable money into collection boxes which were passed around while he spoke, to aid "the cause."

On an earlier occasion (without the press present) Fritsch once charged that "The United States has contributed to present world disorder by encouraging Jewish-led Communism . . . and the rise of the colored races led by world Judaism."

A widely circulated book by Fritsch, entitled The Crime of Our Age, may be judged from its chapter headings, two of which are "Roosevelt's Satanism," and "Germany—Protector of Christianity and the White Race."

Unsavory Background

It is worthwhile to note some of the background forces that helped to organize the Yorkville "Friendship Rally."

The impetus behind this movement, in general, may be traced to the German-American Voters Alliance. Handbills were distributed and tickets sold, from the newsstand of Eugene Brand, proprietor of an East 86th Street stationery store which has long been the outlet for anti-Semitic publications like C. Leon DeAryan's The Broom and Conde McGinley's Common Sense. In earlier days, Brand sold the publications of the German-American Bund, from the same address.

Under the chairmanship of A. O. Tittman, in 1947-49, the Voters Alliance pursued an openly anti-Semitic policy. Tittman once wrote to a prospective member that "within Germany the only hope is for them to start a Sicilian Vesper and bring their tormentors down with them." (The allusion is to the bloody incident in Italian history when the inhabitants of Sicily, by secret agreement, armed themselves with daggers and fell upon the troops of an occupying power, using the ringing of the Vesper Bells as a prearranged signal.)

Fleckenstein, who has chaired the Alliance since 1950, is the youthful heir to a considerable Chicago packing fortune. Under his presidency, the German-American Voters Alliance has been instructed to "wait" with its attack on the Jews, until it succeeds in restoring its following. In December, 1950, Fleckenstein sent a thousand-word telegram to the government of Chancellor Adenauer, via the German Permanent Mission in Washington, urging that the Bonn Government ought "not to rearm the Reich unless it is granted the right to possess full-fledged armed forces, officered by Germans."

"I want to warn His Excellency (i.e., Dr. Adenauer) that any agreement which his government enters into with the Truman administration is at its peril. . . . In the White House there reigns a psychopathic antagonism to everything German . . .",the telegram continued. As a condition to dealing with the United States, Fleckenstein urged the Bonn government to demand that America "recognize the validity of the Munich Agreement of October, 1938," and "insist on the immediate restoration to Germany of the merchant ships stolen by the Allies." the wire ended: "One of the greatest crimes . . . was the unconditional surrender agreement . . . which has given the color of legality to the violence, rape, looting, larceny and murder which all of the Allies have visited on the German people."

All the speakers at the "Friendship Rally" made it clear that the Yorkville affair was only a "starter," and would be followed up with many other such meetings, as part of a nation-wide plan. Therein lies, we believe, a very real danger for the future security of American ideals.

"If the western Allies become irritated with his (Chancellor Konrad Adenauer) demands and choose to resist or turn him down, then he goes to the German people as the aggrieved German nationalist and again wins applause. Then, having raised the lid ever so slightly on the Pandora's box of German nationalism, Dr. Adenauer can turn to the Allies and ask that they strengthen his hand against extremists. It usually works, and he usually wins all the tricks."

(From an article by Don Cook in The Reporter)

"Recently Gen. Heinz Guderian, creator of the Panzer divisions that inflicted the blitzkrieg on Europe, made the remark that should the coming German army attack Russia to regain the territories lost to Poland the West would have no choice but to follow.

"German nationalism is to be reckoned with, indeed, when ex-Nazi generals openly speak in these terms. The new German nationalism has a familiar and an ugly face."

(From an editorial in the Cleveland Plain Dealer)

"Stalin might go even further in his desperate bid to keep a flourishing western Germany out of the Atlantic defense community. He might even consent to some sort of revision of the German-Polish border. The Poles are expendable. They occupy what formerly was German territory up to the Oder-Neisse line. It is not too far-fetched to imagine Stalin's throwing a sop to Germany in the form of a revision at the expense of Poland."

(William L. Ryan in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch)

"GERMANY. I am frankly frightened by the restoration of Germany to independent power as a nation. I do not believe that Adenauer, the Chancellor, speaks for the German people. He is bad enough, but the powers that will take over Germany when it is free to choose its own leaders will make him look in retrospect like a mild liberal. The Germans, under the surface, are as fanatically nationalistic as they have ever been."

(Frank Kingdon in New York Post)

An Official Report on Germany

(Excerpts from a report to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, prepared by a Special Study Mission comprising Congressmen Clement J. Zablocki, A. S. J. Cornahan, Brooks Hays, Edna F. Kelly, Chester E. Merrow, Jacob K. Javits—February, 1952.)

Neo-nazism

It is particularly distressing to Americans to find evidence of the active existence of political groups garbed in the trappings of the Nazis and apparently trying to cash in on the Hitler formula. Such groups oppose "today's phony democracy," defend the convicted Nazi war criminals and former generals, are anti-United States, anti-French, anti-British, and denounce such measures for European cooperation as the Schuman plan and the Council of Europe. They provide a rallying point for leading former Nazis and have strong support from some veterans' and expellees' groups.

Among the American officials of HICOG, the consensus seemed to be that the situation is getting worse not better. The attention of the subcommittee was called to two developments: First, the organization of a good many veterans' groups in West Germany culminating in a brazen call to organize an association of the Waffen SS—Hitler's elite army corps with a ghastly reputation for terrorism in World War II—next spring around Bremen; second, the fact that a large proportion of former Nazi Party members were staffing the new foreign office at Bonn. . . .

According to our observation of industrial management in the steel and coal industries, we found many managers to have been Nazi Party members because they claim they had to join during the Hitler period to continue in their management positions. The trade-union leaders express bitter opposition to this condition and urge that their campaign for codetermination was intended to serve as a check and balance on managements which have Nazi antecedents.

In political terms neo-Nazi activity was found to be strongest in Lower Saxony and Schleswig-Holstein, where it was dominated by the SRP under General Remer, and in Bavaria where its leader is August Haussleiter. Generally through the country also there is concern about veterans' organizations, one of the principal leaders of which is General Friessner. . . .

The consensus of opinion is that the neo-Nazi situation is alarming and requires close watching. It could present an imminent danger if American occupation forces are withdrawn. In essence we felt that right now this movement is the focus of the malcontents. This judgment is supported by a recent address of United States High Commissioner McCloy in which he pointed out that a survey of German opinion indicated that only 20 percent of those asked would do their utmost to prevent a party similar to the Nazis from coming into power. Thirty percent of the people said they would not like such a thing to happen but would do nothing to prevent it, while 23 percent said, "I do not care." Only 3 percent said they would do everything possible to support such a new Nazi party. Mr. McCloy regarded as the "real danger"—

"The apathy of millions of men and women in this country, in their failure to recognize that they must act in defense of their own liberties."

At present the German Trade-Union Federation appears to be one of the principal bulwarks against the recurrence of nazism. The sub-committee in its discussions with German trade-union leaders found complete unanimity and the strongest conviction on this issue. . . .

Decartelization and Nationalization

Since the end of the war, the occupying powers have been engaged in a program to dissolve and prevent the recurrence of industrial cartels. The effort has focused primarily on the reorganization of the steel and coal industries of the Ruhr and of the former I. G. Farben chemical concern. Although no official or approximate estimate of the value of the assets of these industries is available, a figure of $3.5 billion is regarded as reasonable. New corporations are being set up in each of these industries which are supposed to be sufficiently numerous and so organized as to make possible effective competition. The assets of the old cartel organizations are being transferred to the new corporations.

The deconcentration and decartelization program we were advised would result in the creation of 20 new coal companies and the reshuffling of stock ownership so that the former owners who held interests both in steel and coal and in many companies (vertical or horizontal trusts) would be confined only to one competitive company respectively; also that the captive coal mines of the steel companies will only account for 18 percent of the coal produced against a previous 50 percent. Among the main problems are the dissolution of the United Steel Works (Thyssen) and disposition of the family holdings of Krupp in both steel and coal.

The subcommittee does not approve of the situation which exists as regards the Krupp family fortune. The property of Alfred Krupp was confiiscated by the allied court at Nuremberg but was restored by an act of clemency by High Commissioner McCloy. Mr. McCloy based his action on the fact that confiscation is not in accordance with United States and British law. The decartelization and deconcentration process is intended to make sure that the Krupps will no longer enjoy monopoly of an industry. Their shareholdings are being reshuffled for this purpose, but this process does not wipe out the family fortune. There is every indication that the Krupps will emerge with great wealth, owning shares in a large number of German enterprises, living without work or responsibility. That this should occur while the United States taxpayer is helping to finance German recovery would seem to indicate a defect in our handling of Nazi industrialists.

The problem of choosing management in the new coal and steel companies is of the utmost importance. A certain complacency about accepting managers who remained in management of many of these companies throughout the Hitler period was noted. It appears that managements are appointed by the parties in interest still, with the Combined Steel Group exercising only a veto power. It is charged that the group running steel now, the Steel Trustee Association, had important influences in it of former Nazi figures, such as Heinrich Dinkelbach, and the same was true with the group running coal (DKBL) under Heinrich Kost. . . .

Education

There is still much to be done in making the German educational system more democratic. In general, it has always been a restrictive system which concentrates on the schooling of a highly trained elite. The difficulties are illustrated by the effort to modify and extend the type of secondary education.

Since the first World War German children have had access to free public primary education through the equivalent of the American fourth grade. After that, those who successfully passed a rigid examination and whose parents could afford to pay for their further schooling may enter the "gymnasium," a school which continues somewhat beyond the American high school and prepares its graduates for admission to a university. This group is about 10 percent of the total. The 90 percent who do not go to the gymnasium continue in public schools and ultimately become apprentices or take vocational training but are segregated from the elect, who may ultimately qualify for university training and a profession such as law, medicine, or diplomacy. The "nongymnasium" school system is considered to be inferior to the "gymnasium" in classification. This inferior designation is recognized and accepted by students and teachers.

The United States has tried throughout the occupation to get this system modified so as to give something nearer equality of opportunity in education and to promote democracy by keeping all classes of pupils in contact with each other as much a possible. Some Germans have consistently and vigorously opposed the change, and one major United States official stated that the United States was not now emphasizing the negative features of the "gymnasium." Instead, greater emphasis is placed on the need for positive changes in the educational program for the 90 percent.

Progress has been slow in the field of higher education as indicated by a well-informed American official who said:

"There is no use trying to say that German schools and universities are great progressive institutions. We have tried hard with these institutions but it is a hard, hard pull to make any progress. They have a long way to go. Scientifically they are far behind us. I studied in German universities 20 years ago. Today anyone, unless he wanted to learn a foreign language, would be silly to come over here for research reasons. They are far behind us. . . ."

Democracy in Germany

In the light of the situation which has been summarized above and in view of additional factors which will be enumerated, the subcommittee cannot escape the conclusion that the people of West Germany are not yet qualified to graduate from the course in democracy which has been offered to them during the occupation. It is the considered judgment of responsible United States officials, based on public-opinion polls and other sources of information, that too many of the German people believe today that nazism contained more that was good than was bad. Public-opinion polls indicate that a majority of the German people, youth as well as older groups, desire and feel no responsibility for government.

An indication of the difficulties to be surmounted in the establishment of democracy in Germany is a statement made to the subcommittee by a leading official of the SPD (Socialist) Party and of the opposition to the Adenaur government. When asked whether his party would accept a decision of the majority of the West German Parliament to contribute to European defense along the lines being discussed in the current negotiations for the European army (he did not oppose cooperation in European defense in principle, however), he said that it would not accept such a verdict since the present Government does not represent a majority of the people.

Further evidence of the state of democracy in Germany is the attitude toward freedom of enterprise. There is little popular interest in or support for the effort to break up and prevent cartels. It is particularly significant that it has been impossible for the United States to develop appreciable sentiment in favor of permitting anyone who wants to start a new business to do so. Traditionally, since the guilds of the Middle Ages, Germany has always required a new firm to be licensed after the need for its services and its qualifications for doing business have ben passed on by an organization of people already in the trade. This undoubtedly has discouraged competition and economic progress. During the occupation the United States would not permit such restrictions, but it appears to be generally believed by Americans as well as Germans that as soon as authority on this matter is returned to the German Government there will be a return to the old licensing system with the support of the majority of the people.

The enumeration of these evidences that the Federal Republic of Germany cannot be regarded as having fully qualified as a democratic nation does not mean that the subcommittee regards the efforts of the Allies to bring democracy to the Germans as a failure. Undoubtedly, much has been done and some seeds have taken root, but much more remains to be done. . . .

. . ."A rearmed West Germany will become the dominant power on the Continent. Its aim will be unification and the regaining of its lost provinces. It will pursue this aim by any and all means. It may drag the Western alliance into a war with Russia; or it may sell out to Russia, provided that Russia will sell out the Poles. The ultimate consequence of London and Lisbon is either a third world war or a Europe dominated by a renewed German-Russian alliance."

(James P. Warburg in a letter to the New York Times)

The Saar

by

DR. ALBERT SIMARD

Many of our representatives in France admit that the French people are alarmed over our policies toward Germany. They have endeavored, however, to assure the French that, while it is necessary to rehabilitate Germany's power in the "interests of Western European Defenses," Germany would never receive special advantages nor would she be permitted to dominate the Western Coalition. In this connection, our officials have repeatedly stressed the decisive role of France in the strengthening of the political, economic, and military position of Western Europe. Yet, in the last analysis, our French Allies will not, and rightly so, judge us by what we say but by what we do.

The Saar problem is a case in point. The Saar Valley is important to the French for political, economic, moral and strategic reasons. The strategic importance of the Saar was described by the Washington Evening Star on January 17th, 1950. "The Saar played a key role in building up Hitler's military power and the people of France thus have a natural desire to guard against a repetition of the same thing . . ." The size of the Saar Basin is by no means indicative of its economic importance. Although it is a comparatively small territory (a 30 x 16 mile spot on the map, squeezed between France and Germany) beneath its picturesque hills there lies a reserve of 9 billion tons of high-grade coal. Moreover, the Saar possesses a first class steel industry. Thus, for the French, the economic resources of the Saar, are vital. This can be seen from the fact that with the Saar's resources, France, under the Schuman plan will possess 34 per cent of the industrial strength of the economic community as against 35 per cent for Germany.

The Manchester Guardian of April 10th, 1952, points out that "if the Saar were re-attached to Germany, the Federal Republic would have 42 per cent of the community's coal and steel; France would have 27 per cent."

Yet, even today, the Germans are forging ahead of the French, despite the fact that the Saar is attached economically to France. Business Week, of January 19, 1952, reported that "German steel production (for the year 1951) was about 13.4 million metric tons—more than that of France and the French controlled Saar combined."

The moral and psychological principles, which also helped to shape the French attitude toward the Saar are also worthy of consideration. No country in Western Europe suffered as much as France under the heel of the Germans in World War I and World War II (more than two million died at the hands of the Germans). Germany despoiled France and ruined her industries. In spite of these losses, the French people have always been in the forefront of democracy's struggles against German totalitarianism. Their claims against the Germans, therefore, are literally written in blood, sweat and tears.

The United States and Great Britain fully comprehended the French position on the Saar at the close of World War II. In a Press Conference, held on May 16, 1947, Foreign Minister Bidault, speaking about the Moscow Conference on Germany, declared: "I want to begin by stating that no one opposed the incorporation of the Saar into the French economy. . . . The situation is the following: Great Britain and the United States have agreed that the Saar should be integrated into French economy and separated from the political organization of Germany. . . . I do not need to emphasize that this question is very close to the heart of the French Government."

Foreign Minister Bidault's statement had been confirmed in previous years by leading American and British officials. On June 4, 1946, the British Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Ernest Bevin, said that His Majesty's Government favored the transfer of the Saar to the French. Several days later (July 11, 1946), Mr. Bevin repeated that the British Government was ready to support the French with regard to the Saar. On April 10, 1947, Mr. Bevin once again reaffirmed this position at the Council of Foreign Ministers in Moscow. A month later, the British Foreign Secretary told the House of Commons that the British Government always supported the French claim to the Saar based on the frontiers esablished under the Versailles treaty.

The United States had also taken a similar stand to that of Great Britain. On February 17, 1946, Secretary of State James F. Byrnes, speaking at Stuttgart, Germany, declared: "The United States does not feel they can deny to France, which has been invaded three times by Germany in 70 years, its claim to the Saar territory, whose economy has long been linked with France. Of course, after the Saar territory is integrated with France, she should readjust her reparation claims against Germany." France complied with the condition set down by Mr. Byrnes on February 28, 1948. At that time, the British, United States and French Governments agreed that Saar coal should be removed from the coal pool established in the Ruhr; that France would reduce her share of reparations proportionate to the value of the Saar economy, and that the trade between the Saar and Western Germany should be treated as Foreign trade.

Secretary of State, George Marshall, reaffirmed the position taken by his predecessor James F. Byrnes. In November, 1947, in London, General Marshall asserted, "the United States supports the claim of France to the economic integration of the Saar."

The views of Secretary Byrnes and Marshall were supported by Secretary of State Dean Acheson. The New York Times of January 19, 1950, reported, "Secretary of State Dean Acheson placed the United States today squarely behind the French demand for the separation of the Saar from Germany and its economic integration with France." Mr. Acheson, according to the Times, stated that this position had the approval of President Truman. One week later, the New York Times reported from Paris that Secretary Acheson's views were officially made known to the French Foreign Office. A United States Embassy spokesman, the Times reported, "emphasized that Mr. Acheson's assurances did not give France a blank check, but were complete so far as the principles of detachment of the Saar from Germany, economic integration with France and a certain amount of autonomy were concerned."

From the foregoing it is clear that England and the United States had given explicit support to the French position on the Saar. It was only natural, therefore, that the French should take the necessary steps to effectuate this policy, which had the approval of the major Western Powers. As a matter of fact, from November 1947 onward, France had taken measures which served to establish a new relationship between the Saar and France, economically and politically. On March 3, 1950, a series of agreements were concluded between the French and Saar Governments that were to consolidate previous arrangements. These agreements included:

1. A general convention regarding diplomatic, legal and administrative relations between the Saar Government and France.
2. A convention dealing with the detailed application of economic union between the two countries.
3. A convention on the status of the Saar coal mines, whereby the Saar Government recognized the right of the French to work the mines for 50 years.
4. A railway agreement.
5. An establishment treaty defining the rights of nationals of either territory in the territory of the other.

This agreement received the blessings of the United States and Great Britain. It did not prejudice the ultimate working out of a peace treaty for Germany. The New York Times, of January 10, 1950, pointed out that "while receiving this United States and British agreement to the settlement she proposed for the Saar, France abandoned her previous policy of insisting upon the detachment of the Ruhr and Rhineland from Germany."

When the French Saar agreement was made public, Chancellor Adenauer asserted that it shook his faith in the West. He accused the French of not seeking security and charged that they were "hungry for gold." He denied the right of the French to lease the Saar coal mines, declaring that they were the property of the old Reich. Needless to say, Adenauer's blast was the signal for an all-out campaign of vilification on the part of the German politicians and press. They raised the old Hitlerian slogans and sought in every way to insult the French people. Nevertheless, their noisy antics did not make an impression, thanks to the solidarity of the French, British and Americans. Though the Bonn politicians were rebuffed, they did not give up the fight, but planned for a new assault against the French at an appropriate time. The opportunity came when the Allies, endeavoring to bring Germany into the Atlantic defenses, granted new concessions to the Germans, but as usual, these concessions merely whet the appetite of the Germans and the Saar issue was raised again.

Although the French had misgivings on entering into negotiations with Germany on the Saar, they consented to do so, in the interests of Western solidarity. The chronology and details relating to these negotiations are important because they expose the insincerity of the Germans again.

On March 20, 1952, it was announced from Paris, that France, West Germany and the Saar Government intended to take up their dispute in direct negotiations. In these talks it was agreed that "the French and West German Governments would try to reach at once, in direct negotiations, a definitive solution for the future status of the Saar." Johannes Hoffmann, the Prime Minister of the Saar Government agreed to take part in these talks. Furthermore, the New York Times reported that Dr. Adenauer, in the interest of reaching an agreement, would no longer raise "the protest that he made . . . against the Saar Government, being allowed to sign international accords," and that he would no longer press his charge that the Saar Government had been violating political liberties. In other words, Dr. Adenauer assured the French that he would no longer fight against the French-Saar Agreement of 1950. The Times report disclosed that Chancellor Adenauer and Foreign Minister Schuman agreed to form an electoral commission consisting of France, West Germany and the Saar, to investigate conditions for a free election in the Saar for the autumn of 1952. Chancellor Adenauer's Secretary of State, Professor Hallstein, stressed the fact that the Saar parliament would have a voice in the final decision.

This agreement received the immediate support of U. S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy, but the very next day, there was a political explosion in the Bonn Parliament. The accord was attacked as "prejudicial" to Germany. The New York Times' correspondent reported that this attack came because the ministers in Paris had agreed that the Saar "would ultimately exist under sponsorship of the Council of Europe as a 'European State,' politically independent. . . ." This view of the agreement was shared by the Times' political analyst, Anne O'Hare McCormick. Writing in the Times of March 22, 1952, Miss McCormick noted that, "by the terms of the agreement, the French maintain their economic position in the Saar, the Germans obtain assurance that the question need not be left open until the peace treaty is signed, and the Saarlanders are promised a voice in the settlement." Moreover, she pointed out that "in the back of the minds of the leaders of the Council of Europe there has been a hope that the Saar would become the nucleus of a European federation, perhaps the seat of the high authority of the new international pool of coal and iron." This is how the Allies understood the agreement.

Dr. Adenauer facing a hostile Parliament denied that he agreed to the "Europeanization" of the Saar under the auspices of the Council of Europe. (New York Times, March 23, 1952.) The New York Times correspondent, who reported Dr. Adenauer's denial, observed that it was "a direct contradiction of the interpretation of the agreement . . . as it was outlined last night and today by high Allied and German sources." As a matter of fact, the Times correspondent reported that an official of the German Federal Press Office "was puzzled by the statement authorized by Dr. Adenauer." Nevertheless, Dr. Adenauer continued to deny that he agreed to the Europeanization of the Saar, although, as reported by the New York Times of March 24, Allied sources had stated that Adenauer "agreed that the Saar should be Europeanized," and "agreed that the present French-Saar economic ties that give France approximate parity in steel production with Germany should be continued." In turn, the French would consent to elections in the Autumn of 1952, after investigation by an electoral commission. These are the facts, as reported by the authoritative New York Times. They show that Adenauer had made definite commitments, but when he faced the jingo politicians at Bonn he joined them in denouncing France and the agreement.

On April 23, 1952, the Bonn Parliament, with the approval of Adenauer, denounced the agreement categorically. Adenauer blasted the French and his attack paved the way for the resolution of the Bonn Parliament in which all previous agreements between the French and the Saar Governments were declared illegal and that the Saar belonged to the German "lock, stock and barrel." Adenauer warned that if the Germans were not given full satisfaction the problem would "disturb if not prevent entirely European integration."

It is not surprising to those who know the Germans that they should repudiate this accord. They have done so in the past and they will undoubtedly continue to back-track on future commitments. Yet, an editorial in the New York Times stated on April 25, 1952, that "Paris must accept the larger share of the responsibility for the immediate situation." The Times declared that the French, as well as the Germans had taken an uncompromising position. This view was echoed by Miss McCormick who accused the French of "hedging on the informal agreement made with Chancellor Adenauer for elections in the Saar." Apparently Miss McCormick forgot what she had said in her column a month before.

The fact of the matter is, of course, that the French have compromised on the Saar question. For example, France gave up her proposal to permanently detach the Ruhr and Rhineland from Germany. Moreover, she consented to drastically reduce reparations due from Germany in return for the support she received from the United States and Great Britain to integrate the Saar economically with France. Therefore, to accuse the French of being uncompromising, in effect amounts to the charge that France's Western Allies are reneging on the policies which they had originally supported.

This brings us to a fundamental issue which must be answered if we are to prevent Germany from dominating Western Europe. If it is our avowed policy to strengthen France ecomonically and militarily how can the United States do anything but give full support to the French on the Saar? There are so-called experts who have been moaning over what they call "the decadence and weakness" of France but try to weaken France by reversing our policy on the the Saar. On the contrary, by foresaking France on this crucial issue we will have in effect provided Germany with the necessary leverage to dominate the West. That is why our position, as regards the Saar, is a crucial test as to our true intentions. We may give lip service to the principle that Germany must not dominate Western Europe, but if we, in one way or another, enable Germany to seize the Saar again then we shall have paved the way toward that disaster.

One should not be deluded by the belief that the Saar would satiate the German appetite. A member of Dr. Adenauer's cabinet, Jacob Kaiser, told a recent political gathering "no real Europe can be formed until the German bloc is re-constituted. I remind you that this bloc includes, in addition to Germany, Austria, part of Switzerland, Saar, of course, and Alsace-Lorraine. When I think of the Strasbourg Cathedral, my heart hurts."

Surely the American people cannot share the longings of this gentleman, and if we do not stand firm today on the Saar, then we shall be opening once more the flood gates to German expansionism whose limits know no bounds.

. . ."Perhaps more important and more dangerous is the troublesome Saar dispute between France and Germany. The claims and counterclaims over the coal-rich area, which can tip the economic balance of power between France and Germany either way, are hot political issues in Paris and Bonn. The Bundestag, in particular, is committed to the principle that the Saar question must be settled to Germany's satisfaction before it can join the proposed six-nation European army."

(Ned Russell in the New York Herald Tribune)

"Europe is surprised, the French especially are surprised, and a little shaken, that the Bonn Parliament ratified the Schuman plan . . .

"If the decision were based on economic grounds alone there would never have been a chance for the Schuman plan. Some observers . . . predict that in three years the Germans, with their bigger stake, their productive energy and their drive for world markets, will be in position to control the pool. This thought may have won votes for the Schuman plan. No doubt it is in the back of the minds of these Ruhr industrialists who favor the project."

JO DAVIDSON
(1883-1952)

It is with profound regret that we report the passing away of Jo Davidson, the noted sculptor. Mr. Davidson was one of the world's outstanding artists.

In summarizing his life's work, the New York Times noted that "probably no other American has ever made portrait busts of so many famous men of his time as Mr. Davidson." Mr. Davidson, however, was not only a brilliant artist, but a courageous fighter for human rights. He was profoundly sensitive to the sufferings of all peoples under the heel of oppression and this, too, is reflected in his works, including his famous memorial figure dedicated to the Czechoslovak village Lidice which had been wiped out under Hitler's vengeful wrath. He participated in the making of the model for the monument dedicated to the victims of the Warsaw ghetto massacres.

The quality of Mr. Davidson's works were always influenced by his humanistic instincts and that is why they will endure. Mr. Davidson's early life was burdened by financial difficulties, but his determination and talents overcame these obstacles. Having achieved success through the hard way, the imprint of struggle was reflected in many of his productions. Mr. Davidson abhorred obscurantism and bigotry with all the fiber in his being.

We, in the Society, were always proud of the fact that he was one of us, serving as a member of the Advisory Council. The Society has lost a true friend and a staunch fighter for peace and justice, the United States has lost a great and inspiring humanitarian, and the world has lost one of its noblest artists.

"Harassed by thunder on the right as well as on the left, Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida is doggedly facing mounting difficulties in the Diet and on the industrial front as Japan prepares proudly to unfurl the Rising Sun of national independence after six and a half years of defeat and occupation . . .

"The significant common factor in these attacks on Mr. Yoshida's Liberal Government is that, while they emanate from opposed political elements, they derive their strength and popular appeal from the resurgent 'Japan-for-the-Japanese' sentiments now widespread among the people . . .

"In the atmosphere of crisis we have yielded time and again to German nationalism. All our submission has not even produced a dependable military army.

"The Germans have steadily raised the price of co-operation; each time they hear that they are free Europe's indispensable men, their price rises higher. Decent democratic voices are lost amid the noise. As long as Germany's leaders are convinced that nationalist bluster pays off, they will be unresponsive to any democratic idealism and scornful of true European federation."

(From an editorial in the New York Post)

. . ."The approaching political and economic independence of Western Germany will undoubtedly serve to restore the cartel trend in that country. Our experience with the decartelization policy of the occupying powers has clearly demonstrated that there has been no radical change in the German attitude towards cartels."

Louis Domeratzky in the "Freedom and Union."

"SELF-SNARED. One place where present policy is almost sure to leave us in the position of the wrestler who threw himself and ended with his own toe in his mouth is Germany . . .

"Within a month our headlines will proclaim that Chancellor Adenauer of Western Germany has signed two treaties with us: One restoring German sovereignty and ending the right of the Allied governments to a voice in German internal affairs; the other guaranteeing that Allied troops may stay on German soil and that Germany will contribute men and munitions to a European army. This will be hailed as a triumph.

"There are two clouds that blot out any such bright interpretation. First, Adenauer does not speak for the people he professes to rule. Second, these people will vote before the end of 1953, and, unless all signs fail, will throw Adenauer out and put into office leaders opposed to this commitment of 'half-Germany to a half-partnership with the West.' German-Soviet Relations

(Between the Two Wars, 1919-1939)

by

EDWARD HALLETT CARR

In the article "Germany and European Integration," on page 17, where the problem of German integration into Western Europe is analysed, we mentioned the fact that Allied policy-makers are deeply disturbed over the possibility of a Russo-German tie-up which could deal a fatal blow to the integration project. It does not require psychoanalysis to understand why such fears exist among western statesmen. They stem from the history of external relations of the real Germany which, like an iceberg, is two-thirds submerged. Beneath the surface lies the seemingly indestructible nature of Russo-German relations since the days of Bismarck and more specifically after World War I culminating in the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1939. It is primarily this part of the real Germany which haunts statesmen of the West.

Yet the character of these relations is not an unknown quantity. This is demonstrated in a brilliant study recently made by Professor Edward Hallett Carr, former Woodrow Wilson Professor at the University of Wales. Professor Carr is a careful scholar and respected historian. His recent work "German-Soviet Relations between the Two World Wars, 1919-1939," is a cogent example of his scholarship and his objective treatment of this crucial subject. One cannot help but conclude that Professor Carr, through his analysis of German-Soviet relations has succeeded in illuminating a decisive factor which always determined Germany's relations with the West. Professor Carr's work is based on authentic sources and is well documented. It penetrates the inner depths of Germany's dealings with the Soviet regime since 1917. We use the word "dealings" advisedly because Germany's basic relations with the Soviets were not guided by considerations of short-term expediency; rather, as Professor Carr notes, they were rooted in the whole past of the real Germany since the days of Frederick the Great of Prussia.

What are the fundamental conditions which explain this relationship? In the first place, there is the geographical factor, namely: that Germany has always been Russia's most powerful neighbor and vice versa. Economically, German industry in the modern era has always regarded the vast expanses of the Russian hinterland and Russian man-power as natural adjuncts to the development of German power and influence throughout the Eurasian land mass. Finally, the political and military interests of Russia and Germany, although not always identical, have over long periods of time run parallel with each other, crystallizing in alliances aimed at protecting and extending their mutual interests. Consequently, even when the Bolshevik revolution broke out in 1917, we find that Germans of all political persuasions were most interested in this history making event. Professor Carr quotes a contemporary British report in Berlin in the summer of 1919 which sums up the feelings of many Germans:

> "All classes in Germany are looking toward Russia for one reason or another. The extremists of the Left look upon her as the realization of their own political ideals; the pan-Germans look upon her as providing the only possible outlet for surplus population and compensation for the loss of colonies. Officers think that she may provide employment, which is no longer possible in their own country. Industrialists think that she will provide employment for capital and ultimately be the means of paying off the war indemnity. The realization of these ideas, however, lies in the far future, and, for the present, communication is much too difficult to make any practical steps possible."

This does not infer that all Germans were supporters of the Bolshevik régime, but it did mean that important German elements, be they military, political or economic, were interested in cultivating a powerful bond of friendship with Russia despite ideological differences.

Militaristic Concepts

As early as 1919, one of the leaders of the German High Command, General von der Goltz, declared that, while he was ready to overthrow the Communist régime in Russia, nevertheless Germany's "whole policy stands and falls by the Russian-German bridge." Prof. Carr quotes one of von der Goltz' subordinates of accusing the British of trying to "steal from Germany the opportunity of having before long a great and powerful ally—Russia."

Gen. von der Goltz was not alone in his view on the importance of maintaining and strengthening Russo-German relations. Indeed, it was shared by some of the key members of the German General Staff, including Gen. Hans von Seeckt, who played a leading role in the rebuilding of the German Wehrmacht.

Regardless of the ideological struggles between the German Right and the Russian Left after 1917, the belief in the necessity for developing friendship between Russia and Germany had a great bearing on subsequent actions by both States.

It is true that the German military hated the Bolsheviks and desired their overthrow, just as it is valid that the Bolsheviks were working for a Communist revolution within Germany but, when both sides failed to achieve these objectives, they did not tarry very long in adopting realistic policies toward each other. Indeed, General von Reibnitz, a former associate of Gen. von Ludendorff, known for his rabidly anti-Communist views, began to propound the thesis that the Germans should ally themselves with revolutionary Russia.

Karl Radek, then a leading theoretician of the Russian Communist Party, speaking in rather contemptuous terms, described von Reibnitz as "the first representative of the species known as 'national Bolsheviks' with whom I had to deal." This is not to say, as Prof. Carr points out, that Germany's orientation was completely turned toward the East. There were many powerful groups, including the Social Democrats, who were most anxious to cultivate friendship with the Western Allies. "It was a topsy-turvy world," Prof. Carr observes, "in which the German Right toyed with Bolshevism and world revolution, and German Social Democrats looked for salvation to American capitalism." In this statement Prof. Carr neatly describes the real Germany which has always managed to divide its labors in cultivating friendship both East and West so as to extract a maximum advantage from both.

Western Blindness

Many Western statesmen refused to believe that the German Right would think of flirting and working with the Russian revolutionaries but, as Prof. Carr proves, the Western camp persistently over-estimated the importance of ideological differences in trying to appraise the character and significance of Russo-German relations. On the surface there was much friction between the Soviets and the Germans in the early 1920's, yet neither State went overboard, for both sides knew that each had more to gain from each other through peaceful relations than through opposing policies.

Prof. Carr quotes Lenin on this subject:

> ". . . When the Russian armies were approaching Warsaw, all Germany was in a ferment. Alliance with Russia for a country which is strangled, which has the possibility to set in motion gigantic productive forces—all this helped to create political confusion in Germany; the German black hundreds were marching in sympathy with the Russian Bolsheviks and the Spartakists. . . .
> "Our foreign policy, so long as we are alone and the capitalist world is strong . . . consists in our being obliged to utilize disagreements. . . ."

Lenin's realism was well appreciated by the Germans as later events bore out. Thus, by the middle 1920's the realization by the Bolsheviks that they could not communize Germany, and by the Germans that they could not overthrow the Bolshevik régime, prepared the groundwork for a new relationship which decisively influenced Germany's conduct in the West up to the advent of Adolf Hitler. The German Government and Soviet Russia began negotiations not only to settle their differences but, more important, to combine their mutual interests. These negotiations were of a many-sided character. They not only involved the development of Germany's military potential on Russian soil in violation of the Versailles Treaty, but they also provided for close economic cooperation.

As early as the winter of 1921-22, economic negotiations were proceeding between German industrialists and Soviet authorities for the development of trade and the granting of concessions. One result was the establishment of German-Soviet mixed companies for transport, air-traffic and trade in scrap metal. This was only the beginning and to the industrialists of the Ruhr these negotiations had great promise for the future.

The Ruhr magnates, while pretending to see eye to eye with the West, were leaving no stone unturned to establish this stranglehold over the markets in Russia to the exclusion of the Allied Powers. The immediate results of these policies became evident in the trade statistics. Germany's share of Soviet imports rose from 25% in 1921 to 32.7% in 1922. On the other hand, Great Britain's share of the Soviet market was reduced to 18.8%. In this connection, Prof. Carr states: "throughout the 1920's it was Russian orders that helped to keep German heavy industry alive."

The German Government was actively engaged in furthering these economic and military negotiations and helped to subsidize Ruhr industrialists, who were doing business with the Russians. These military and economic deals were the precursor to the Treaty of Rapallo in April 1922. The West was shocked when the Treaty was signed and made public. Western diplomats could not conceive of a responsible German Government willing to extend the hand of friendship to the Soviets. But the Germans realized full well the value of Rapallo, and so did the Russians. Though the Russians regarded the Treaty as the means whereby Germany could serve as a "counterweight" to the Western Allies, the Germans were now in the position to

> "maneuvre freely between east and west, playing off the two rivals against one another, disclaiming any firm or irrevocable commitment to either, extorting concessions from the one by threatening to fall into the arms of the other, and always keeping its own choice open. This was the policy which was to serve Germany in good stead for the next seven years."

Prof. Carr is careful to note that this is only part of the story. Bearing in mind that the Germans were economically impoverished immediately after the end of the war, it was anticipated that they would seek economic assistance from the West. Thus, the armament-maker Krupp managed to have one of his henchmen appointed Ambassador to Washington in 1921 and soon thereafter American loans poured into Germany by the hundreds of millions. The German appeal for economic assistance created illusions among Western statesmen. They believed that through these loans they could influence Germany's relations with the East. They forgot, as Prof. Carr observes, that:

> "German dependence on the West did not, however, preclude dependence on the East. German industry, and particularly heavy industry, which was its core and centre, found its natural and only available outlet in the East—the more so since its subsidiary oversea markets had been captured by the Allies. Nor was the other major force in the formulation of German policy, the German army, prepared for any permanent arrangement which made Germany turn her back on the East to become a junior partner in a western alliance. The army had suffered defeat at the hands of the West, and its honor required that that defeat should be avenged. On this point all thought alike."

The Legend of Stresemann

It remained for Gustaf Stresemann, Germany's politician par excellence of the 1920's, to devise the ways and means whereby Germany could carry water on both shoulders. Prof. Carr's characterization of Stresemann is well worth quoting, at least in part:

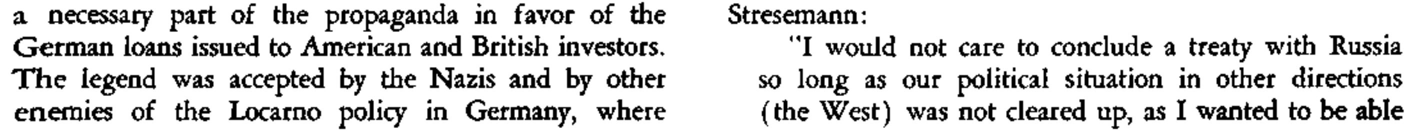
> "The legend of Stresemann as the man of Locarno, the man who set German policy on the path of fulfillment of the Versailles treaty and of a western orientation, was originally built up in the West, and was a necessary part of the propaganda in favor of the German loans issued to American and British investors. The legend was accepted by the Nazis and by other enemies of the Locarno policy in Germany, where Stresemann's memory was subjected after 1933 to every kind of vituperation and contempt. During the second world war the wheel turned, and Stresemann was bitterly assailed both from the Soviet and from the western side by writers who depicted him as a monster of duplicity, an extreme German nationalist and a precursor of the Nazis themselves. Both pictures are wide of the mark. Stresemann was a German patriot who valued the western connexion, the League of Nations and Locarno not for any sentimental or ideological reason, but for the advantages which they brought to his country; for the same reason he valued the eastern connexion, however little he, in common with most German industrialists, appreciated the theory or practice of the Bolsheviks. He exercised a great economy of truth when he repeatedly assured the Allies that Germany was loyally carrying out her obligations under the disarmament clauses of the Versailles treaty. But it is customary for foreign ministers to deny all knowledge of the secret operations of other departments—or even of their own; and it would be unfair to attribute these official deceptions to any personal idiosyncracy in Stresemann's character. Few statesmen fail in an emergency to recognize a duty to lie for their country."

The Eternal East-West Game

Stresemann's policy, therefore, was one which was designed to extract concessions from the East and the West, without upsetting Germany's friendly relations in both camps. Stresemann's tactics are described by Prof. Carr in connection with Germany's negotiations with the Western Allies (the Treaty of Locarno). Through the Treaty, Germany received the opportunity to regain her former dominating position in the West and pave the way for an outpouring of allied loans to build up and modernize German heavy industry. When the Russians learned of the intention of the Germans to make this Treaty, they accused the German Government of bad faith. Many leading German diplomats were disturbed over the dangers to Russo-German relations. The Russians insisted on new negotiations to strengthen the Treaty of Rapallo. This, they declared, would assure them that the Germans would not double-cross their eastern partners at Locarno. Herr Stresemann did not object to new Russian-German negotiations but pleaded for a postponement until he could effectively deal with the West. Prof. Carr quotes Stresemann:

> "I would not care to conclude a treaty with Russia so long as our political situation in other directions (the West) was not cleared up, as I wanted to be able to answer the question whether we had a treaty with Russia in the negative."

In other words, Herr Stresemann was admitting that his real aim was to deceive the West. Thus the Treaty of Locarno was consummated but, in accordance with Stresemann's strategy, a new Russo-German treaty was signed



A WEST GERMAN VIEW OF THE SOVIET UNIFICATION PLAN (Frankfurter Rundschau, Frankfurt) on April 4, 1926, which further strengthened the Treaty of Rapallo. Prof. Carr sums up the Stresemann policy as follows:

> "The reality behind Locarno was Germany's financial dependence on the West, and especially on the United States; the reality behind the Berlin treaty was Germany's military dependence on Soviet Russia, expressed in the secret agreements for the manufacture of munitions for Germany, and the training of German officers in prohibited weapons, on Russian soil."

Prof. Carr notes that the Stresemann policy persisted after his death and indeed many important groups during the early days of the Nazi dictatorship were unsympathetic with Hitler's anti-Bolshevik crusade. Against this background the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1939 was not the result of some psychological twist in the mind of Hitler; it was a reflection of a fundamental element in Germany's external relations for decades.

Certain events which have taken place recently give added weight to Prof. Carr's analysis. Recently Pastor Niemoller, an ardent German nationalist, visited Moscow on a mission designed to strengthen relations between the Soviets and the Germans. Mr. R. H. Crossman, British M. P., recently told the House of Commons that "there is no doubt about it that there is a great knowledge of what is going on in both parts of Germany owing to the fact that the German generals on both sides exchange information." Earlier than these reports is one by Walter Lippmann in his column of March 15, 1949, in which he reported that secret Russo-German talks were taking place. Some of the Germans he mentioned are well-known Rightists. It is these current signs which give meaning to Prof. Carr's careful study of Russo-German relations prior to World War II.

(German-Soviet Relations, by Edward Hallett Carr The Johns Hopkins Press, 1951)

"And in West Germany even the American High Commissioner John J. McCloy says that most of the democratic parties and even some Cabinet Ministers have been promoting nationalism. Since the neo-Nazis are effectively trying to 'discredit and destroy Parliamentary democracy,' the prospect is not pretty. Surely America has not been working for the last three or four years to let the good Europeans hear the jackboots of the old German militarism crunch into the old bloody muck the hope for 'a new era of life in the West.' "

(Percy Winner in The New Republic)

..."It is not surprising that American policy ... is often based on a misjudgment of German sentiments, and later turns out to be rickety and in constant danger of collapse. The policy is too often shaped by the dreams and hopes of the Allies alone."

(Edwin Hartrich in the Wall Street Journal)

JUST THE BEGINNING

..."The Moscow economic conference which ended April 12, is just the beginning. Observers who tended to pooh-pooh the conference as just another passing propaganda fair are now revising their estimates ...

"The possibilities for political mischief in West Germany are even greater. The Moscow offers to German businessmen and the Soviet maneuvers on German unification are supposed to supplement each other.

"The 2 or so West Germans who attended the Moscow parley weren't leading industrialists. But that doesn't change the fact that no country in the world longs more for Eastern trade than the Bonn republic. And precisely because West Germany's recovery has been so rapid, fear that an international trade slump might reverse the trend causes German businessmen to tremble in their boots."

Resurgam

"Let France be warned—her fate has been decided,
Bound to the Germans, alike in peace and war—
French opposition is dangerously misguided
German revival the world shall not ignore . . ."
We have heard that before.

"Bonn will endure no checks or prohibitions,
Bonn has a price for seeing Europe through,
Bonn has no more territorial ambitions
After uniting the Fatherland anew . . ."
That sounds familiar too.

"France must erase all propagandist slanders.
Were Germans Nazis?—
The Reich has changed since then!
Germans will sit with Europe's high commanders, Bonn's Wehrmacht Generals are honourable men . . ."
Must we hear that again?

"Bonn's inequality will not be tolerated;
France unsupported will never save her skin.
German pretensions are not to be debated,
Germany's patience will soon be wearing thin . . ."
This is where we came in.

"Let France beware—the victor must surrender—
Bonn holds the whip-hand,
plays the master-stroke.
Germany arises, Democracy's defender!
Germany is marching! One Fatherland!
One Folk! . . ."
So Hitler Spoke!

The Schuman Plan In Perspective

Speaking recently to the Anglo-American Press Club, M. Grandval, the French Ambassador to the Saar . . . sugested that if the Saar became "economically bound to Germany" France might not be able to stay in the European Coal and Steel Community. M. Schuman expressed substantially the same thought, it appears, to the Foreign Affairs Commission of the French National Assembly last January. Why this ominous confession? Because the French calculate that with the Saar's coalmines and steel foundries leased to France for fifty years (as now) the French possess 34 per cent of the industrial strength of the Community to Germany's 35 per cent. If the Saar were reattached to Germany, the Federal Republic would have 42 per cent of the Community's coal and steel; France would have 27 per cent. That, the French claim, would be a "dangerous unbalance" of power. . . .

When the French Assembly ratified the Schuman Treaty it specifically "recommended" that the Government should look to maintaining its heavy investment programmes in coal and steel. Armed with their fiat the industrialists and planners were talking lately of a capacity of seventeen to eighteen million tons of steel by 1958. (Excluding the Saar. In 1951 French capacity was about 11.5 million tons; production, hampered by coke and scrap shortages, amounted to 9.8 million tons.) This is obviously a huge increase and the target is probably somewhat optimistic. The cuts in investment credits that are bound to come with rearmament this year and next do not make it look any closer. But if the French are determined to carry it out they could manage it. They have drawn up the necessary parallel plans for expanding the production of coal and coke, especially in Lorraine, where both coal and iron ore are plentiful and easy to mine.

In that spirit the most important target, that for the produciton of coke (which is essential for making steel but in short supply), has been raised from three million tons by 1958 to seven million tons by the same year. That again is a large extension of range. Yet the most significant fact is that at the higher rate of steel output the French would need just as much coke from the Ruhr as they now need when producing their ten million odd tons (of steel). For the foreseeable future, then, the French depend on the Ruhr for the coke that will permit their foundries to compete with those of the Ruhr. The Ruhr's need of "minette" ore from Lorraine which, it is sometimes implied, would balance the account is nothing like so imperative. The clash of interests needs no elaborating. It is the same which has made the International Ruhr Authority which fixes Germany's coal exports under the Occupation regime so unpopular. The difference is that under the Schuman Plan Germany's neighbours will no longer be able to impose their will.

The problem would be partly solved if the Ruhr were to produce much more coal and with it, coke. The Federal Government's negotiators during the Paris talks on the plan did suggest that the Ruhr could produce fifty million tons more coal in 1954 than it did in 1951 (about 116 million tons). But the coal industrialists consider this a "fantasy." Some of their contempt can be discounted. They have various interests of their own for not wishing to see production rise fast. Yet it seems to be true that the coke which Germany's neighbours want would be hard to obtain without heavy capital expenditure. Now in a period of rearmament the outlets for steel may be ample, but the capital to help expansion and satisfy it over an extended period is not. Accordingly some Germans argue already that it would be more economical to invest most of the money directly in German steel. The French and Belgians could hardly agree; their interest is to see more coal and coke coming out of Germany. . . .

What influence will "the Ruhr," as such, have in the Coal and Steel Community? So far the Federal German Government has not paid too much attention to the Ruhr industrialists. The Allies have been busy "deconcentrating" and "decartelising" the coal and steel and chemical combines. Nevertheless when the political considerations that ruled when the plan was being worked out give way to the more mercenary, daily activity of the community it is hard to think their strength will not grow.

Unfortunately, the centralized organization of the Ruhr will probably not be truly broken by the Allied reshaping now in progress. . . .

More generally, it now seems probable that the real ownership of assets in the Ruhr combines is a mystery that no mere ally will ever quite uncover. It is, an expert has suggested, a job that would need "ten years," with all the tangle to be unravelled of holding companies and sleeping partners who may, or may not, but probably do, represent the old barons of the Ruhr. The Allies will probably only have till the end of the year in which to complete a hasty simulacrum of redistributing these assets. So the new "deconcentrated" steel and coal units may very well go back, in some cases at least, to the very gentlemen who were, through the reorganization, to be deprived of their former power.

The Ruhr's political strength should not be exaggerated. When the Allies leave, it will certainly be much less centralized than it used to be. The steel companies, for instance, will own only 17 per cent of the coalmines in the Ruhr whereas they used to own 60 per cent. But the Ruhr will, it seems, remain enough of a unit still to be able to organize as a major pressure group both within Germany, of course, and in the Coal and Steel Community.

Will the High Authority be able to pursue, or permit a sane investment policy without being continually hampered by political chicanery? That is probably the heart of the matter for the Coal and Steel Community.

Not all Ruhr industrialists and officials are as naïve as the bureaucrat of the Steel Trustee Association in Essen who cursed the day when that "very adequate instrument" the prewar cartel was sacrificed to the whims of trust-busters and European planners. But few of them like the Schuman Plan. Last year their review, "Bulwark," carried on a campaign to prove that it was the natural successor of the Occupation Statute, both having one aim: to keep down German production.

Thus the Principal of the Institute for World Economics of Kiel University, Dr. Fritz Baade, in June, 1951, explained that the Schuman Plan was a single market only in "a purely political usage of the term. This political market is to be unified and rendered uniform in such a way that we should for ever be compelled to deliver coal to France at the same prices as those" demanded of German consumers. This would lead to "a never-ending spiral of rising costs, prices, and wages." (How, Dr. Baade did not explain.)

Dr. Baade complained, above all, of the effect on investments. For five years Germany's neighbours had been investing while Germany, the best natural market for capital, could not.

> "If the European steel industry is to recover from these five wasted years, German industry must be afforded priority for five years to come."

Germany should by "right" produce 60 per cent of Europe's coal and 55 per cent of her steel (against 48 and 35 per cent to-day). But in the High Authority of the Schuman Plan

> "Germany will have only two of the nine votes. I cannot see how these two representatives will find themselves in a position to combat all the aims at supremacy concealed behind nicely worded clauses."

Even Dr. Baade's colleagues hardly fear French "aims at supremacy." In fact, though they do not advertise it, they are justifiably confident of their power in the new alliance. No wonder. Though German steel production is still limited by the Allies, it is now running at a rate of 15 million tons a year, well above the combined total of France and the Saar. As soon as the contractual agreement is signed the Germans calculate they could, with relatively light investments, restore old capacity to the tune of two million tons. Another, equal, amount could be added by heavier investments in two of the biggest former plants—here again relatively cheaply. Germany's steel capacity would then stand at over 19 million tons, not far short of what Hitler's Reich was producing in 1938.

So much the less, one might think, for the French. French tactics, particularly in the Saar, argue some anxiety on the point. But it seems doubtful that much French investment will actually be prevented. For one thing, there are considerable opportunities for expansion in Lorraine, the heart of the steel industry. If the coking programme develops (much depends on that) it will be the only steel region in the world which gets both its main raw materials, iron ore and coke, from its own soil. That is a tremendous advantage. All the more so since the Lorraine coalmines are far easier to work than those of the Ruhr.

The second reason is, however, the most important—and it seems to answer both the German and the French complaints. The High Authority will, in fact, have very limited powers to restrict investment; its resources, largely based on its revenues from a levy of 1 per cent on coal and steel, will be mainly devoted to encouraging capital expenditure by guaranteeing loans.

This, at least, is the French interpretation. Though Article 4 of the Schuman treaty states that "subsidies or State assistance" are "incompatible" with the Community, "public financing" will not apparently be prevented unless the terms of the loans raised "are different from the conditions normally imposed in similar circumstances for similar industries." As the expert who propounded this view pointed to loans to the nationalised railways as comparable loans the argument seems to lend itself to elastic interpretations. But as all parties depend largely on public financing none is likely to object. Since, too, the High Authority can only object to investment on the grounds of the "discriminatory" financing involved it hardly seems that German plans, or most of them, could be restrained. On the contrary. There seems to be reason to expect something like an investments race in the early stages of the Schuman Plan inspired by national fears of being left behind. The end of double-pricing, affecting, in particular, German coal exported abroad, and the ample market afforded by rearmament should accentuate the expansionary tendency.

Europe needs to increase her industrial power. In theory, then, the growth of steel and coal production is proper. The danger is that it is likely to be hypertrophied in relation to the activity of the rest of Western Europe's economy with the usual bad effects that uncertain demand and threats of recession produce. Already in 1950 the Economic Commission for Europe was reporting that there might be a slump in steel, a menace averted by a larger one, the Korean war. Even to-day the French are noting a hardening of the export market for their steel. Without "single markets" among the consumers of steel in Western Europe the producers of steel must move warily. And those "single markets" are remote.

A second danger, at least from the French point of view, is that Germany is better equipped for an investments race than France. In a slump too the Germans would probably try, and with their generally lower costs be able, to sell more than the "depression quota" fixed by the High Authority. By flouting it they could further depress their French rivals. It would be a simple repetition of their tactics during the thirties in the pre-war cartel.

Since the Germans are likely in the long run to have the better of the game it is, in fact, the ebb and flow of German ambition and of French fear that is the basic weakness of the Schuman Plan. . . .

GERMAN GRATITUDE

"A series of articles in one of the most widely circulated weekly picture magazines here contains charges that the Western Allies purposely starved the Germans immediately after the war, that they stole their patents, refused to permit them export possibilities and, after dismissing a German official who complained, tried to frame him as a black marketeer.

"The articles, in Quick, which has no connection with the American magazine of the same name, revolve around the dismissal, in January, 1948, of Dr. Johannes Semler from his post as economics director in the bizonal Economics Administration, which was the German administrative agency in the United States and British zones.

"Dr. Semler is now a prominent member of the Bundestag, representing Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's Christian Democrats. The articles praise Dr. Semler as a man who courageously stood up to the Allied officials . . .

"The writer of the article quotes Dr. Semler as saying, at a time when the United States was pouring millions of dollars worth of food into Germany, that 'this catastrophe is simply the natural consequence of the unbelievably frivolous decisions of Yalta and Teheran, to rob the Germans of their granaries in the East and drive twelve million mouths to feed into the West! A consequence of senseless dismantling, the robbery of our patents, the prohibition of our export trade.'. . .

"In the speech at Erlangen that later caused his dismissal, Dr. Semler was quoted as having declared that it was the Allies' intention to starve the Germans and that they refused to permit the Germans to obtain food on their own."

The Mystery of the London Debt Conference

by
"ECONOMIST"

What is the mystery behind the London Debt Conference? Are American holders of German bonds getting ready to be burned again? These are fair questions to ask in the light of the statement made by J. G. Rogers, President of the Foreign Bondholders Protective Council (F. B. P. C.) on April 21, 1952, in his report dealing with the progress in the International Debt Conference in London. Mr. Rogers is apparently in a position to give hope to the holders of foreign bonds that the day is approaching when the German securities will again be traded and serviced. Mr. Rogers intimates that this happy event will take place shortly.

This is welcome news indeed for the long-suffering American holders of German bonds. But somehow we cannot help wondering whether these glad tidings are what they portend to be. Having studied the long and sordid history of the treatment meted out to American investors by the Germans; having seen the shabby record of some American bankers in the flotation of foreign bonds; and having studied the dubious role played by the American protectors of the bondholders, we cannot resist the temptation to take a good look at the record. Since Mr. Rogers is acting again as "spokesman" for the bondholders, the question is: whom is he protecting, the bondholders or the issuing houses? And who is going to pay the bill?

The Lending Spree

The story goes back 20 years, and 20 years is a long time for the American investors to recall. In 1932, Senator Hiram Johnson shocked the nation with his exposure of the business ethics of some American bankers. When the United States Senate Committee on Finance surveyed the famous prosperity of the 20's, it discovered that during the third decade of the century American institutions, trusts, estates and individuals purchased approximately 10½ billion dollars worth of foreign bonds. In those days, Germany was the favored recipient of the American bounty. German states, cities, industries participated heavily in this spree and their signatures were welcomed by the American investment fraternity. What is more, when the Germans themselves were not too eager to borrow money—that happened too, mirabile dictu—they were quickly brought to reason. American representatives were hired by the investment houses at handsome salaries to go to Germany to show the recalcitrant Germans that it was in their interest to borrow money. The loans were quickly absorbed in the American market. Nobody can tell what the total amount thus borrowed was, but it is known that during the Coolidge regime some five hundred million dollars was loaned to Germany in various short term credits. Over a billion and a half was loaned on long-term bonds. In those days, the American investor was told that Germany was an excellent risk. Then too, he was told that Germany was trustworthy since she was paying reparations for damages inflicted upon the victims of World War I.

They forgot to tell him that Germany was paying reparations at the rate of 1 dollar to every 1.84 borrowed from American and other countries.

In 1933, when Senator Johnson was through with the investigation of that spree, he was angry, to say the least, and his opinion of the perpetrators of this prodigality was expressed in the following words: "The record of the activities of investment bankers in the flotation of foreign securities is one of the most scandalous chapters in American banking. The sale of these foreign security issues was characterized by practices and abuses which were violative of the most elementary principals of business ethics."

When this postmortem was made, the American investors learned that 131 foreign bond issues were in default. The American bondholders were looking for help and protection in their efforts to recover their losses. The investment fraternity was ready—sorry, to be sure, for their past mistakes—but ready, nevertheless, to be of help. Numerous bondholders' protective committees sprang up and as soon as new defaults were announced, the bankers who had sold the defaulted bond issues to the public rushed in and captured the position of agent for the very people who so gullibly bought the bonds in the first place. The Banking Fraternity was only too glad, it seemed, to protect the interests of the innocent public. Little, however, did the holders realize that the bankers were out to make other profits out of them—by refunding the old loans. In any case, the activities on behalf of the bondholders put the investment bankers in a position to conceal their own responsibility.

The Bondholders' Protectors

The German short term loans are a typical case in point. During the depression, Germany defaulted the interests on her short-term loans. The Chase National Bank, one of the institutions heavily involved in floating these loans, felt it was its duty to fight for the interests of both the bondholders and bankers. It delegated Al Wiggin to go to Germany. Since the law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell had done most of the legal work in connection with the floating of these loans and knew all there was to be known about Germany, Wiggin took with him a representative of Sullivan & Cromwell. They arranged a Standstill Agreement under which Germany promised to make a small payment on the short-term credits. In this bargain, the Germans succeeded in cutting the interest rates. Soon after the Nazis came to power, they defaulted on the Standstill Agreement. Sullivan & Cromwell was ready to help for a fee. Again the firm sent a representative to Germany to bargain with the Nazis. The net result was that the interest payment on the German bonds was suspended and the bondholders got nothing.

This is one example of how the bankers and the house of Sullivan & Cromwell protected the interests of the bondholders. On the other hand, the bondholders were led to believe that their protectors did the best they could. But the bondholders were too busy worrying about the losses to realize what their protectors were doing. However, one bondholder found out:

In 1933, a certain Katherine Perry sued the North German Lloyd Company of New York to compel it to pay her the interest due on a one thousand dollar bond. The German shipping line resisted the claim vigorously on the ground that it was a German corporation subject only to German laws; that Germany had declared a moratorium on her debts, and that Germany was doing nothing more than our own Government was doing for the protection of debtors. These arguments came out of the fertile brains of Sullivan & Cromwell, as the attorneys for the German company. Thus, at the very same time that Sullivan & Cromwell took on the heavy burden of protecting the American bondholders against Germany, they turned around and protected the German debtor against the American investor! In other words, Mrs. Perry, an American holder of German bonds, did not know that the American bondholders hired a lawyer who was also paid by the opposing side.

These events are recalled here—not for the vicarious pleasure one derives from rattling skeletons in the neighbors' closets. Nor is it easy to bring in the name of such an illustrious house as Sullivan & Cromwell without trepidation. Was it not Mr. Dulles, the senior partner of Sullivan & Cromwell who stated in April 1952: "In human affairs the non-material or spiritual element is more important than the material. . . . There is a moral or natural law not made by men which determines right or wrong, and conformity with this law in the long run is indispensable to human welfare."

Precisely. These are lofty principles, indeed, and we gladly subscribe to them.

The firm of Sullivan & Cromwell is brought in here because it has been prominently connected with FBPC and with German loans. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose that it knows a thing or two about the mysteries surrounding the current London Debt Conference.

A Series of Mysteries

Mystery No. 1: The German Government has officially acknowledged the priority of its debts contracted in recent years for the purpose of rebuilding the German economy over the pre-war private debts. Prior to the opening of the London Conference, February 28, 1952, the United States Government announced that it was willing to forego this priority "to the extent necessary to insure the fair and methodical settlement of pre-war claims." Who was responsible for this decision? The State Department or the FBPC?

Mystery No. 2: On December 11, 1952, the U. S. Government announced that it was prepared to scale down its claim on the Federal Government for post-war assistance by 63 per cent, or a reduction of the debt from 3.2 million to 1.2 million. Did the State Department have the authority to do so under executive agreement?

Mystery No. 3: Since the effect of the proposed scaling down of the German public debt will be to enable some private creditors to benefit at the expense, not of the German Government, but of the American people, how much will Mr. Rogers' organization benefit from the deal?

Mystery No. 4: Is Mr. Rogers' really the spokesman for the American bondholders? Who elected him and when? Which bondholders does he represent?

Mystery No. 5: What is the connection between FBPC and the firm of Sullivan & Cromwell?

Mystery No. 6: Is the proposed settlement intended to create an atmosphere favorable to the flotation of new German bonds in this country? How much will the American investors have to lose again?

Mystery No. 7: How did the Government organization, which was supposed to be created under the Securities Act of 1933 (Title II) for the purpose of protecting, preserving and advancing the interests of the holders of foreign securities in default, become the FBPC, a private organization and a creature of Sullivan & Cromwell?

We shall attempt to solve Mystery No. 7 which, we believe, will go a long way towards understanding the mysteries surrounding the London Debt Conference. a public proclamation.

A New Government Agency

Senator Johnson's exposure of the unsavory practices of the investment fraternity shocked the people profoundly in 1933. To prevent further abuse, many bondholders demanded that the Government do away with the nefarious practices of the issuing houses. They clearly expressed their wishes not to be protected by the investment houses and told it to Congress in no uncertain terms.

Congress was shocked, too, and appropriate legislation was passed to create a Government agency to defend the interests of the people. This law goes under the name of "Securities Act of 1933, as amended—Title II, Corporation of For-

ANOTHER LORELEI?

(Cartoon by Marcus, Courtesy N. Y. Times) eign Bondholders." It was passed on May 8, 1933.

Under this Act, the control and management of the corporation was vested in a board of six directors to be appointed by the Federal Trade Commission. This agency was empowered to act on behalf of the bondholders, to make available all pertinent data to them in respect to all foreign securities, and to negotiate and carry out all the necessary claims for the resumption of payments on the securities in default. In return, the Bondholders were to deposit their securities with the agency.

As the new agency needed funds for its operations, the Act authorized it to borrow 75 thousand dollars from the RFC.

The framers of the law made it clear that the Act was intended for the protection, preservation and advancement of the holders of foreign securities only and that the new Agency was to have no connection with the houses of issue. The Act expressly stipulated that no banking house identified with the origination of a foreign issue was to have any direct or indirect connection with the organization created under government supervision.

Who Killed the Agency?

On the other hand, the houses of issue made no bones about their dislike for the new agency, said so and acted accordingly. Hardly was the ink of the Act dry, when the bondholders discovered that the banks had succeeded in inserting a most vicious joker into the Act. This was Section 211 which said that the Act shall not take effect until the President says that its taking effect is in the public interest and then he must do so by issuing

The investment houses had good friends in Congress, and the job proved quite easy. The first step was to insert the joker calling for a presidential proclamation. This they succeeded in easily. The next step was to convince the Executive Department that Title II was not necessary. Since the law placed the new agency under the FTC, the banking fraternity began looking for friends there. One of the commissioners of the FTC was Mr. Raymond Stevens who had been a former Congressman. (There was a strong possibility that Mr. Stevens used his influence with his friends in Congress to insert the joker mentioned above.) After the law was passed, Mr. Stevens was asked by a group who represented the investment houses known as the "Secret Six" "to study" the law. Mr. Stevens obliged, made a thorough study of it, consulted with various people in proper places, and duly arrived at the conclusion that it would be inadvisable to set up a Government organization to protect the bondholders. Instead, he thought a private organization could do a much better job.

Revealing Testimony

In plain English, Mr. Stevens, a public servant, paid by the people to carry out the people's laws, undertook at the taxpayers' expense to kill the law in order to benefit the issuing houses that did the people so much harm. During the hearings held by the S.E.C. November 16, 1935 (page 1210) Mr. Rublee testified to the following: "Early in August 1933, Mr. Stevens informed me that if an adequate private corporation could be set up, the President would not have to put into effect Title 11."

The following testimony is also revealing (page 1217) Q. Was Mr. Stevens the main spring of the group? A. (By Mr. Rublee) "He was the only one. We were just helping him."

Who is Mr. Rublee? Mr. Rublee is a member of the prominent law firm of Covington, Burling, Rublee, Acheson, Shorb, Washington, D. C. Mr. Acheson is now Secretary of State. From Mr. Rublee's testimony it appears that he was a member of an Organizing Committee in Wall Street set up by the Investment Houses in New York to thwart the implementation of Title 11. This organizing Committee was referred to as the "secret six." This committee was looking for prominent people who would appear very respectable and could prove to the White House that Title 11 was not necessary. The organizing Committee was also anxious to work closely with the State Department.

Mr. Rublee was very diligent in his effort. For in a letter addressed, in May 1933, to Mr. Cordell Hull by his economic advisor Herbert Feis, we read the following: "Mr. Rublee, who was one of the Committee and Mr. Dulles who was assisting the Committee reported to me yesterday that they could see the end of the road."

The SEC hearings, unfortunately, did not reveal all the underhanded activities of the organizing Committee that finally lead to the demise of Title 11. It is apparent, however, that Allen Dulles did more than merely give assistance to the "Secret Six," since it was his job to provide the legal and political arguments to prove that Title II was not necessary and that the bondholders could best be protected by a private organization sponsored by the issuing houses.

Lest there be any doubt about the character of the new organization which was planned to supercede Title 11, and which was viewed with favor by the State Department, page 1192 of the SEC hearings should dispel any doubt: "The men selected should have the confidence of the Houses of Issue and this should be ascertained before their appointment." (From a memo written by the Organizing Committee.)

By October 20, 1933, Messrs. Stevens, Rublee and Dulles effectively saw the "end of the road." On that date the White House issued a statement which read in part as follows: "The President, today, conferred with a group of business persons invited to Washington to discuss the creation of an organization for the protection of American holders of foreign securities. . . .

"This task is primarily for private initiative and interests . . . To be handled by the parties directly concerned . . .

"It was decided, therefore, to call together a small group to take upon themselves the patriotic duty of bringing into existence an adequate, effective, and disinterested organization to carry on the work."

To make their patriotic duty easier and beynod question, the White House statement added: "The Organization, when it comes into existence, is to be independent of any special interests; it is to have no connection of any kind with the Investment Banking Houses which originally issued the loans." (Italics supplied.)

Strange "Doings"

A few months later, on December 18, 1933, the Foreign Bondholders Protective Council was incorporated under the laws of Maryland as a non-profit Corporation, and Title 11 remained an unproclaimed law. The hearings of the SEC did not show how Senator Johnson took it nor what his reactions were.

Things began to happen soon after and everybody was happy—everybody that is, but the American bondholders. Although to the best of our knowledge, Mr. Stevens was not a bondholder, his financial situation improved immediately after the establishment of the F.B.P.C. He resigned from his job as Commissioner of the Federal Trade Commission, and became the first head of the new Organization at a yearly salary of $20,000, with a contract for three years regardless of how long he remained with the Organization. For reasons unknown to us, he resigned after six months and rejoined the F.T.C. His successor became J. Reuben Clark, former Ambassador to Mexico.

By a strange coincidence, the heads of the FBPC were former assistant Secretaries of State. For instance, J. R. Clark and Francis White, were both former Assistant Secretaries of State. The present head, James Grafton Rogers, who joined the Council in 1935 was also an Assistant Secretary of State. Does the presence of so many Assistant Secretaries of State indicate that the Council can speak for the State Department and yet claim it is independent and strictly a private corporation? Were these men selected because they were "patriotic and disinterested" in order to represent unofficially the views of the State Department? Were they intended to be used as a scape-goat by the State Department in case their ideas proved unpopular? Or were they selected because they could make "suggestions" such as the latest suggestion made by the State Department, prior to the London Conference, to reduce the German post-war debt by two billion dollars? We do not know the answer, but certainly there is room for speculation.

Apropriate and Disinterested Representatives?

On the very day the State of Maryland granted the charter of incorporation, December 18, 1933, the organizing committee of the FBPC issued a call for $100.00 for operating expenses to be collected from banks, bankers, and Houses of Issue, because, as the letter put it, "these parties will benefit most from its work." Ninety thousand dollars were thus collected the first year. Among these "disinterested" contributors were Dillon, Read, Kuhn Loeb, Chase National Bank, J. P. Morgan, National City Bank, each contributing $5,000. An additional $18,600 was contributed by the following: Bankers Trust Company, Halsey Stuart, Lee Higginson, J. W. Seligman, etc. (Be it recalled that the White House Statement said the Council will have nothing to do with the Houses of Issue.)

During the SEC investigation, Mr. Traphagen, a representative of a house of issue, and a prominent official of the Council, was asked the following question: "Do you think the Council or a body such as this can receive financial support and still be entirely independent?" Mr. Traphagen replied: "I am sure of it." In those days, lie detectors were unknown, so we cannot tell whether Mr. Traphagen blushed when he made the reply or not.

Germany a Disinterested and Patriotic Contributor?

Where did the FBPC get the rest of the money to carry on its work and to protect the American bondholders? Believe it or not, it got it from other "patriotic and disinterested" friends—the defaulting Governments, such as Germany, Brazil, Argentina, and the Dominican Republic. As the Dominican Republic put it: "it was glad to contribute a flat sum to cover expenses for the work of the Council." Thus, Germany, the country that treated the American bondholders so shabbily was only too glad to hire the collectors who tried to make her honor her obligations.

According to the evidence presented to the SEC, the FBPC received the following foreign contributions by December 11, 1936:

FROM:	Germany	$30,209
	Brazil	16,130
	Dominican Republic	$20,000
	Costa Rica	8,166
	Argentina	20,000

On the other hand, the FBPC annual

"A rearmed Germany, intriguing with East and West, playing for power and revenge, will become a new danger point in the international scene. A rearmed Germany, far from increasing the security and stability of the West, will become a new source of insecurity.

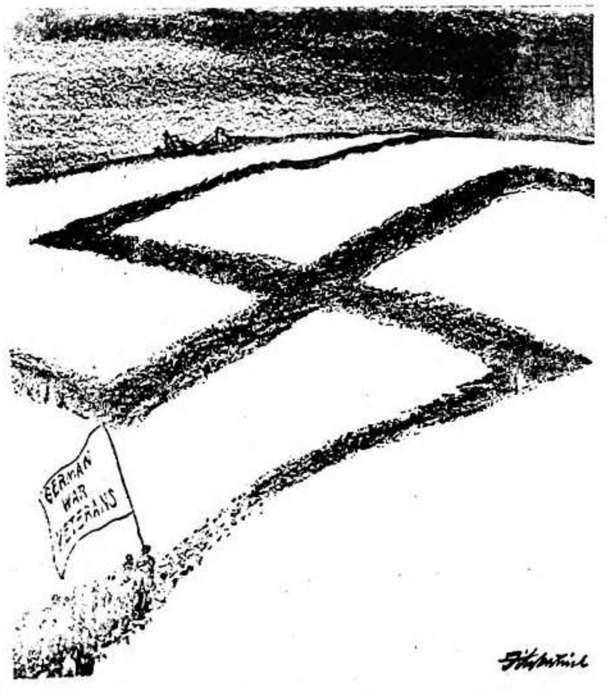
"This stupid plan has still to be endorsed by the Governments of the West. There is still time for public opinion to call a halt."

(The Reynolds News)

"The European Army Plan which the U. S. is now strongly pushing has split wide open every one of the five main countries concerned. Three of these governments—the French (chief sponsor of this 'Pleven Plan'), the West German, and the Italian—now feebly favor it, but face powerful domestic opposition. The Dutch and Belgian governments are at heart opposed. Nothing divides opinion more in these five countries than the feature which forms the major U. S. motive in backing the European army plan—the rearming of the Germans."

(Clarence K. Streit in "Freedom and Union")

SAME OLD TRAIL?



(Courtesy St. Louis Post-Dispatch)

report for 1937 lists the following contributions received from Germany as: "a direct outlay for negotiation expenses":

1934	1935	1936
$23,695.29	$223.24	$1.75

Were these German contributions in addition to those mentioned by the SEC?

In any case, it is obvious that Germany was the largest financial contributor to the FBPC. Logically, therefore, this German contribution would classify Dr. Schacht as one of those "patriotic and disinterested" parties referred to in the SEC hearings. At least this would make Schacht a friend of the American bondholders. Be it as it may, we are still searching for an answer to explain the Hitler Government's contribution to the FBPC. Knowing Hitler's generosity, we are inclined to believe that he must have had a good reason for doing it. Whatever the reason, the Nazi financial contribution to the Council was so resented that the FBPC was most severely criticized in many quarters. The general criticism was that the Council cannot possibly defend the bondholders visa-vis the foreign governments and take payment from these governments at the same time.

Other criticisms levelled against the Council were that:

1. It has usurped the functions of a legitimate Government Agency as contemplated under Title 11 of the Securities Act of 1933.
2. It has violated its own pledges not to have anything to do with the Houses of Issue that did the American bondholders so much harm.

The Dubious Role of the FBPC

Since the American holders of the German bonds are vitally concerned in the outcome of the London meeting and since the FBPC is again protecting their interests, we must now take up the record of these German loans. Shortly after its founding, the FBPC entered into negotiations with the German Government to resume the servicing of $640,000,000 floated in the United States in the '20's. The interests on these loans were in default. The negotiations lasted a considerable time, but proved fruitless. In 1935, the German Government made an offer to pay the arrears at the rate of 40 cents on the dollar. Common sense would have dictated that the FBPC accept the offer. It did not do so. Shortly thereafter the Hitler Government withdrew the offer and, instead, offered a refunding of the debt by issuing 65 million dollars in bonds in lieu of the past interest on the $640,000,000 in securities held by bondholders.

At the same time, an identical offer was made by the German Government to the Swedish, British, and Swiss holders, with one significant difference: Whereas the non-American holders were given a four per cent interest, the American holders had to accept three per cent. The FBPC cogitated for quite a while and finally urged the bondholders to accept the German terms. True, the Council did pay its respect to virtue by telling the public that it did not like the deal, but urged acceptance nevertheless.

When the terms of the new refunding issues were made public in March, 1937, the press condemned the Council for its activities and accused it of siding with the Germans against the interests of the American bondholders. The question asked was this: Did German financial support of the Council have anything to do with the Council's approval of the raw deal?

According to its own laws, the 65 million dollars refunding issue had to be approved by the SEC. Before obtaining the SEC permission to float the new issue, the Germans had to make a registration application giving all pertinent data regarding Germany's indebtedness. The total indebtedness declared on the registration application by Dr. Schacht was $11,620,000,000 M. Actually Germany's indebtedness at that time was between twenty to twenty-five billion M. This was common knowledge in both Germany and the United States. The German Government, therefore, deliberately lied in its registration application. The American investment fraternity knew that the registration application was fraudulent, but did not care, since the new refunding issue of 1937 netted the issuing houses a profit of $1,031,250. The standard fee for floating such an issue at that time was $650,000. Since the investment fraternity made a handsome profit and since it was interested in enhancing Germany's credit in the United States, it was naturally in favor of the deal. The SEC was fully cognizant of this fraud perpetrated upon the American public, but accepted the German false statement and approved the deal.

American Investors Taken for a Ride

What the American press thought of this deal can best be summarized by quoting from an article of the New York Post on March 9, 1937. The article was entitled: "American Investor taken for a Ride." The opening paragraph read: "Would you care to have a lawyer who was paid by the other side? Must the interests of American investors in German bonds be left in the hands of a group who receives pay and monetary favors from the German government?" The article concluded by asking for a congressional investigation of both the SEC and the FBPC.

The law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell was in favor of approving the deal. The question arises: Did the fact that Sullivan and Cromwell received $30,000 from the German government in compensation for its labor to make the 1937 refunding issue a success have something to do with the SEC approval of a fraudulent registration? At any rate, the Washington Merry-Go-Round reported, February 17, 1937, that Sullivan and Cromwell were waging an undercover battle with the SEC to force the latter to approve the refunding issue of 1937.

The New York Post of March 9, 1937, asked this question: "Was pressure brought to bear on SEC by Sullivan and Cromwell to permit the registration of the Issue?" Many questions propounded by the New York Post have never received an answer. Inquiries made in Wall Street, however, elicited a curt reply: the FBPC is a creature of the House of Sullivan and Cromwell; and since the latter's name occurred frequently during the hearing held by the SEC in the thirties, the role that this law firm played in the Chilean loan may provide an answer as to what the American bondholders could expect from both Sullivan & Cromwell and the FBPC.

Ethics Are Elastic

During the lending spree in the 20's, Chile floated in the United States loans amounting to $262,163,000. The attorneys who did the legal work for the Issuing Houses and who put in all the protective clauses in the loan contracts were Sullivan and Cromwell. These loans, too, were in default. At the end of 1934, Chile passed unilateral legislation-decree law 5580—and drastically revised the terms of the loan contract. When the decree was made public, the American bondholders discovered that Chile offered to pay 13 per cent of the original value of the loan. The lawyers who acted for the Chilean Government were again Sullivan and Cromwell.

As regards the dual role played by Sullivan and Cromwell, the criticism voiced by the SEC read: "The inequitable character of the plan did not deter Sullivan and Cromwell from accepting the employment of the Chilean Government in connection with matters arising under law 5580. The firm had acted as counsel to Houses of Issue of the underwriting of the bonds effected by the law. The firm had allowed its name to appear on many of the circulars offering the bonds for sale; and it is reasonable to suppose that its name carried weight with many prospective investors. Nevertheless, it sold its services as Counsel for the Chilean Government in connection with its unilateral plan."

Did Mr. Dulles challenge this scathing indictment of the SEC? No, he stoutly defended his firm's activities while admitting "that it would be improper for a law firm that had drafted a loan contract to represent the Government in repudiating or attacking the validity of a provision in that agreement or in arguing an interpretation of that agreement that would narrow the rights of the bondholders beyond those intended to be granted." (P. 478 SEC report, 1937).

A Pertinent Question

We come now to the final query: Who is responsible for the decision made prior to the London meeting to reduce the German post-war debts by two billion dollars, the effect of which will be to favor the private bondholders i.e. the FBPC. In the course of the SEC investigation, the FBPC was frequently referred to as a quasi-governmental agency, semi-official agency, etc. The best description of the character of the FBPC, however, was given by the late J. Reuben Clark, its former head, who described the activities of his organization in the following words: "The FBPC could relieve the Department of State of burdens and responsibilities, which often-times come at inconvenient periods when the national interests prevent the exercise of a legitimate interest and influence in behalf of such bondholders."

Elsewhere in his testimony, Mr. Clark was asked a question regarding his negotiations of the Brazilian loan. The question was: "Mr. Clark, did the Department of State request the Council to negotiate with Brazil with regard to the dollar bonds under the Niemeyer plan?" Mr. Clark: "I think I might answer the question 'yes.'" From this the inference is clear that the relations between the FBPC and the State Department are extremely close.

FBPC fees for negotiating a loan is $1.25 per thousand dollar bond. The total amount of private debts involved at the London Conference is over $1,500,000-000. Should a settlement be arrived at, the FBPC stands to realize over a million in fees. The American taxpayers will lose two billion dollars. Did the FBPC have anything to do with the State Department's suggestion to scale down two billion dollars and to relinquish the priority of the German post-war debts in favor of the pre-war private debts?

"The personal attitudes of leading Americans over here, from General Eisenhower through Ambassadors Draper, Murphy and Dunn to much smaller fry, suggest to the Europeans that, quite apart from present military exigencies, the Americans tend to be pro-German. Even those European professionals of power politics and history, who can understand the Machiavellianism of Talleyrand and Metternich, are rather alarmed by American affection for Bismarck, coupled with a professedly moralistic interpretation of history."

(Percy Winner in The New Republic)

"After having asked the Germans to form a defense of Western Europe, the next and logical step will be to ask them to produce the sinews of war. The Ruhr, the greatest and most highly organized industrial complexus of Europe, is ideally fitted for this task. But will the Germans co-operate?"

(Edwin Hartrich in the New York Herald Tribune)

"'We are less concerned about the German will to fight than about the danger that they will run away with the show,' said a top U. S. official in Germany. 'Our problem will be to hold them back, to prevent them from jumping the gun and dragging us all into war.'"

Inside Germany

BEGINNING TO ROLL

"German autos roll into foreign countries in greater quantities.

"Germany's fast-rising steel output helped the country's car makers turn out 372,080 vehicles last year, 22% more than in 1950. Exports rose still more steeply —a sharp 50% over the 83,000 of 1950. Best customers were Sweden and Belgium. They took almost a third of the 120,000 cars exported last year."

GERMAN COOPERATION

"Authoritative sources reported today that four West German industrialists were arrested near Essen last Sunday and accused of betraying to Russia secret information on Western arms production in the Ruhr...

"All were described as 'leading officials of West German industrial enterprises.'"

THE DIPLOMATIC TOUCH

"All German diplomats abroad were informed of Hitler's plans for the mass extermination of European Jews before they were carried out, it was revealed here by Dr. Paul Schmidt, former press chief of the Nazi Foreign Ministry.

"Testifying as a defense witness for Franz Rademacher, former Foreign Ministry counsellor charged with complicity in the mass deportation of Jews and in the annihilation of 1,500 Jews in Belgrade, Dr. Schmidt said that the infamous Wannsee Protocol of January, 1942, to 'achieve a final solution of the Jewish question' by forced labor and 'special treatment' was circulated through the Foreign Office to all German diplomats."

WHAT'S AHEAD?

"... developments at home and abroad make West German businessmen wonder what's ahead. All over the country they talk wistfully of their lost markets in the East...

"West German businessmen generally have little confidence that they can find adequate outlets in the Western world...

"Even if the dollar balance is righted, West Germans still have the problem of finding a total market big enough to keep industry busy. The structure of the German economy is right back to the pre-war pattern —the same concentration of metalworking industries, the same low wages, the same lack of mass consumption at home. That means the pressure to export will soon be as strong as pre-war, perhaps stronger..."

(From a report in the Business Week)

A NEW WORKSHOP

"East Germany is fast becoming the chief workshop of the Russian satellites in East Europe.

"Speeches by Walter Ulbricht, economic czar of East Germany, and his chief lieutenant, Heinrich Rau, have indicated that by the end of the present five year plan in 1955 East Germany's productivity, doubled and in some cases trebled, will feed heavy industrial and machine goods into the economies of Russia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and China."

THE "INTERNATIONAL"

Patron is the air ace Hans Ulrich Rudel, former Colonel of the Air Force who will become 'Fuehrer' after his final return from Argentina. During his visit in 1951 Rudel had expressed his sympathies for the Freikorps and for the SRP, and he had a conference with Count Westarp, member of the SRP executive.

"Experts say that the Freikorps is part of the 'Fascist International.' Its political predictions are enlightening. It says that at the elections in 1953 the Social Democrats will be triumphing. But they would be worn out not later than 1955. Then there would be political tension which might prepare their path, and by 1957 they would be able to conquer power..."

THEY LOVE US?

"Already faint murmurs of anti-Americanism are beginning to be heard in Germany outside the Socialist and nationalist parties.

"Conscription for a German contribution to the European defense force when it comes will provide another incitement to anti-Americanism, for it will be unpopular. And there is always the complaint of some German industrialists and merchants that United States policy, which to them is the Adenauer policy, is cutting them off from easy profits in the East."

TAXPAYERS' PARADISE

"Western Germany's Federal and State Governments, which expect a total of 30,000,000,000 Deutsche marks (about $7,000,000,000) in tax collections for 1952, could do a great deal better through improved tax legislation . . .

"The problem is of interest to Allied and German economists because of the emphasis often placed on Germany's financial obligations, including debts of the past as well as future obligations in the European Defense Community.

"In the course of reorganizing the big steel and coal enterprises of the Ruhr industrial area, through the Allied decartelization and de-concentration program, the new enterprises have been permitted by the Federal Government to revalue their assets.

"In most instances the revaluation has been upward, far upward, to permit claims of high rates of depreciation. This results in high tax exemptions with corollary losses to the Federal treasury.

"Another treasury loss results from the allowable practice of writing up huge expenses for repairs and maintenance, according to Allied sources who have studied the tax situation."

(As reported in the New York Times)

TOP SECRET

"West German Federal police have arrested five Germans suspected of selling German industrial secrets and patents to 'two Western powers.'

"No hint was dropped as to what 'Western powers' were involved. It was emphasized that no Russian or other Communist states or groups were involved.

"It was the second series of arrests in forty-eight hours growing out of charges that individuals were selling this country's industrial secrets to foreigners."

(From a report in the N. Y. Herald Tribune)

STEEL

"West German steel makers announced that they hoped to increase output to 16,500,000 tons a year next year—one million tons more than Britain.

"Bruno Fugmann, chairman of the West German Iron and Steel Association, told a meeting in Duesseldorf that about 2,500,000,000 Deutsche marks ($595,000,000) would be needed in the next three years . . .

"This would make Germany Europe's biggest steel producer, preceded in the world only by the United States and Russia."

(From an A. P. dispatch)

OIL . . .

"West German technical colleges are looking forward to a record spring enrollment of young Iranians intent on scientific training to run their country's nationalized oil industry.

"Six hundred Iranian students came there last fall to study technical courses. That is double the prewar average. The Iranian government has refused to send the students to Britain for their courses because of the bitter oil dispute."

(As reported in the Cleveland Plain Dealer)

LEST WE FORGET

"The tortures suffered by Roumanian Jews done to death in 'phantom trains' during the war were described by a witness at the trial of Franz Rademacher, former official of the Nazi Foreign Office, who is on trial on charges of responsibility in the deportation and death of thousands of Jews in Central Europe.

"The witness related how thousands of Roumanian Jews were stripped of all clothes and herded into long freight trains, regardless of age or sex. The unheated trains were shunted up and down the length of the Roumanian rail system until all the imprisoned Jews died of starvation or exposure."

(As reported by the J. T. A. News)

DRANG NACH OSTEN

"Communist China is today operating a secret network of 'purchasing agencies' in Western Germany, buying tens of millions of dollars worth of strategic industrial goods from the Germans and other West European nations for the Chinese war machine.

"Chief among the products the Peking representatives are buying, according to United States agents working on the problem, are specialized kinds of optical equipment and electronic equipment."

(Ernest Leiser to ONA)

FLYING HIGH

"West Germany has drawn up plans for a new Luftwaffe of 1,500 planes, manned by World War II airmen, to operate with the proposed six-nation European army.

"Informants said the plans prepared by former members of the late Reichsmarshal Herman Goering's staff called for the United States to supply the planes. The German force would be under the command of the European army's air staff."

(From a report in the New York Times)

DANCE OF BILLIONS

"Money problems are equally difficult. Equipment for an infantry division costs 200 million dollars; for an armored division, half a billion dollars. Counting pay, food, barracks construction and the like, it is estimated that the new German ground army will cost over 5 billion dollars for the first two years.

"Added to this are Air Force costs of 2.5 billion dollars, including the cost of planes and construction of 25 airfields at 7 million dollars each.

"All this, pooled with occupation costs of 3 billion dollars for the next two years, will come to 10.5 billion dollars . . .

"The United States, Britain and France may be asked to pay the bill for their occupation costs in Germany. This burden, if shifted, would fall mainly on the United States . . .

"Germans themselves are out to get what they can from the Western need for their help in the defense of Europe. They want more U. S. aid, more independence. They want, by one means or another, to unite East and West Germany."

What We Expect From The New President

General Eisenhower assumes the Presidency of the United States in a period of great danger and of unlimited opportunity for the free world. In his efforts to achieve peace he will have the united support of all Americans regardless of political affiliation.

For seven years now, the democracies of Western Europe have been confronted with the growing challenge of Soviet Russia. To meet this threat, the United States has endeavored to build up their moral, political, economic and military strength. Have we been successful? Marshall Plan aid and NATO were steps in the right direction, yet in the last analysis, these programs only touched the periphery of the problems which we have to face.

It is generally agreed that Germany is a focal point of tension between the East and West. Only through a realistic solution of the German problem can the peace and integrity of Western Europe be secured. Over the past few years the United States has pursued a policy based on the assumption that a strong and powerful Germany is the key to West Europe's defense against the expansionist aims of Russia. Consequently, virtually every safeguard against reviving the German powerhouse has been scrapped. The results:

"West Germany is now the strongest industrial power of continental Europe." (Business Week, Jan. 22, 1952.)

"Over all, West Germany is rapidly regaining its prewar niche as one of the world's greatest trading nations." (Business Week, March 29, 1952.)

"West Germany has a larger civilian industrial plant now than it had before the war." (U. S. News and World Report, Feb. 29, 1952.)

From the point of view of those who have been responsible for these huge gains within several years, our German policy has been an overwhelming success. But does this mean that we have solved the German problem in the sense that new strength has been added to Western Europe's struggle to preserve its freedom? Has resurgent Germany helped to increase the unity of Western Europe and does it serve as democracy's bulwark against Communism?

The resurgence of a powerful Germany has strained relations between the United States and her most reliable friends on the Continent. Communist propaganda has lost no time in exploiting this development to the fullest. It is also logical to expect that a resurgent Germany would help to consolidate Russia's grip on the satellite nations and creates favorable conditions for an eventual tie-up between a strong and dominant Germany and the vast Eurasian territories controlled by the Kremlin. Nor can we overlook the rapid rise of neo-Nazi movements which feed on this policy and create alarm among the nations victimized by Nazi aggression. "The time is past when either Germans or Americans can say complacently that in view of the last 30 years it is surprising that there are so few Nazis. Recent events show they are not so few after all." (Drew Middleton, New York Times, Nov. 16, 1952.)

A huge military establishment in Europe built on such foundations is not only insecure, but potentially dangerous.

Three years ago, PREVENT WORLD WAR III (March-April 1950 issue) discussed some of the implications of the policy to revitalize Germany's power. At that time it was predicted that the consequences flowing from this policy were bound to clash with our objective to contain the Communist menace. "The building up of such a Germany in the face of contracting world markets and increasing competition among the nations of the world is virtually an act of setting the fuse to a powder keg. Containing Communism while we revitalize Germany's economic power is like trying to build a house during an earthquake. The Germans, given an excess of economic power and capacity, will eventually open the way for new Communist expansion throughout the world. In this connection it is well worth recalling that the rebuilding of German industry after World War I with the help of American dollars not only gave Hitler the basis for an army, but after his defeat, opened new fields for Communist expansion. This is how Germany's heavy industries and its rulers have served the cause of democracy."

https://hdl.handle.net/2027/iau.31858019444649 / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

These observations can no longer be considered as hypothetical. Today the horizons are darkened by the menacing cloud of a possible Russo-German tie-up. General Eisenhower showed his awareness of this danger when he addressed the New York Herald Tribune Forum in October 1952. To frustrate the hopes and plans of the Kremlin that a strong Germany would break away from the West and make common cause with the Soviets, General Eisenhower declared that the problem of reestablishing the economy of West Germany "must be recognized as a problem of the entire free world." Yet Germany has already been reestablished as a leading economic power, and to further develop Germany's might, would only strengthen those factors which would enable her to dominate the West and make a deal with Moscow.

A strong Germany is not necessarily democracy's bulwark against Communism. A strong Germany could also become Russia's long-range trump card against the West. How does this jibe with German thinking on this crucial subject? A front-page editorial in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (March 15, 1952) which is the mouthpiece of the Bonn Foreign Office and also represents the thinking of leading industrial circles, wrote:

> "What can Russia win if she plays her trump card? . . . In order to jump out from her present isolation she can, exactly as the Rapallo Treaty did 30 years ago, place Germany as a protecting buffer between East and West. From the politico-economic point of view, she could repeat the old game for world power position by concluding long-term agreements with German industry and by reviving her trade with Germany. Thus, Russia might reopen the door to the world market."

There are some who will take these warnings lightly, but Walter Lippmann also warned his readers that if we do not take Stalin's policy "seriously, if we dismiss it as mere deception, we shall merely be deceiving ourselves." (New York Herald Tribune, Oct. 7, 1952.)

At the end of World War II, the United States had attained unsurpassed power and influence throughout the world. Yet by 1949 our historic victories in Asia were turned into devastating defeat. Must we face a similar disaster in Europe? Our present German policy, though shrouded with optimism in certain quarters, is facing a crisis. Yet it is not too late to avert the crisis. But this will depend in a large measure on our success in comprehending the portentous signs in Europe. Above all, this requires a complete re-examination of the basic assumptions on which our German policy rests.

When in 1950, Senators and Congressmen demanded an investigation of our occupation policies in Germany, John J. McCloy, then U. S. High Commissioner, hurried to Washington in order to prevent such Congressional inquiry. When we decided to investigate our policies in Asia, it turned out to be too late because the horse was already out of the stable. This need not happen in the case of Germany. We still have a chance to study the road on which we are travelling and where it winds up.

PREVENT WORLD WAR III has not hesitated to voice its disagreements with some of the fundamental premises which have been shaping our German policy. Measures have also been suggested which we believe would minimize risks we are assuming. While we do not claim a monopoly as to what is the realistic solution of the German problem, we believe that our present program is loaded with dangers and is morally wrong.

During the campaign some people feared the election of a military man to the Presidency of the United States on the alleged grounds that his viewpoint would be narrow and inflexible. As far as President-elect Eisenhower is concerned, his vast experience in world affairs and his proven qualities of leadership would indicate that he should not be placed in this category. In the context of our times, his leadership as a great general can be turned into a valuable asset in the quest for peace by not indulging in the luxury of wishful thinking which could ultimately mean disaster. It would be a good omen for all if the new President will apply this approach in the process of developing a foreign policy that will take us on the path which will lead our people and our friends to security and freedom.

Dr. Adenauer: "No, my darling Gretchen—first this treatment must be finished, before we try something else!"

(W. T. & Sun—11-13-52)

What do these headlines mean? Do they reveal any startling information concerning German behaviorism which has been conditioned by goose-stepping ideologies for a century?

No. It is not the behavior of the Germans which is unmasked by these headlines, but the policy pursued by our German "experts."

From Forrestal to Clay, from Draper to McCloy, "rehabilitation" has been the touchstone of that policy:

The "rehabilitation" of German war criminals, including the chief industrial and financial looters of Nazi occupied Europe.

The "rehabilitation" of ultra-nationalistic politicians pining for the glories of the Greater Reich.

The "rehabilitation" of the Ribbentrop diplomats weaving their new conspiracies.

The "rehabilitation" of the German cartel octopus and the predatory banking monopolies.

The "rehabilitation" of Germany's war potential which levelled Western Europe twice within a generation, resulting in a growth of the Communist danger.

Behind the smokescreen of "rehabilitation" connoting humanitarian principles, the most diabolical forces of humanity have emerged again. The victory of World War II provided the Allies with the historic opportunity and responsibility of destroying a breeding ground of aggression and lust for power, but the job was entrusted to people who saw no crime and heard no evil. Sentimental and financial ties also played their part and these men looked the other way. Thus, the roots of these crimes remained firmly imbedded in German soil and the conspirators were set on the loose again.

These experts were not too concerned with the plight of our Western Allies, overrun and despoiled by the Nazis. They were not too concerned over the fact that we had originally pledged priority aid to our Allies. Germany came first in their calculations.

Dazzled by the mirage of a crusading Germany in the service of democracy, these experts threw overboard the principle that the Germans must first prove their trustworthiness. Instead of granting adequate reparations to the victims of German aggression, our experts launched their program of "rehabilitation." In effect, this was a blank check guaranteeing German recovery without obliging the Germans to restore a substantial part of the loot seized from their victims.

German propagandists the world over, declare that only Germany is capable of defending Europe. Sympathizing U. S. travellers return from Europe stating that Germany has recovered more rapidly and thoroughly than France and other countries. Thus they conclude that Germany's capacity and energy have proven to be far superior than those of other countries. Superficially, this appears to be a valid conclusion. However, it is commonly forgotten that while Western European countries were occupied and bled white by a ruthless aggressor for nearly five years, West Germany was not drained of its resources by the occupation of an enemy or by hostile armies. Unlike the nations occupied by the Nazis, the factories of West Germany, machine tools and other vital industrial and technical equipment were not systematically looted and/or destroyed. Indeed, right after Germany's surrender, the good-hearted Americans and Britishers began preparing plans for the rehabilitation of Germany and the reconstruction of her powerful industrial Empire. That is why Germany seems to work harder and more efficiently than her victims who have been prevented from recovering as fast as the aggressor due, to a large extent, to U. S. policy.

And now that the German powerhouse re-emerges, stagnation and fear are setting in among the democracies of Western Europe.

Where is that idyllic picture of a strong and unified Europe developing out of a resurgent Germany, to resist the Communist challenge? The anti-Americanism sweeping Europe today, as admitted by every competent observer, is but the reflex of our pro-German bias which contaminates and vitiates all of our worthwhile policies in Europe. It has deepened the distrust of our most reliable friends abroad and has been artfully exploited by Communist propaganda. It has spread to persons in all classes who shrink at the idea of joining hands with their former torturers. How can a mighty army of democracy grow out of these conditions?

As for the peoples of Eastern Europe, viewing the specter of a Europe dominated by the very same people who exterminated millions of their kinsmen, will this infuse them with the spirit to resist their Communist oppressors?

Yes, Germany has been "rehabilitated" and with it all of the evil forces dedicated to the domination—not unification of Europe.

This is what the Germans have been planning all along. Now they whisper that a special alliance between the U. S. A. and Germany will safeguard our own security and welfare. According to German plans, this is the decisive step toward our ultimate isolation from our present allies.

We have been told that there are German leaders who strive to work sincerely with the West. However, when you get down to specifics, practically all of them with one voice declare "the Allies were wrong in bombing Germany's war-potential industries"—"the Allies were wrong in punishing and prosecuting the "so-called" war criminals—"; etc., etc. In short, "the Allies were wrong" in opposing German aggressions.

In moments when public opinion has been aroused by developments in Germany, our experts rush to exhibit Chancellor Adenauer as a shining example of a good democrat and trustworthy partner. However, when S.S. Gen. Ramcke declared the Western Allies to be war criminals amid shouts of "pig dog Eisenhower," Herr Adenauer told the British High Commissioner that Ramcke's remarks were "irresponsible" and that the speaker lacked "capacity of judgment." Not a word, categorically condemning the substance of Ramcke's vilifications—only the slippery alibi that he spoke out of turn. This is how a good German democrat "defends" democratic principles and justice.

Our experts have been boasting that Western Germany is coming more and more into the democratic fold. Yet, as the Germans approach the point of ratification of the Contractual Agreements, they attach new conditions and reservations which would further undermine whatever plausible objectives are contained therein. One of these conditions, as proposed by Chancellor Adenauer's government, would make these treaties "provisional and in force only until Germany had been reunited." (N. Y. Times, Dec. 5, 1952) In this way, the Germans hope to make use of their "rehabilitated" power as they see fit.

It cannot be said that there was no alternative than to pursue the same discredited policies tried after World War I and ending in bankruptcy and disaster with the rise of Hitlerism. It cannot be said that Americans could not be found who had a fundamental knowledge of German history and psychology and who would have been able to apply realistically their knowledge on behalf of our national interests. The policy was there and the people were available but instead we reached for those with special axes to grind. These men acted as though their own special interests were identical with the national interests of our country. The results of their labors are now apparent for all to see and ponder.

In this connection, one U. S. official in Bonn states "our vaccination of Democracy in Germany hasn't taken." (Business Week, Dec. 6, 1952) Judging from the poisons which have spread through the German body politic, one would be inclined to believe that the so-called vaccine was a venom administered by quacks.

Let there be no illusion as to what the headlines say. Like the fever chart of a sick man, they warn of crisis ahead. We shall have only ourselves to blame if we choose to ignore these ominous signs.

On Moral Principles:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE HON. JOHN FOSTER DULLES

(Original sent to Mr. Dulles on November 18, 1952)

In addressing the Missouri Bar Association some time ago, you declared that U. S. Foreign Policy must be guided by high moral principle if it is to be effective in the long run. "Today," you noted, "the U. S. has an inescapable responsibility for leadership. . . . The only tie which dependably unites free peoples is awareness of common dedication to moral principles."

Unquestionably, the leaders of our great political parties would subscribe to your view. Yet, public profession on behalf of virtuous principles become mere platitudes unless they are concretely applied. A glaring case of contrast between principles and practice is the recent decision of the occupation authorities in Germany to return a substantial portion of the Krupp properties to Alfred Krupp and to compensate him with tens of millions of dollars for such other properties which are supposed to be reorganized under the Allied decartelization laws.

From the very beginning of the occupation in Germany, the American people were told that U. S. foreign policy was dedicated toward upholding international moral principles and justice in a country whose leaders had besmirched those elementary norms of decency which are the very fabric of our civilization. This pledge to root out the evil forces of Nazi totalitarianism had gained for our country at the end of the war a prestige among the peoples of the world which one can say without exaggeration was our greatest asset.

However, when it came to the practical implementation of these principles, we began to falter and now we have reached the point, in the Krupp case where we have sacrificed moral principles for dubious political expediency.

Even a casual perusal of the European press as a reflector of public opinion on the Continent gives a clear indication that our moral prestige has been severely shaken by the Krupp decision. Commenting on this matter, the Financial Times of London said:

"Public expectation has, however, been baffled again. The property is to be restored, subject to futile and inadequate safeguards.

"By its apologists this policy is said to be expedient. This justification is as cynical as it is untrue. There is nothing expedient in outraging public opinion, even though it has been outraged successfully before."

In the eyes of many peoples abroad, our policy toward Krupp was a crucial test case of our intentions to uphold the principles so eloquently advocated by you. Nor can it be said that the American people are happy over this turn of events. As Congressman Jacob Javits recently stated:

"It has been a shock to the sensibilities of many Americans in whose minds recent history is still fresh, that the Krupp family, which was directly tied into so much of Hitler's capability for almost destroying Europe and the world, should be restored to a fortune which an Associated Press Dispatch estimates at between 90 and 100 million dollars."

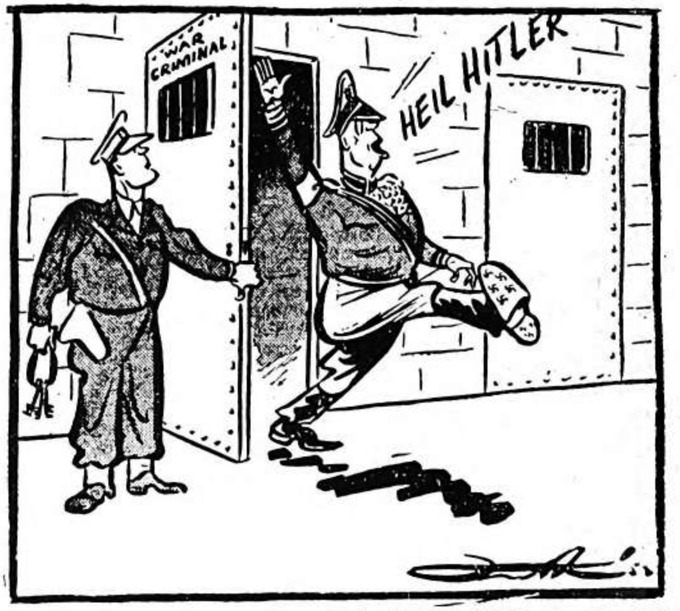
A GI veteran of World War II receives approximately $43 per week from the Government if he is 100% disabled. On the other hand, the notorious war criminal Alfred Krupp receives tens of millions of dollars as compensation. According to the Reuters News Agency, the Allied "rehabilitation" plan for Krupp will "reinstate him as one of the world's richest men."

There is no logic nor is there a shred of morality in this painful contrast. Krupp's wealth has not only been restored, but the plan which made this possible was worked out "in detail by Herr Krupp, his aides and Allied officials" as reported by the New York Times, August 18th, 1952.

Where in Anglo-Saxon law, which was invoked by the former U. S. High Commissioner McCloy to justify his magnanimous treatment of Krupp, can one find provision for seeking the advice of a notorious criminal on how to dispose of his loot? If this procedure had been followed in the case of an ordinary criminal, the justified wrath of public opinion would be accepted as a matter of course, but in the case of Alfred Krupp, public opinion is expected to tolerate this scandal as though it was a matter of high diplomatic strategy.

The Krupp interests were largely instrumental in creating the war machines that Germany employed to crush the independence and dignity of other nations. The name Krupp was synonymous with war. The Krupps were among the main beneficiaries of Hitler's armament program. Thus by 1939, the Krupps were doing a gross business of $300,000,000 in the manufacture of guns and other weapons that were designed to help level the towns of Western Europe. The Krupps did not stay at home when the Germans invaded the West. Like vultures they followed Hitler's armies, ready to sink their claws into the prostrated prey.

Alfred Krupp personally signed the resolution to establish a branch factory at the Concentration Camp of Auschwitz where the most "economical" use could be made of labor power. At Essen, Krupp personally supervised the employment of slave labor in his plants. Thousands of these slave laborers died under horrible conditions of exploitation.



(John Frith in "Melbourne Herald")

There was not enough whitewash in Germany to cover up his crimes and he was sentenced at Nuremburg to 12 years in jail plus the confiscation of his properties. In view of the crimes he committed, this was by no means drastic punishment. Even so, Herr Krupp received the utmost consideration from those who were supposed to represent the conscience of an outraged humanity.

According to the Reuters News Correspondent (Ian Fraser, August 27, 1952), "Krupp never has taken his finger from the industrial pulse even while he was serving his 12 year sentence, (later reduced to 2½ years) for exploiting slave labor, looting plants in occupied countries and illegal spoliation.

"He and 6 of his directors—who were right with him in Landesburg's Allied military prison—held Board Meetings regularly, complete with big cigars and expensive fruits."

Yet even this "punishment" appeared too severe. Thus when it came to confiscating his properties, as dictated by an American Military Court, the U. S. Military Governor for Germany, Gen. Clay, modified the order so that it was no longer mandatory.

His successor, U. S. High Commissioner McCloy, went further. Under McCloy's direction, Krupp was not only freed prematurely, but the confiscation decree was rescinded in toto. Mr. McCloy then assured the public that though the confiscation provision had been eliminated "it did not, however, restore any interest in any property which the defendant or the Krupp family may have lost by the operations of the occupation law or of German law. Nor did it purport to pass on whether the defendant or the Krupp family had any current interest in such property."

Mr. McCloy, however, did not tell the public that even while Krupp was imprisoned, he was allowed to continue functioning as a trustee of the Krupp properties. Moreover, Mr. McCloy concealed the fact that Krupp had actively participated in the reorganization plan. That Krupp was consulted with regard to the disposition of these properties in spite of the fact that his right to them was undecided is a species of legal logic which has yet to be explained. Apparently, those who are responsible for this situation were not at all troubled by what they gave the public to understand as the facts. According to the Manchester Guardian, September 18th, 1952, Mr. McCloy took this action "without—as far as can be ascertained—consulting or notifying the British and French High Commissioners."

The present plan to reorganize the Krupp properties ignores the overwhelming evidence attesting to the criminal character of Alfred Krupp and his activities. Officially, part of Krupp's properties will be reorganized under the Allied decartelization and deconcentration law. Herr Krupp will receive millions of dollars consisting of non-voting bonds of the same value as the shares in the new companies which will be created from the original properties. However, these bonds can be sold for cash by Krupp and become fully honored voting shares. All Herr Krupp has to do in order to regain control of these properties, is to sell the bonds to some stooges who will do his bidding while he keeps his hands clean. Another aspect to be considered is the fact that the sale of these reorganized properties under the present circumstances, will be most difficult. The Wall Street Journal (September 25, 1952) noted "Though Krupp's three-man board of trustees is now 'legal owner' of the coal and steel properties, Alfred Krupp is still the 'beneficial owner," according to an American decartelization expert. 'In other words,' he adds, 'Krupp gets the profits from the properties and the money from the sales of any of these firms when they're sold, but he can't run them.' "

"If a buyer or buyers cannot be found who will offer a 'fair and reasonable price,' the five-year disposal limit for these Krupp holdings can be extended by a mixed Allied-German commission. No limit is set on the number of one-year extensions that can be granted. Thus there is the possibility that Alfred Krupp might hold on to his steel and coal properties despite the best-laid plans of Allied decartelizers."

"The present Krupp trustees were chosen from a list of nominees offered by Herr Krupp and approved by the Allies. Therefore, nobody expects the interests of the House of Krupp to be unduly jeopardized during the sale efforts." In other words, in spite of the fanfare attached to the reorganization plan, the chances are that Krupp will be able to have his cake and eat it too.

If the Allies had been sincerely determined to smash the power of Krupp, the difficulties would not have been insurmountable. In the first place, Krupp holds the properties by virtue of a special Nazi law, Lex Krupp. The Allies could have voided the legality of this law but this was not done. In addition, the Allies could have applied the "Law for Liberation from National Socialism and Militarism" which is accepted by the German government as valid and still in force. The law expressly provides for the confiscation of properties belonging to Nazi war criminals. Indeed many persons who committed lesser crimes than those perpetrated by Krupp had their properties confiscated under this law. However, in the case of Krupp this law has been completely ignored.

Krupp could have been prevented from regaining these properties if the Allies had applied the letter of the Allied decartelization law No. 27 which prohibits "the return to the possession of ownership and control to those persons who had been found or may have been found to have favored the aggressive designs of the National Socialist Party." If there is any single person in Germany who falls within this provision, it is Krupp.

To our most reliable friends in Europe, this act of solicitude for the war criminal Krupp stands in sharp contrast to our professions of morality in the conduct of our foreign relations. They have looked to us for guidance in the tense struggle against Soviet Communism. Can it be expected that their own determination to resist the onslaughts of cynical undemocratic ideologies will be strengthened by a policy which goes out of its way to help resuscitate those forces which have been a plague on the social well-being of our Allies for generations? With the exception of a few courageous voices, our leaders regardless of party affiliation, have been silent on the Krupp issue. This is not only disappointing but dangerous. Do our leaders believe that our national security and prestige will be strengthened by this silence?

It would be a great help to the cause of justice if the principles of morality so clearly enunciated by you would be applied in this case. The least that should be done is to actively support Congressman Javits' proposal:

"That a fine should be levied on the Krupp family of practically the whole fortune of between 90 and 100 million dollars involved, for the misdeeds against humanity for which they stand convicted in aiding Hitler and the Nazis."

Admittedly, this punishment would not bring back to life the thousands of persons victimized by the slave-labor policies of the Krupps. On the other hand, support of this proposal would help preserve our moral leadership and strengthen the forces of international law and justice against those who are prone to resort to criminal policies in international relations.

GERMAN WAR CRIMES — "AN ALLIED INVENTION"

It is indeed unfortunate that the average American does not have the opportunity to study at first hand the mood of the Germans as reflected in their press and by the speeches of their leaders. In this connection, the New York Journal American of Oct. 7, 1952 carried an eye opening report from Bonn, Germany under the title "Germans Winking At War Criminals." Actually, it is not merely a flirtation but rather a concerted and vociferous campaign to uphold these criminals as representing the honor of the German people. This is made clear in the first sentence of the above-mentioned news despatch—"many Germans still pay high tribute to the men the Western Allies convicted of war crimes."

Citing one example, the despatch referred to the case of one William Kappe who had escaped from a British prison in Germany where he was serving a life sentence for war crimes. When Kappe returned to his home town, Aurich near the North Sea, he was recognized by Wilhelm Heidepeter, a city official in the town and was turned over to the police. For this act of good citizenship, Heidepeter was denounced as a traitor by the mayor of Aurich, a member of Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democratic Party, and he was finally forced to flee. While Herr Heidepeter was ostracized, the policemen who arrested the war criminal Kappe faced criminal charges. The other members of the German police force having witnessed the fate of their colleagues, fixed up a situation which enabled Kappe to slip out of Aurich and regain his freedom. The despatch concludes with this understatement: "the post-war concept of 'good citizenship' is undergoing a drastic overhauling in Germany these days."

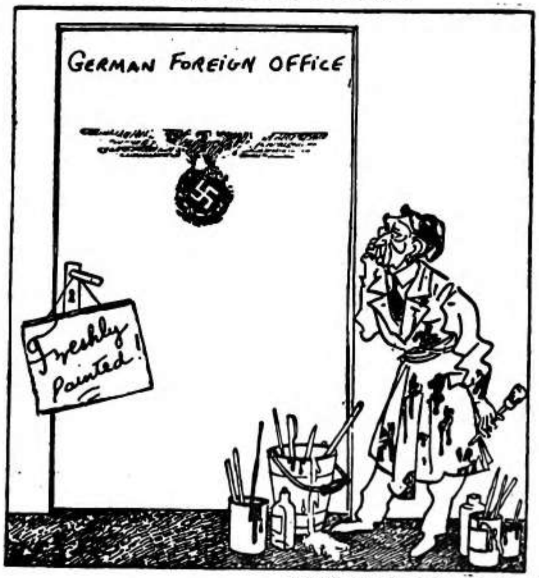
In Germany today, variations of the Kappe story are occurring more frequently. It is a definite trend, symptomatic of the failure of our democratization program. Time and again the American people have been told that so long as men like Konrad Adenauer are at the helm of the German government, anti-democratic and anti-allied movements symbolized by the effort to glorify Germany's war criminals will never get out of hand. There is an element of truth in this statement, namely that the Allies can rest assured that this insidious and scandalous movement will never get out of hand because it is carefully controlled and directed by the top brass in the German government today. As early as Feb. 19, 1952, Chancellor Adenauer told a press conference "we Germans are exceptionally deeply interested in the treatment of war criminals, both for psychological reasons and sympathy with those who though sentenced, have in our opinion not committed any crimes at all." He added that the Germans did not recognize the judgments handed down in the war crime cases and need not recognize them.

Blackmail as Usual

The New York Times of July 25, 1952 reported that in the opinion of chief military advisers to the German federal governemnt, Lieut. General Wolf Von Heusinger and Lieut. General Hans Speidel, it would be "impossible to recruit desirable officers for the West German military contingents unless a substantial number of war criminals are released from Allied jails." Dr. Erich Mende, an influential German politician in Adenauer's coalition government warned the Allies that "unless the war criminals are released, the Bonn peace contract with the western Allies and the European Defense Committee Treaty would not be ratified." Among the war criminals for whom Dr. Mende demanded immediate release were Field Marshal Von Mannstein, found guilty of inhuman treatment of prisoners of war and the use of slave labor, and Marshal Kesselring, who was responsible for the massacre of hundreds of civilians. As far as Dr. Mende was concerned, the German war criminals had been convicted for acts that "were no different from those committed by the United Nations troops in Korea." Parenthetically, it should be noted that Marshal Kesselring was recently given his freedom as an act of clemency by the British.

Fritz Schaefer, vice president of the Bonn Parliament, echoed Dr. Mende's view: "It is one of the greatest psychological obstacles," Herr Schaefer noted, "for the German European defense contribution, as long as the Western Allies remain firm on their one sided sentence against the war criminals." It is obvious that the sentiments expressed by the above-mentioned individuals are shared by a substantial portion of the present leadership in Germany today.

Painter Adenauer: "I can't help it—the old paint always comes through."



(Ostdeutsche Stimme, Hamburg)

The attacks against the Allied war crimes trials and the whole concept of punishing those who violated the elementary norms of human behavior and decency goes on with unabated fury. If the leaders who have been so highly praised by the Allies as great Democrats, refuse to break with the criminal record of the Hitler regime, one can hardly expect the German people as a whole to act otherwise. It is no exaggeration to state that the campaign for the freedom of the war criminals is one of the most dominating factors in German politics today.

The press from right to left is generally unanimous in defending these war criminals and in demanding an immediate rectification of the alleged injustices done to them. The Allied effort to appease the Germans on the war criminal question has its own logic.

Tragic Reminder

In this connection, it should be noted that one of the earliest examples of submitting to German pressure involved the case of the German war criminals who were charged with having massacred in cold blood American GI's taken prisoners during the Battle of the Bulge (the Malmedy Massacre). Hundreds of American boys and Belgian civilians were slain without mercy, and in direct violation of the laws of war. These war criminals were given their day in court and they confessed to their guilt. Out of the 73 criminals who were originally convicted, 43 were given the death penalty by an American Military Tribunal. However, Gen. Clay, in spite of the fact that he had branded these criminals as "cold blooded killers," commuted many of these death sentences.

After additional delays, the number of Malmedy war criminals who were supposed to face the death penalty was reduced to six. In January 1951, Gen. Thomas Handy decided to spare the remaining six criminals as a gesture of goodwill toward the Germans. The precedent established in the Malmedy case is now bearing bitter fruit, as recent developments clearly indicate.

"The Churchill of the war years spoke with the voice of wisdom. The Churchill of today speaks dangerous nonsense.

"Germany has waged five wars of aggression since 1864—against Denmark, Austria and France and twice against the Anglo-American-French group.

"If European civilization is to survive, a peaceful and trustworthy Germany must some day play a full part in the European family.

"But the day is not yet. There are too many Germans like the one-time General Ramcke, whose only regret is that Hitler was not more successful, and whose secret resolve is that they will do better next time.

"The West German army which America and Britain are trying to create would not strengthen the common defenses of the West against Russia. It would weaken them, because every Continental nation that has known the German jackboot would be more concerned to guard itself against another 'Der Tag' than to cooperate in common defense.

"The recruitment of a West German Army would be more likely to provoke the Russians into striking quickly than to make them more reasonable in international relations.

"There is still time to stop this dangerous plan. Already, French opinion is in revolt. Before it is too late, the British Government could reconsider the plan, and seek other means of safeguarding the West."
